It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 265.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Earl SPENCER) : My Lords, I have frequently had to ask the indulgence of your Lordships, but I am quite sure that I have never addressed you before when I had more cause to ask for your kindness. The subject of the government of Ireland excites stormy feeling ; it arouses great and bitter controversy. I shall endeavour to-night to avoid all personal attack, and, if possible, not to raise any irritating subjects. One thing I know that we are all agreed upon, and that is the vast importance of the subject, not only to Ireland, but to the Empire at large. I have, therefore, a task of unusual difficulty in endeavouring to explain to your Lordships the Bill which Her Majesty's Government have introduced to Parliament, and to state the reasons why they have thought it necessary to introduce that measure. I claim credit for the honest motives and intentions of those who support this Bill, in the same way that I attribute the same motives to those who oppose it. I venture to call your Lordships' attention to the history of Ireland since the Union. I shall not attempt to go at length and in great detail into that history, but it is necessary to refer to it briefly, in order that we may see the ground on which we stand and the difficulties which beset Ireland and which have made it necessary, in the opinion of the Government, to take the course they have adopted. If we look at the history of Ireland during the present century we shall find much to deplore. We shall find periodical rebellion; we shall find chronic agrarian discontent, culminating time after time in outbreaks of agrarian crime; we shall find religious animosities and differences; we shall find a people steeped in poverty and in misery, from which have arisen terrible famine and distress which have baffled and given immense difficulty to the Government of the day. We find all that, and, as I have said, we cannot but deplore all these circumstances; and I do not think there will be much difference of opinion between those whom I represent and noble Lords on the other side of the House with regard to the unfortunate condition of Ireland during the century. We differ, I know, and differ with extreme force; but that difference is with regard to the remedies to be applied to Ireland, and not as to the state of Ireland itself. How have the Government of the day endeavoured to meet this state of affairs? They have met rebellion by force; and, though rebellion has often been troublesome in Ireland, it has never been extremely formidable, for the reason that the powerful forces of this country could do what they liked with a poor and weak country like Ireland. Therefore, there has been no time when rebellion has lifted its head for any period and the Government of the day have always been able to cope with it. But there is another difficulty of a more insidious kind; I refer to agrarian discontent and outbreaks of agrarian crime. These have been more difficult to deal with. Governments, one after another, whatever Party has been in power, have dealt with this agrarian discontent, first by the control of a powerful constabulary, and even by the use and the aid of the military. They have also dealt with this agrarian discontent by means of exceptional legislation. I will say a few words with regard to this exceptional legislation, because I do not wish to pass by that subject without referring to it. I have never stated, and I do not mean to state now, that in my opinion exceptional criminal legislation ought never to be applied to a country. There are occasions, and there have been occasions in Ireland, when exceptional criminal legislation—or, as it is called shortly, coercion—has been necessary. There have been times before when remedial legislation has taken root and where time was wanted in order to develop its effects—times when, as has happened more than once, there have been violent outbreaks of crime, when murders were rife in the country, and when agrarian conspiracy and secret societies ruled a great part of the country. Then it was essential, for the safety of the State, to introduce for a time exceptional legislation. But exceptional legislation, as we know, is not a cure for a deep-rooted and deep-seated evil. There is one drawback and fault attached to exceptional legislation which I think has often been overlooked, and that is the demoralising effect which exceptional criminal legislation has on the various forces which are maintained in the country for the maintenance of law and order. The police rely more upon the exceptional measures than on the ordinary methods for detecting crime and following up criminals. The law itself is not applied so rigorously as when the peace and order of the country depend entirely on the ordinary law. I have often heard it said that exceptional legislation and coercion does not in any way affect the well-ordered people, and in that way it does not do much harm; it only brings criminals to justice, and punishes those who might otherwise escape the law. That may be true in one sense; but those who urge that plea forget that in a country like Ireland there is a large body of men who, though they entirely refrain from actual crime, yet are so opposed to the Government of the day that they will not move a finger in order to bring the criminals to justice. Exceptional legislation to them is merely a new proof how great the inability of the British Parliament is to govern that country. To them exceptional legislation is hateful, and every time you apply exceptional legislation you increase and irritate the feeling of the Irish and many of the well-disposed people against the British Government and against law and order. Exceptional criminal legislation or coercion has been a very frequent method of legislation for the government of Ireland in the past. I believe that in 87 years there have been 87 Coercion Acts or renewal of Coercion Acts in that country. They have been, as a rule, temporary in character, but at this moment there is an exceptional Criminal Law in Ireland which is not temporary but permanent. I will now pass from this part of the question and refer to other Acts in connection with Ireland. Every statesman knows that when there is widespread discontent and crime in a country there is some cause for it, and every statesman who is worthy of the name of statesmanship will try to find out what the cause of those grievances is, and will bring forward measures to remedy them. These measures have been called remedial measures of legislation. Discontent is never of spontaneous growth; it always originates through some cause or other. Now, my Lords, what have been the measures which statesmen on both sides have applied to Ireland? I will speak of the measures which I may call, perhaps, heroic measures, though there have been other measures on many occasions which the Government of the day have applied with the view of overcoming the difficulties of government in that country. The first great measure was Catholic Emancipation in 1829; at a long interval came the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Irish Church. Dealing with agrarian discontent there was first of all the Encumbered Estates Court Act; then followed a smaller Act in 1860 with regard to the land; and, finally, there came those great measures of 1870 and 1881; next the Act of 1887—all of them dealing with the tenure of land in Ireland. These measures also contained provisions for the purchase of land by the occupiers. These measures were followed in 1885 by the measure which is known by the name of the noble Lord opposite, Lord Ashbourne, for giving facilities to tenants to buy the land which they occupy. This, again, was followed by the Act of 1891. There have been numerous other measures passed for the benefit of Ireland, such as Irrigation Acts and Reclamation of Land Acts; there have been loans to railroads; and money has been lavished upon Ireland with the hope of improving its material condition. What has been the effect of all this legislation, of all these efforts which have been nobly made by one side or the other to endeavour to win over Ireland to contentment and happiness? I fear the state of Ireland has not become proportionately satisfactory. I do not for a moment say that there has been no improvement, or that there has not been a very considerable improvement during the century. It would be vain to contend that there has not been great improvement; that great grievances have not been redressed, and that to some extent a better feeling does not prevail among the people. But I would like to follow this up a little further. Do you find in Ireland that support of law and order without which no good government exists? The symbol and sign of good government is to find, as we do in this country, the whole population anxious to support the law. I fear in Ireland, although there has been some improvement, even now, when agrarian crimes arise and political agitation exists, you will find large portions of the population determined to resist the law and to obstruct the action of the Government. That, my Lords, in itself is a grievous sign of the condition of the country. Has the country prospered? No doubt it has made some advance, for greater prosperity exists than there was 40 or 50 years ago. Yet even now there are districts of the country where the population barely subsist at times on the land they cultivate. If a bad season occurs or prices fall, then that population is on the verge of famine, and looks to the richer sister country, England, for support and existence. If we look at the feeling which is exhibited throughout the country we shall find hardly a single Representative Body out of Ulster—a Board of Guardians, Local Government Board, or Borough Authority—which does not take every opportunity to thwart and oppose the Government of the day. Lastly, if we look to Parliament—and that, I think, is the best test of all of the feeling of a country—we find that the majority the Nationalists have had in Parliament ever since 1874, which has always been considerable, has increased until now four-fifths of the Irish Representatives are in favour of Home Rule or self-government for Ireland. That, I think, is a very serious position, especially in this country where we are so proud of our Representative Institutions and so proud of our Constitution. That alone points to an unhealthy condition of affairs in a country. Now why is it that those measures have failed? Why is it that, after passing the measures I have referred to, we still find an unhealthy state of things in Ireland? I venture to think that nearly all these great measures have been introduced too late, or without due regard to the feelings, sentiments, and customs of the Irish people. I will illustrate this very shortly from the measures of which I have spoken. Take Catholic Emancipation. We all know that at the time of the Union it was in the mind of Mr. Pitt to pass Catholic Emancipation. In 1801 he resigned his place in the Government because he was unable to introduce a measure of Catholic Emancipation, and it was not till 29 years after the Union that Catholic Emancipation was given. We do not know what might have been the effect on the Union and on subsequent events in Ireland if this measure of redress had been passed at the time of the Union. After Catholic Emancipation we had to wait 40 years before we dealt with another great grievance of the Irish people—namely, the establishment of a religion which was not the religion of the bulk of the people. There is one exception, probably, which I believe was almost entirely successful—namely, the commutation of tithe. The two observations I have made will apply to the measures passed with reference to the land. The first great inquiry with respect to the land was made by the Devon Commission. That Commission went into this subject with the greatest care, and it drew up one of the ablest Reports ever presented to the Queen. The Report of the Devon Commission was scathing in its terms with regard to the condition of the Irish tenants and peasantry. I was looking the other day through some of the speeches on this subject, and I came across what I think a remarkable statement on the subject by one who was well-known in both Houses of Parliament in his day as one of the most eloquent speakers and one of the most intrepid statesmen who ever sat on these Benches—I allude to the late Lord Derby, the father of the noble Lord whose recent death we so much deplored, and also of the noble Lord whom we welcome amongst us, and who lately filled a high position with honour and dignity in Her Majesty's Colonies. Lord Stanley, as he then was, in introducing a measure immediately after the Report of the Devon Commission, after referring to the fact that the tenants in Ireland erected buildings and did all the substantial repairs, used these words—

“Could he be surprised to find on those farms everything neglected and in ruin; the land unproductive, the cultivation defective, and the estate peopled not by an industrious, thriving, and peaceful, but by an idle, a dissolute, and a disturbed people? And yet this, with some honourable exceptions, is not a highly-coloured or exaggerated picture of the condition of a large portion of the tenantry of Ireland. Then is not this a state of things in which, when it is for the interest of the landlord himself, we should interfere to give to the tenant some security and encouragement, so that, if he chose to spend his capital and labour in improvements, he should not be turned out of his wretched holding without compensation for his outlay, whether of money or of labour?”

After speaking of the Ulster tenant-right custom, he goes on—

“What is the case with regard to the rest of Ireland? There the tenant holds by a more dangerous tenure—by the security he derives from the fears of the landlord.”

This is a very grave and solemn statement by an eminent statesman whom noble Lords on the other side have followed and honoured, and I do not think you could have stronger testimony as to the deplorable condition of Ireland at that time and of the necessity for some immediate legislation.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: What was the date of that speech?

*EARL SPENCER: It was in 1845. What followed that speech? There was no serious attempt to cope with the Land Question in Ireland, with one exception, until 1870. I say, therefore, you may apply the term "too late" to our dealing with this question. At the time of the famine, when it was found that there were bankrupt landlords on settled estates, a great Act was passed in order to relieve that state of things; and I venture to say, if it was not too late, it altogether disregarded some of the most cherished customs and opinions of the Irish people, for no provision was made in that Act to protect the property of the tenants. Later on the new landlords, some of whom were accustomed only to the habits of English landlords, treated their tenants exactly on the English system; and from that sprang some of the difficulties which have culminated in our days in terrible land disturbances in Ireland. Take the next legislation with regard to the land in 1860. Then an Act was passed on the same English lines. It was known in Ireland under the name of Deasy's Act, and in England under the name of Cardwell's Act. It tried to introduce the system of pure contract into the habits of the Irish tenants, and it entirely failed. Now I come to the Gladstone Act of 1870. That was a great and sweeping measure, but it shrank from going the full length of what was wanted in Ireland at the time. It did not deal with the extension of the Ulster custom, and it did not establish Rent Courts in Ireland. I do not say that at that time the Government of Mr. Gladstone could have carried a wider measure. For some years after this measure there was great agricultural prosperity in Ireland; but the moment bad times came, as they did in 1878 and 1879, then difficulties began with regard to the Act of 1870. As you all know, a terrible agrarian insurrection, agitation, and outbreak occurred, and the Government of Mr. Gladstone in 1881 was forced to introduce a new measure. What did that measure do? It supplemented the Act of 1870, and extended the Ulster custom over Ireland and established official Rent Courts in the country. Then came the Act of the noble Marquess opposite, the Act of 1887. That Act, as you know, dealt mainly with temporary circumstances, but it did extend the previous Acts by the clause admitting leaseholders. Therefore, every one of these Acts in succession had to supplement the deficiencies that were found in every Act that preceded. So much for the Land Acts. The question of Local Government stands even worse than the question of the land. In 1842 a Commission recommended that measures should be taken for altering the laws in relation to Local Government. Act after Act was introduced, but every one failed, and the last failure was the Act of 1892 of Mr. Balfour, who introduced a large measure of Local Government in the other House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It never passed. Do you call that an Act which failed?

EARL SPENCER: The noble Marquess is too critical. What I intended to say was that those Acts one after another were introduced, but was rejected by Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Bills, not Acts.

EARL SPENCER: Bills I should have called them. Now, my Lords, I should like to refer to the Irish Government. The Irish Government itself and its position illustrate very forcibly the condition of Ireland. The Irish Government is in one sense a powerful Government, for it is essentially centralised in its action; but on the other side it is a very weak Government, for it is completely isolated from the country. Why is it so centralised? There are two reasons. The first is that the administration of the law could not, years ago even, be left entirely to the class that administer it in England; because on certain disputed subjects that class did not receive the support and confidence of the masses of the people. The other reason is that in the large towns and in other places of municipal government the Irish Government could not trust the Municipalities, because they were so opposed to the Government of the day that they could not hand over to them the powers of police and other powers which in England are given to the Local Authorities. That, I conceive, is a very serious and grievous state of things. In England we have in every part of the country buffers to the Central Government. We hear nothing in London of many cases which in Ireland would at once be brought home to the Central Government. But the effect of that is that every breakdown in the law—every Magistrate who makes a mistake—is thrown against the Central Government. It is a most powerful Government in one sense, as I say, because it wields the police and practically controls the appointment of every Magistrate in the country. The police it is able to move all over the country as if it were one man. It appoints the Magistrates in every borough and county. With all that, my Lords, we know that it is essentially a weak Government, because it has not the support of the masses of the people of the country. There is another reason why the great measures that have been passed for Ireland have not been fruitful in good results, and it is, perhaps, one of the principal causes of the failure of British Governments and British Parliaments successfully to cope with Irish grievances. I mean that there is in Ireland underlying the whole feeling of the great majority of the people one passionate sentiment — namely, the sentiment for Local Government. This sentiment has been shown in a variety of ways. It has been shown sometimes in rebellion, sometimes in cries for absolute separation, sometimes in cries for Repeal of the Union. We have never been able to stifle or conciliate it. We have never been able to use the feeling which is so strong in England in support of law and order in support of the same forces in Ireland. The neglect of this feeling, in my belief, is at the root of the failure of most of these measures to which I have referred, and we felt this very strongly when we had to consider what measures we should introduce for Ireland. I have endeavoured, I am afraid very inadequately, to touch on the condition of Ireland during the last 93 years. I wish a more able exponent of this policy could have stood before you, but I have felt it my duty to trace the course of events, and the study of these events brought my mind in the year 1885—I speak now, and I ought to apologise, perhaps, for doing so, in my own name, but I do not like in this particular part of the subject to introduce the responsibility for others—to the view that a new policy was absolutely required. I have been in Ireland for eight years—for three years under the most difficult circumstances. I had to administer the law entrusted to me by Parliament. I did it as honestly and fearlessly as I could. I endeavoured to administer it also with perfect justice, and in some degree I think I may claim that I was successful in restoring law and order to the country. But after that was done I could not but feel that I had not succeeded permanently in the work which I had endeavoured to do. I found all those conditions of discontent and want of support of the Government to which I have adverted, and I seriously considered the position. The events on this side of the water in 1885 did not check the feeling operating in my mind. What did these events show? They showed that a Conservative Government were willing and able to enter upon Office when their Party was in a minority in the House of Commons by the support of the Irish vote. These events further showed that the continuity which had hitherto existed with regard to the administration of the law in Ireland had been broken, and these two considerations had a profound effect on my mind, and convinced me that some change in the policy which both Parties had heretofore pursued must be made. The old remedies had failed; was it possible to find new remedies? I faced the question in this way: It was necessary before committing myself to any new policy to see that certain guarantees and conditions were attached to any new principle that might be adopted. Those conditions were three. I conceived that no new policy ought to be adopted unless you could maintain the supremacy of Parliament, maintain the unity of the Kingdom, and effectually protect minorities in Ireland. Those three conditions were the tests which I applied to the question of new methods of governing Ireland. I need not go through all the proceedings of 1886. As your Lordships are aware, the Liberal Party over which Mr. Gladstone presided then inaugurated a new policy for Ireland. It has sometimes been said that we Liberals who followed Mr. Gladstone in this new policy adopted it with a light heart. I assure you, my Lords, that one of the most painful things I and many of my colleagues went through was the way in which we had to adopt that policy, for this reason—that we had to separate ourselves from many of the colleagues and friends with whom we had been all our political lives intimately connected. It was not a light matter. It was a matter we felt most deeply, and, I will venture to say, still feel. But it was in our mind a paramount duty that we should adopt this new course, as it was in our opinion the only way of dealing with the Irish difficulty. I shall not go through the Bill of 1886, or what occurred after it. I shall go at once to the measure which is now before your Lordships—a measure which is founded on the same principles as that which was introduced to Parliament and lost in 1886. I venture to think that this measure does embrace those guarantees and conditions without which I did not think any change of policy in Ireland ought to be made. Possibly I might pass over the details of this measure, and no doubt many of your Lordships, perhaps all your Lordships, have followed the long Debates which have occurred in another place on this Bill; at the same time, I do not think I should be treating your Lordships' House with respect if I did not shortly touch on the provisions of the measure. The Bill before your Lordships proposes to establish a Legislature for Ireland consisting of the Queen and two Houses. The Bill guards most carefully the powers of the Irish Legislature. It protects the supremacy of Parliament. In the preamble and in the 2nd clause there are distinct provisos to maintain and uphold the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. The Irish Legislature will have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland in matters relating exclusively to Ireland, or some part thereof. To this there are exceptions and restrictions, but they only define, enumerate, and explain the matter to which I have just referred. The exceptions are that the Irish Legislature cannot deal with the Crown or the succession; it cannot deal with matters connected with peace or war, with the Army, Navy, or Volunteers, with Treaties with Foreign Powers, with the coinage or legal tender. There are still more exceptions; but I have enumerated enough to show that they are of great importance as bearing on the supremacy of Parliament. The restrictions go to prevent the Irish Parliament from establishing or endowing religion, from dealing with the laws of religious liberty; they insure freedom of conscience for adults and for children in schools: they prevent the Irish Parliament from making laws to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law in accordance with established principles and precedents. They also protect Corporate Bodies and various other interests. The Irish Legislature is to consist of two Chambers—the Legislative Chamber, with the same franchise and the number of Members as govern the position of Irish Members now in Parliament. The Second Chamber, which is called the Legislative Council, is introduced as a safeguard against hasty legislation. If we look at the Legislatures and Constitutions throughout Europe it will be found that there is only one country which has but one Chamber, and that is the Kingdom of Greece.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Bulgaria.

*EARL SPENCER: Second Chambers are constituted very nearly in every country in Europe. That is enough for my argument. The Second Chamber is to consist of 48 Members, to be elected for eight years, whereas the Legislative Chamber is to be elected for five, and the Second Chamber is not to be affected by a Dissolution. In the case of a difference of opinion between the two Chambers—what you call a deadlock—it is proposed that in case a Bill is presented again at the end of two years, or after a Dissolution, after having been rejected by the Legislative Council, then, if the Bill is again rejected, a decision shall be come to by both Chambers sitting as one. The Executive, as a matter of course, is centred in the Queen, and the Lord Lieutenant represents Her Majesty. The Lord Lieutenant is to be appointed for six years by the Government of the day, but he is not to be a political officer going out with the Government. The Lord Lieutenant is to be relieved of religious tests. In his hands is one of the most important powers of the Bill—namely, the veto. He can exercise the veto in three ways. He is to exercise it usually upon the advice of his Irish Ministers, but he can exercise it if a Bill is ultra vires, and also upon instructions from the Queen on special Bills. The Lord Lieutenant is to have control of the military in Ireland, as at present, and during six years the police will be under his control, as representing the Queen. In six years the police are to be disbanded, by which time, no doubt, it will be possible to find places in other forces for a great number of that body. Those who are to be disbanded will have terms of a liberal character given to them — something like an addition of 10 years to their pay. I need hardly say, after having had such great experience of the loyalty and efficiency of the Royal Irish Constabulary, I should regret extremely if they felt they had not received justice in this matter. I come now to the Civil Service, the members of which are provided with retirement pensions and allowances if they retire before five years. The Judges have all their rights preserved to them, both as to pay and as to the manner of their tenure. The new Judges are to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant on the advice of the Irish Government; but for six years such appointments are to receive the countersign of the Secretary of State in England. I do not want to dilate at length on the question of finance; but, as it is so important, I must say a few words upon it. There is one important consideration to be borne in mind, and that is the taxable capacity of Ireland. We do not propose that the burden should be made heavier than it now is. It is possible that Ireland may now pay a larger contribution, according to her taxable capacity, than England or Scotland towards Imperial charges; but we do not propose at this moment to alter that. We propose that we shall, as far as possible, receive from the Irish for Imperial purposes the same contribution which they now give. The Customs, Excise, and Income Tax are to be for six years exactly as they are now, and when collected two-thirds are to be paid over to the Irish Exchequer, and one-third is to go for Imperial purposes. I believe I am right in saying that within £20,000 this proposal represents exactly the present payments of Ireland to this country. But there is another point. During the time that the Royal Irish Constabulary are to be under the control of the Lord Lieutenant a certain portion of the charge is to fall on the Imperial Exchequer. That will amount to about £480,000, but it is not a permanent charge, and will diminish as the police disappear and as their pensions lapse. Now, it may be asked, is that a good bargain for England and also for Ireland? I venture to say that it is a good bargain for England. If England desires to carry this measure and give self-government to Ireland, she will not wish to treat Ireland in a niggardly manner. And, considering the enormous expense of our government in Ireland, expense connected with the judiciary, the police, and the various other parts of the Civil Service, and that that expense on the part of England is an increasing expense, it will be a gain for England not to have to provide for this expensive government. With regard to Ireland, she will, at all events during a considerable number of years, according to the calculation made, have about £500,000 surplus. I pass on now to the question of land legislation. That is a subject in which I know your Lordships take a deep interest, and it is one upon which I hold a strong opinion. I have long held that there were strong reasons for dealing with this Irish Land Question. To carry out the policy of 1886 two Bills were introduced—a Government of Ireland Bill and a Land Bill. These two measures were linked together at the time. The Land Bill never came on for Second Reading, and was, therefore, not discussed in the other House of Parliament. It fell with the Government of Ireland Bill, the two Bills at the time being considered by us to be linked strongly and firmly together. We at that time thought it necessary to connect the legislation with regard to land with the legislation for the Local Government of Ireland. We believed that after the desperate struggle which had been going on for so many years in Ireland on the Land Question—a struggle that had hardly then ceased, or, at all events, was of very recent cessation—it would not be right to give immediately to the Irish Legislature the power of dealing with the question of land. We thought, further, that it would be intolerable to place on a new Legislature, which had an enormous variety of subjects, and pressing subjects, to deal with, the responsibility of dealing with this great question, the difficulty of which had, to a great extent, arisen from legislation of the Imperial Parliament. After the defeat of the Government of 1886 this question of the land was dealt with in Parliament. There was the measure of 1887, which extended the Ashbourne Act, and there was, further, the great measure of Mr. Balfour in 1891. These two measures, to my mind, took the place of the Land Bill, which was linked with the Local Government question in our policy of 1886. Those were Bills of great importance. Ten millions had, I think, been allotted under the Ashbourne Act towards the purchase by the tenants of their farms, and Mr. Balfour's measure proposed that £30,000,000 should be allotted for this purpose. This is how he describes his measure—

“The best calculation that I can make is that in any case the total amount to complete land purchase would be somewhere about £95,000,000 sterling. Therefore, although the 30 odd millions which the Bill proposes to allocate to land purchase certainly is far from carrying it out completely, it will be observed that, if we deduct from the £95,000,000 those cases in which landlords and tenants do not desire to sell or purchase, with the repayments of the £30,000,000 we may really expect under this Bill to see a great impression made upon the problem we have to solve.”

That Act remains in force, and it is protected by provisions in the present Bill. These measures, alone, have made an enormous difference with regard to the position of the landlords in Ireland; and, therefore, if it were only with regard to the passing of these two measures, I should not think it would be necessary now to link a land measure with the Local Government Bill; but the landlords of Ireland have other securities. They have the security of the veto, and that for six years the military and the police are under the control of the Lord Lieutenant. Further, provision is made that for three years the Imperial Parliament may deal with this subject here, and the Irish Parliament are prevented from dealing with it. Lastly, the landlords have behind them the inherent power of the Imperial Parliament in case of grievous injustice and wrong. These are the reasons why, who have been very strongly in favour of securing to landlords the possibility in case of difficulty of selling their estates, consider that their interests are safeguarded under the Bill and under the Acts of Parliament to which I have referred. I must refer to one other point, and it is a point on which great interest has been felt—I mean the retention of the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament. Your Lordships are aware that under the Bill of 1886 the Irish Members were excluded. I at that time was strongly in favour of that proposition, and for these reasons. It was the simplest plan, and it avoided many complications which were unavoidable under other solutions of the question. The Irish Members themselves had enormous interests to look after in Ireland, and did not desire to come over to England; but there were strong and forcible reasons urged against their exclusion. Exclusion suggested to the mind of many people, though it was not a necessary consequence, the idea of separation; inclusion under the Bill absolutely prevents the separation of Ireland from England. There were two other ways of dealing with the subject. There was the partial retention of the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament, voting on certain subjects, and refraining from voting on others. That proposal had its advocates, and found a place in the Bill of the Government when it was first introduced. It had its advantages, because there was a view held among many people that it was unfair for the Irish to interfere in English affairs, when we were precluded from interfering in similar affairs in Ireland. I am aware that that feeling is shared by many people; but when you apply this solution to the question I think you will see that it is perfectly impossible as a practical measure. How was it possible to have a Government supported at one time by one body of men and at another by another body of men? You might divide the subjects into Imperial subjects and into local Irish subjects; but there would always be questions, such as Votes of Confidence, where it would be absolutely impossible to define what was to be done with the Irish Members. Take the question of the Budget, with the Resolutions and the Estimates, and the Appropriation Bill. On some subjects the Irish would take a part; on others they would be absent. This solution of the question was proved on examination to be impracticable. We gave it up; and we adopted what has been called the omnes omnia plan, which was to leave the Irish Members in for all purposes. There are two objections made to that; the one to which I have referred—namely, that it was unfair that the Irish Members should take part in the discussion of English subjects when we did not take part in the discussion of similar subjects in Ireland. There is a further objection—that it would encourage intrigue with the Irish Members. [Laughter and ironical cheers.] I expected that cheer; but we have this very difficulty at the present moment. It is not a new thing that politicians should intrigue, or, as it is called, coquette, with the Irish Party on critical Divisions. That is not unknown in politics, and this may be thrown in the teeth of both Parties in Parliament. The difficulty has existed, but it will exist with far less force when this Bill passes. I know that probably I shall not get the assent of noble Lords opposite or behind me to what I am now going to say; but if the Bill does what we expect, it will bring contentment to the Irish people. [Opposition laughter and ironical cheers.] I am quite aware of the feeling which that cheer indicates, but I am bound to state what I honestly believe. If that takes place, then there will be far less danger with regard to the Irish Members voting on all subjects than there is at the present moment. No doubt the objections to the Bill with which we are all familiar will be raised again in this House; and as I have been so intimately connected with the subject, and as I have so sincerely at heart the welfare and well-being of the Irish nation, I wish to state my views with regard to some of those objections. There is the question of separation. I have endeavoured to show that under this Bill separation will be impossible. Our opponents say that may be for the moment true; but if the Irish obtain the Bill they will agitate and plot to obtain separation from England. I utterly disbelieve in that theory. The Irish know very well that they could not obtain separation. They are not such fools as to forget the strong battalions which are under the command of Her Majesty's Government and of England. They are not such fools as to wish to go to the heavy cost of finding a Navy and an Army for themselves, which I need hardly say, would be indispensable to them if they obtained separation. They know that they could not obtain it; they know that England is powerful enough, and has always been powerful enough, to put down rebellion in Ireland, and they know that England would never consent to separation. I believe that they desire to remain under the flag of England, and that Irishmen are still proud to fight the battles of England, and to share the glory which has been gained in former wars by this country. I now come to another question—namely, the alleged danger of religious ascendancy and tyranny. It is feared that the Roman Catholics will oppress the Protestants in Ireland. As to this, I make the same remark that I made with regard to separation—I do not believe it for a moment. I do not believe that religious persecution and tyranny can exist in the present state of society, considering the force of public opinion in Ireland as well as in England. The Irish Roman Catholics have never shown distrust of Protestant leaders. Time after time they have followed such leaders with the utmost loyalty. I know that at times there have been stories of the persecution of Protestants in different parts of the country. There may be isolated cases of the sort, but I believe that these cases generally arise, not from religious feeling, but from other causes. The Irish people have, as your Lordships are aware, very strong feelings on various matters political and agrarian, and it may often happen that a Protestant takes a very strong view on some points of politics which is hostile to the views of, and therefore offends, his Catholic neighbours. If there is any disturbance in consequence it is clear that it cannot be assigned to religious differences. We often hear it said that the Irish Protestant is to be placed under the heel of Archbishop Walsh. In my opinion there is no ground for that statement. The Irish Bishops and priests have rarely, if ever, initiated any political movement in Ireland. They, no doubt, are carried with the current, and when a strong political current is flowing they swim with it; but as far as I know they have not themselves initiated any great topics of political controversy during the last few years. The Irish people will take a strong line of their own on all political matters. I could not give a better illustration of my meaning than the following:—When I was in Ireland His Holiness the Pope issued some pastoral or letter, desiring the Bishops and priests of Ireland to prevent their flocks from subscribing to the Parnell testimonial. What was the result? The subscriptions came in after that pronouncement with redoubled vigour until the sum of £35,000 was subscribed to the testimonial. There have been other instances of independence on the part of the Irish people. There is the case of Bishop O'Dwyer in Limerick, who for some reason found fault with an Irish Member. Immediately that Member—Mr. Dillon—called an indignation meeting, which was held under the very nose of the Bishop. There have been cases also when the Parnellite division of the Irish Party have held indignation meetings against the Archbishop of Cashel, because he was opposed to their views. Therefore I do not believe that there is any danger of the Irish people submitting in political matters to be guided and ruled by the Roman Catholic hierarchy or the priests of Ireland. Now, I wish to say two or three words respecting Ulster. I have great respect and admiration for the people of that Province. When I was in Ireland I had difficulties, great difficulties, to contend against in Ulster as well as in other parts of the country, but in dealing with these difficulties I became acquainted with many qualities which I greatly appreciated in the Ulster people. They are full of talent, independence, energy. With the exception of an occasional breaking out on a religious anniversary, they are orderly and law-abiding. I am aware that the people of Ulster view this Bill with great dislike, and oppose it most vigorously. They have been supported by many distinguished men. It has been said that "Ulster will fight, and Ulster will be right." Indeed, that has been the keynote of speech after speech in Ulster and in England. In my opinion, the fears of Ulster are quite groundless. I do not believe that the people of that Province will be subjected to hardship or oppression at the hands of the Nationalist Party, and I look forward to the day when the men of Ulster, with all their ability and power, will assist their brethren in the government of the country. Ulster is in a minority in Ireland. Of course, Ulstermen have a perfect right to oppose any measure which they dislike, and to demand safeguards for themselves, but have they the right, and ought they as a generous people to oppose what Parliament in its wisdom may direct as a change necessary for the welfare of the majority of their fellow-countrymen? I deny that they have a right to hold out in that way; and, knowing the generosity of the people of Ireland, I cannot but think that these appalling prognostications will come to nothing, and that, when Parliament has decided to pass a Home Rule measure, the men of Ulster will come forward willingly and take part in the government of their island. There is one more objection to this measure that I wish to notice. We are accused of handing over, or proposing to hand over, the government of Ireland to men of the worst possible character, to men who are sometimes called murderers,—[The Marquess of LONDONDERRY: Hear, hear!]—sometimes agitators, who have caused difficulties in Ireland. I was quite prepared for the cheers of the noble Marquess and other noble Lords opposite. I deny, however, that the men to whom I refer are correctly described by the terms which I have repeated. The Irish Party in Parliament are not murderers, and have been cleared over and over again in that respect. The Nationalist Party in the great struggle which they have been carrying on have done many things which I deplore, things which I had to oppose when I was in Ireland. I do not for a moment say that they have been justified in all they have done; far from it. They have been violent in their language; they have been silent when they ought to have spoken out; and I admit that they have been guilty of discreditable acts. But we are not proposing to hand over the government of Ireland to any particular set of men. What we are proposing to do is to rely on self-government, and we have confidence that the people of Ireland will select the right men to govern them in the future. I should like to mention one argument which ought, I think, to have weight with noble Lords opposite who have advocated Local Government for Ireland. The Government of the noble Marquess opposite introduced a measure for that purpose, and I would ask this—If we are committing such a heinous crime in giving the government of Ireland to the men who are likely to be selected by the Irish constituencies, were you not committing an equally heinous crime in proposing to give Local Government in counties and boroughs to the same class of men? I have always recollected a very remarkable statement with regard to Local Government which was made by Lord Salisbury at Newport some years ago. It is full of wisdom and bears upon the question whether it is better to give County Local Government to Ireland or Local Government of the kind now proposed by Her Majesty's Ministers. What did Lord Salisbury say? "The Local Authority is more exposed to temptation, and has more facility—" I am afraid I cannot read the rest. [The Marquess of SALISBURY: It is not worth reading.] At any rate, the argument is this—that it is safer to entrust a Government on a large scale with Representative Institutions than to frame a system of Local Government which will not be equally open to the influences of public opinion. Now, my Lords, I have made my statement and given the reasons which prompted the Government to introduce this measure. I am not sanguine enough to suppose that I have been able to carry with me any one of those who oppose the Bill. It would be absurd to conceal from myself the intention of the large Assembly whom I am addressing, for it has been announced for days, and weeks, and months that your Lordships intend to throw out the Bill. It would be in vain for me to appeal to your Lordships at the present time; but as I have been, through my family, intimately connected with your Lordships' House for many years, and by a personal membership of over 35 years, I may be allowed to speak on the subject of what I consider to be the interests of this Assembly. I implore your Lordships to pause before you reject this measure. I implore your Lordships to cast off all trace of that prejudice that surrounds to such a great extent this great subject. I implore your Lordships not rashly to follow the advice which has been given you so often. You have a great opportunity freely now of making a great concession to Ireland. The occasion is propitious; there is nothing but peace throughout the nations of the world; there is no turbulence in Ireland; you can now give freely and without pressure this great concession. My Lords, the Irish people have now hope instead of the despair they had before. They have hope from the decision which the constituencies gave at the last Election, hope from the measure passed recently in another place. Do not dash, my Lords, their hope to the ground. Hope encourages peace; despair engenders discontent and rebellion. My Lords, if you reject this measure, you will once more throw back the Irish people into despair. The responsibility for doing this will be a very heavy one, and I ask your Lordships to pause before you take upon you this heavy responsibility. If, on the other hand, you make this concession and pass this Bill, you will add to the lustre and honour belonging to your Lordships' House. You will once more give power to the Houses of Parliament; you will increase the influence of our country in every part of the world; you will, in my opinion, give contentment and good government to Ireland, and make her a source of strength instead of weakness to the Union. My Lords, I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Spencer.)

*THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: My Lords, I do not propose to follow my noble Friend in the disquisition, which occupied a large portion of his speech, on the history of Ireland during the present century. I failed to observe that that part of my noble Friend's speech bore any particular reference to the measure before the House. It was chiefly occupied with an account of the land legislation which had been too long delayed, of the Coercion Acts, and of the attempted creation of local self-government in Ireland. That historical disquisition might have been an appropriate introduction to a new Coercion Act, or to a new Land Act; but I think that my noble Friend forgot that part of his speech in which he proposed to connect his history with the present proposal of Her Majesty's Government. I will only say on that part of my noble Friend's speech that his review of the land legislation of Parliament as regards Ireland, and the evil effects which have resulted from the unhappy delays of that legislation, seem to me to be a somewhat singular introduction to a policy which as it was originally introduced, proposed to remove altogether the control of the land legislation from the new Irish Parliament, and was combined with a plan by which this Parliament, hitherto, according to my noble Friend, so unsuccessful in its efforts, was once more to resume the task of finally settling that Irish difficulty, and still more was it a singular introduction to the proposal which, as now laid before us, imposes a delay of, at least, three years on the Irish Parliament in doing anything on that particular subject which, according to my noble Friend, lies at the root of the whole difficulty. In these circumstances I can scarcely see what my noble Friend's object was in making the historical review he gave us. It would have been, in my opinion, satisfactory to many of your Lordships if my noble Friend had found a little more time to devote to the explanation, which struck me as a remarkably brief one, of the causes which have led him to the conviction that a change of policy has become necessary. My noble Friend had at one time very strong convictions on the subject. I do not want to read more quotations than I can help, but my noble Friend has expressed himself in terms of somewhat unusual strength upon the question of tampering with the Union. In 1881 my noble Friend said—

“ We have to consider the most difficult problem ever presented to any English statesman—namely, the future of Ireland. What we have to do is this. We have to tell the Irish that their just grievances will always be redressed, that we will extend to them any privilege or liberty we Englishmen possess ; but we must tell them plainly, at the same time, that no Party in England, whether Conservative or Liberal, will put up with anarchy, and, what is more, that they are beating the air if they agitate for the repeal of the Union. We feel like the Americans when the integrity of their country was threatened, and, if necessary, we must shed blood to maintain the strength and salvation of this country.”

[“ Hear, hear ! ”] I am glad to hear from the cheers of my noble Friends behind me that they are still ready to shed their blood for the Union. But my noble Friend told us what were the circumstances which in 1885 led him to the conviction that a change of policy towards Ireland was necessary. His own Government, from 1881 to 1885, had been a fairly successful one. He had himself done much to restore law and order in Ireland. My noble Friend was disappointed that he had not also succeeded in giving contentment to Ireland. He detected, or he thought he detected, a political intrigue between the Tory Party and the Irish Members, and he discovered that there was no continuity to be expected from the British Parliament in Irish policy. What was the proof of that? The Tory Government came in in 1885. They found a Coercion Act in force. That was a temporary Act. One would think, to hear the observations of my noble Friend, that the Conservative Party had found a permanent Coercion Act in force and had deliberately suspended its operation. Whatever may be my opinion of the policy or impolicy of the Tory Government at that time in undertaking to govern Ireland without the assistance of exceptional powers, it must be felt that they were justified in making the attempt to govern Ireland once more under the ordinary law, without the assistance of any exceptional repressive legislation. These simple facts—namely, discontent in Ireland, my noble Friend's detection of the supposed Tory intrigue, and the want of continuity which he discovered in British policy towards Ireland—were sufficient to make my noble Friend change the whole course of his policy, and be a party to the proposal of a measure which, although my noble Friend behind me does not seem to think his words bear that meaning, he had denounced in the strongest terms in 1881. Now, my Lords, I shall not detain you any further with the speech we have just listened to, though I may have to make some reference to it in my further observations. I desire, in the first place, to touch on a point which, I think, has not been referred to by my noble Friend. I want to call your Lordships' attention to the character of the decision you are called upon to give upon the present occasion. It is an important one, but it does not appear to me to be a decision which involves on your Lordships any heavy responsibility. Such cases have occurred before, and doubtless will occur again. The question has had to be solved and to be decided by this House whether your Lordships should make use of the Constitutional powers which you possess to reject measures which did not commend themselves to your own judgment, but which you had reason to believe were approved by the majority of the House of Commons and of the country. The question has had to be decided by your Lordships, each for himself, whether you should in your collective capacity as one branch of the Legislature act upon your individual convictions and opinions in opposition to what you believe and have ascertained to be the view of the House of Commons and of the country. I think that your Lordships know well the limits of your power. You know that not being a Representative Assembly, and not backed by the strength which a representative character gives to a Legislative Body, and not sharing altogether the democratic principles which are making progress in this as in other countries, it would be unwise, impolitic, and unpatriotic to insist upon your personal convictions by enforcing your own political convictions in opposition to what is believed to be the decided view of the country. Such was the case of the Reform Bill of 1832, and, I may say, also of later Reform Bills. Such was the repeal of the Corn Laws. Such was the case of the Irish Church Act. Such cases may recur, and it is not for me to say what it may be the duty of this House to do when a similar case occurs again. It may be that a measure may be in your Lordships' judgment so wrong, so impolitic, so unjust, and so mischievous that it may be your duty to resist it to the last at any risk, even at that of the loss of your own political privileges. But, my Lords, this is no such case. This is not a case in which you are called upon to refuse to read this Bill a second time, because you are opposed to the principle of it. If I could conceive the case of a majority of your Lordships being of an opinion favourable to the principle of this measure; if, as the Prime Minister thinks might be possible, a measure founded upon a similar principle had been introduced by a Conservative Government, I do not undertake to say what the conduct of this House might have been, but I, at all events, should be prepared to say the duty of this House would be the same. I maintain that on a question of such magnitude, so closely touching the fundamental Institutions of our State, if there is any object in the existence of a Second

Chamber at all, it is, at all events, to prevent changes of that character being made without the absolute certainty that they are in accordance with the will of the majority of the people. Now, as to that certainty, we have no knowledge, and we can have none. Look for one moment at the history of the measure. It has been preceded by no popular agitation such as preceded the passing of the Reform Act or the Repeal of the Corn Laws. Those measures had been for years before the country, and had been fully debated and discussed throughout the whole country. I admit the Irish Church Act was a different case. There the proposal of the measure had not been preceded by any lengthened or any excited agitation. But the whole of the Liberal Party, or almost the whole of the Liberal Party, had been long in principle committed to the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, and, as Mr. Gladstone has reminded us, the Disestablishment of the Irish Church Act was only proposed to your Lordships after it had formed the single issue submitted to the country at a General Election, and after the verdict of the country had been given in the most unmistakable terms. But in 1885 not only was no political Party committed to this policy, but I venture to say that not one elector in 10,000 was favourable to the principle of Home Rule. This is a policy which emanates from the brain and will of a single man. It is not a policy which has proceeded from a political Party; it is not a policy advocated by a political Party and then adopted by its Leaders. It is a policy which has been imposed upon his followers by the single will of one man. Now, so far as we can form any opinion at all, the presumption is against this policy being adopted deliberately by the country. It has never been accepted by the country when it has been placed as a definite issue before it. Its rejection by the House of Commons in 1886 was followed when the country had before it the proposals within the four corners of a Bill by a still more decisive rejection at the hands of the electors. Immediate after that time a determined attempt was made to concentrate the attention of the country on the Irish Question. Judging by their own conduct on the part of the gentlemen who sit upon the Government Bench, that effort was wholly unsuccessful.

ful, for it is within our knowledge that in the electoral campaign which was carried on from 1886 to 1892 the Home Rule policy was more and more withdrawn from the notice of the constituencies, and other measures which it was found commanded a larger measure of popular sympathy and support were put forward in its place. That policy was so successful that no human being can tell on what question the majority which put the present Government in power was returned. No doubt some electors voted for Home Rule, but it is quite certain that a larger number voted for Disestablishment, or Local Option, or for Parish Councils, or for changes in the incidence of taxation in towns, or for changes in the Labour Laws. Well, these tactics were successful in their immediate object, and enabled Her Majesty's Government to propose measures of great importance on these and various other subjects. But they have had this disadvantage—that it has been absolutely impossible to form any opinion as to what the real desire and wish of the people is upon this most vital question. We contend that it is a question large enough to justify us in refusing to pass this measure into law until that question is settled beyond the shadow of a doubt. I will ask your Lordships for a moment to contemplate the possibility of this Bill passing into law. Suppose that all or even some of the evils we anticipate come to pass; suppose the people, irritated by the recurrence of the Irish difficulty after this final effort, were at the next General Election to return a strong Unionist, anti-Irish majority to Parliament, I ask your Lordships to consider what would be the position of the new Irish Parliament and the new Irish Government in such circumstances? Entering upon their new duties confronted by a hostile Government and a hostile Parliamentary majority in Great Britain, it is easy to see the risks of danger that would result. Consider what, in that case, would be the responsibility of your Lordships' House. You would be told that you had had the power to prevent these evils; that you had the power to impose an interval during which the true will and desire of the people might be ascertained, but that you had failed to use this opportunity. In vain you would plead that you had acted as we are told we ought to act; in vain you would plead you had acted on the assumption that the vote of the House of Commons was conclusive. Those who now denounce you for attempting to withstand the judgment of the popular Assembly would then be the first to denounce, with more justice, this Assembly as an utterly useless and inefficient Body incapable of averting even the consequences of a mistaken estimate of the opinion of the country. I will go one step further. I maintain that this policy is of sufficient gravity to make it imperative that not the principle of self-government for Ireland alone should be definitely accepted by the country, but also the form in which it is to be conceded, and the provisions by which this principle is to be carried into effect should also undoubtedly receive the popular approval. Here I think, my Lords, we stand on still firmer ground. Not even those who contend that the last Election was conclusive as to the opinion of the country on the principle of Home Rule will contend that its form or provisions were within the cognisance or knowledge of the country. This form and these provisions are in this case the very essence of the question in the contention of the promoters of the measure themselves. If it were a question of granting independence to Ireland or of restoring the Irish Parliament of 1792, those would be simple issues upon which the judgment of the country as represented in Parliament might be deemed conclusive. But we have been told all along that Irish independence is inadmissible; that the restoration of the Parliament of 1792 is impracticable; and that the granting of Home Rule to Ireland, desirable as it may be, is one which should only be conceded on certain conditions; those conditions being, that the supremacy of Parliament shall be maintained; that sufficient authority shall be reserved to Parliament to safeguard all Imperial interests; that adequate protection is secured for the minority; that an equitable financial arrangement between the two countries shall be devised; and, lastly, that there shall be some security that the settlement is final. When this measure is proposed only conditionally; when, also, the form, structure, and provisions of the measure have been avowedly concealed from the country up to the time of the General Election, how can it be possible to contend that the country has given its decision on the measure, the form of which is now shown to be only less essential than the principle itself. I shall be told that the House of Commons approved of this Bill, and that the General Election gave to the House of Commons the necessary mandate and authority to work out the organic details of the measure. I traverse that argument at every step. For reasons which I have stated, I deny that the House of Commons received any mandate upon Home Rule at all at the last Election; and I say, further, if there were a mandate it was a conditional mandate, and that the conditions were not within the knowledge of the country. Before this measure is passed into law we have a right to demand that the judgment of the country shall be given, not upon a cry, not upon an aspiration, not upon an impatient impulse, but upon a completed work; and that this measure, the result of the collective wisdom of the Government and Parliament, shall be submitted to the country for its approval, aye or no. Then, lastly, I say the conditions under which the House of Commons considered this measure have made it impossible for us to have any knowledge that the deliberate judgment of the House of Commons is represented in the matter. Everyone has known from the moment that this measure saw the light that it would never be passed into law, and never could be passed into law. Members have debated and voted on this question, knowing well that it was not a question of practical politics. Under these circumstances, many of them thought that it was not worth while to incur unpopularity with their Party or a portion of their constituents. Many of them knew that they had not been elected to discuss and vote upon the provision of Home Rule, but on some more popular question, such as Welsh Disestablishment or changes in the Liquor Laws. Under those circumstances, knowing that their vote would bear no immediate fruit and have no immediate effect, they were indifferent to the principles to which they might be committing themselves; and so, with some few and honourable exceptions, they have voted with their Party. But I deny that the votes of the House of Commons given under such circumstances imply any certainty on our part that those votes represent the judgment of the House of Commons. As to the means by which this Bill has been forced through the House of Commons, I have been attacked in another place for saying that I should ask this House to reject the Bill because three-fourths of it had not been debated at all by the House of Commons. I have been told that the House of Lords has no right to dictate to the House of Commons as to the mode of their procedure. I claim no such right for this House. But what I do claim for this House is the liberty to regulate our proceedings by the knowledge we possess of the procedure which has taken place in the other House. We are accustomed here to receive measures which have been not only voted upon but debated in the other Chamber; and we are entitled to take note of the fact that three-fourths of this measure have never been discussed at all in the other House. That is a fact which we are not only entitled to note for the guidance of our own proceedings, but also to call to the notice of the country in case any controversy should hereafter arise between us and the other House. We are told that a change of Forms in the House of Commons has been rendered necessary by obstruction. If we are to be debarred from cognisance or criticism of the procedure of the other House, what do we know about obstruction? We have before us officially the Journals of the House of Commons. From those Journals we can ascertain that three-fourths of the Bill have been put without Debate, and that among these parts of the Bill are some clauses which were not in the Bill when it was introduced. Some of those clauses have never been read a second time. And some of those clauses relate to financial matters, which, by the practice of our Constitution, we are not allowed to discuss if we are allowed to discuss. With this knowledge before us we are entitled to say that we should decline to pass a Bill so presented even if only of minor and secondary importance; and much more, therefore, we must decline to accept measures so presented that are of primary and paramount importance. If there has been obstruction—and I am not going into that question—on whom ought the blame to rest? On those who have been guilty of any violation of the Rules or the ordinary procedure of the House.

of Commons. But in this case the consequences of our acceptance of an undiscussed measure would fall not upon those who have been guilty of the offence—if an offence has been committed—but upon British and Irish subjects whose interests are disposed of without discussion. Under those circumstances, we are entitled to say that this measure, which we cannot know to have directly received the approval of the country, has not, from the consideration which it has received from the House of Commons, given us the assurance that it had indirectly that approval through the Representatives of the people in Parliament. I think I have said almost enough to justify the Motion which I shall make, even if this House did not proceed to enter upon any discussion whatever of the provisions of the Bill. The Motion which I make is not founded solely upon the objection which we may individually entertain to the principle and character of the Bill, but it is also founded on the fact that it is a change of too large and vital a description to make it right that it should be passed into law without greater knowledge and certainty of the real judgment of the people upon it. But in view of the controversy which may, some time or other, take place between the two Houses on this question, I trust that before you vote on this Bill, my Lords, it will receive at your hands, not necessarily a minute, but, at any rate, a broad and general consideration. I can only attempt to-night to refer to one or two of the main principles of the Bill. My first assertion is that those who are responsible for the Bill have not taken the trouble to consider some of the most fundamental characteristics of our Constitution, or how they would be affected by the Bill. From their speeches in support of the Bill, it appears that they recognise no distinction between the Government of the British Empire and the Government of the United Kingdom. They see no difference between the expressions "Unity of the United Kingdom" and "Unity of the Empire." In the United Kingdom, Parliament is supreme not only in its legislative but in its Executive functions. Parliament makes and unmakes our Ministries; it revises their actions. Ministries may make peace and war, but they do so at pain of instant dismissal by Parliament from Office, and in affairs of internal administration the power of Parliament is equally direct. It can dismiss a Ministry if it is too extravagant, or too economical; it can dismiss a Ministry because its government is too stringent or too lax. It does actually and practically, in every way, directly govern England, Scotland, and Ireland. Parliament can decide, and Parliament only can decide, whether Ireland should be governed under a Crimes Act under Mr. Balfour, or under the ordinary law administered by Mr. Sexton or Mr. Healy. That is the nature of the Government and the supremacy of Parliament in the United Kingdom; it is the direct government of these Islands by Parliament through a Committee. As for the British Empire it is altogether different. Over the whole of the British Empire, including our self-governing Colonies, Parliament remains nominally and Constitutionally supreme. So long as a Colony desires to retain its connection with Great Britain it has to be content to have no foreign policy; it has to share our risks in that respect, while it receives the advantages of our protection. As regards the internal affairs of our self-governing Colonies, the supremacy of Parliament and the direct control of Parliament has become nothing but a name. Parliament has no doubt the Constitutional right to make laws for a Colony, to repeal or to veto Colonial Acts, to direct the Governor to impose a certain policy upon his Minister, to dismiss a Ministry or summon others, and to exercise every other act of sovereignty; but this power is only nominal; and no British Government would propose—no Parliament could support Government in proposing—to exercise any real control over the Acts of internal government on the part of a Colonial Parliament. Which of these two systems is the system at which we are aiming in this policy? When the Government speak of this measure sometimes as one preserving the unity of the United Kingdom, and sometimes the unity of the British Empire, are we to read those terms in the sense in which they are now applied to the United Kingdom, or only as they are now applied to the British Empire? On this point we get no light from the speeches of the Government, and not much from the pages of this Bill. It is somewhat remarkable that in the first speech I can find on this subject by the Prime Minister when he was preparing for the introduction of this policy (it is one of his Scottish speeches, delivered in the Autumn of 1885), in the course of the same sentence the right hon. Gentleman appears to use these terms in the two different senses.

"We are all," he says, "every man, woman, and child among us, convinced that it is the will of Providence that these Islands should be bound together in a United Kingdom."

When he says that I presume he is referring to the maintenance of the Governing Authority of the United Kingdom; but the right hon. Gentleman goes on to say—

"From one end of Great Britain to the other I trust that there will not be a single Representative returned to Parliament who for one moment would listen to any proposition tending to impair, visibly and sensibly to impair, the unity of the Empire."

The unity of the Empire, as I have endeavoured to show, would not be impaired if Ireland were made a Colony tomorrow. In the same speech the right hon. Gentleman says—

"I take it for granted that any demand that is made from Ireland will be a demand which sets out upon that basis, that the unity of the Empire is not to be compromised or put in jeopardy. If it did not set out upon that basis we should know how to deal with it."

He is again speaking of unity in the sense of the united Empire, and not in the sense of the Government of the United Kingdom. In the right hon. Gentleman's speech on the introduction of the Bill of 1886 this passage occurs—

"A supreme statutory authority of the Imperial Parliament over Great Britain, Scotland, and Ireland as one United Kingdom was established by the Act of Union. That supreme statutory authority it is not asked, so far as I am aware, and certainly it is not intended, to impair."

That appears to point to the maintenance of the authority of Parliament over every part of the United Kingdom, including Ireland, to the same degree and extent as it now exists. It appears to me to be a question of the most absolute importance that we should know clearly in which of these two senses we are to understand the intentions of the framers of the Bill, and unless we do we are debating these questions at cross purposes; until we know in what sense this Bill has been framed, whether any direct control of Parliament is to be retained over the internal affairs of Ireland, or whether Ireland is to become a self-governing Colony, it is impossible that the people of this country can discuss with any profit or intelligence the provisions of this Bill. It has sometimes occurred to me that we may be open to the charge that when we reject every suggestion which is made, every plan proposed for giving Home Rule to Ireland, we are seeking to prove too much, to prove that it is impossible for us to do what has been done by other countries and by our own country. I believe that in other countries it has been perfectly possible to delegate legislative powers to subordinate Assemblies, but I maintain that this has never been done, and I believe never can be done under such a system of government as ours. Here the Executive power, not alone the legislative power, is wielded by a popular Assembly, and here the legislative and Executive powers are combined. If our Parliament were like the Congress of the United States, if our Central Government possessed the power possessed by the President of the United States or by the Emperor of Austria-Hungary, there would be no difficulty in delegating some legislative or Executive powers to an inferior legislative or Executive authority. We have done this in our own dominions. We have tried two experiments. Parliament directly governs our Indian Empire. In India we have established a Government where the Executive is so distinct from the legislative power, where it is so strongly organised, that it is a simple and easy matter for Parliament to delegate considerable legislative powers to the Legislative Council, and vast executive powers to officials in various stations. But the supreme authority of Parliament over Indian legislation is not in the slightest degree impaired, nor, though the powers of Governors of Presidencies and Commissioners of Provinces are vast and enormous, has the Central Authority the smallest difficulty in governing, and through the Government in Parliament controlling the whole tendency of policy in India. We have tried an experiment of exactly the opposite character in our use

Colonies. There we have established Governments modelled on the form and structure of our own; and, while we retain a certain control over their external policy, we have absolutely abandoned the assumption of exercising any control whatever in their internal policy. Well, so it seems to me must it be in the case of Ireland. This is no prophecy. It seems to me to be the logical consequence of the causes which have produced in our self-governing Colonies practical independence; and those causes will, if you apply them, as you are seeking to do, to Ireland, produce the same consequences. What I desire to know is whether you will give your approval to a policy of Home Rule which would mean that you intend that the future of Ireland shall be as independent of the authority of Parliament as are the Colonies of Canada and Australia. My noble Friend referred to the fact that troops would remain in Ireland, and would remain under the control of the British Government. No doubt that points to a means by which we should still retain some control over the internal policy of the Irish Government. I admit that the presence of your troops in Ireland gives you the power, if sufficient cause arises, to destroy or take back the government which you are creating; but I deny that the presence of troops in Ireland gives you any power to govern Ireland constitutionally. Under the Bill the old system is gone. The Chief Secretary is gone. The Departments now under the Chief Secretary will be manned by officials who are the servants of the Irish Government with which you are supposed to be at issue. How will the troops enable you to govern Ireland under the old system or under the new system? You may issue your orders to the Lord Lieutenant to impose a certain policy on his Ministers, to direct them to retrace the steps which they have taken, or to do something which they are not disposed to do. You may direct your Lord Lieutenant to dismiss his Ministers, and may impose your policy upon him. The presence of the troops will not compel the Irish Parliament to vote Supplies by which the Irish Government may be carried on under this measure. How will it be possible, short of an emergency which would justify putting an end to the existence of this government, which with so much trouble you are creating, to influence or guide its conduct on any point which falls short of that absolute necessity? I have spoken in general terms, but I would like to give one or two instances to show the practical necessity of retaining some greater control than is provided by this Bill over the conduct and policy of the Executive Government which you are going to create in Ireland. These instances will also give Her Majesty's Ministers, if they think fit to make use of it, the opportunity of showing where in the Bill the Irish Parliament is prevented from doing what I am about to suggest. I will not give any extreme cases, but only a couple of cases that it will be admitted are not unlikely to occur. The existence of religious differences in Ireland is not denied. One effect of these religious differences is that the conduct of the Education Department is watched with a very jealous eye by Irishmen. That fact is recognised in the Bill, for you insert a clause the intention of which is to provide that the Irish Parliament may not deal with what is known as the Conscience Clause. But it is not in the least necessary, if it is the desire of any Irish Parliament, to resort to legislation in order to get rid of the Conscience Clause. The efficacy of the Conscience Clause entirely depends on its administration. The Irish Education Department, like every other Department, would be under the control of the Irish Executive. Supposing instructions are given to that Department, and by it to its Inspectors, not to insist on the strict or conscientious observance of the Conscience Clause, but on the contrary to allow the Conscience Clause to lapse, what will be the remedy for such a state of things? Would not such an order as effectually convert the education of Ireland into a denominational system as any repeal of the Conscience Clause by Act of Parliament? I want to hear from some Member of Her Majesty's Government what remedy he proposes to apply under this Bill if the Irish Government should openly, deliberately, and avowedly adopt the policy of directing the non-enforcement of the Conscience Clause. I will take another instance—one of still greater importance—which is extremely likely to arise. The Land Question is one that excites the acutest difference of opinion. Differences between the Irish Nationalist Members and the majority of Parliament up to the present time on the Irish Land Question have been notorious. The views of the Irish Members generally on the subject of rent differ considerably from those which have been entertained by the majority in both Houses of Parliament. Their views on rent vary on the part of different Members, from a total denial of the right and justice of rent at all to proposals for the indiscriminate reduction of rent. In view of that state of facts you propose to suspend the power of legislation on land for three years. That is not a very long time, and it would be interesting to know whether we are to infer from this suspension that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to legislate on the Land Question in the interval. From what fell from my noble Friend just now, I gathered that he thinks that the Irish Land Question is already sufficiently settled. But the question of legislation is not my present point. Legislation is not necessary to enable the Irish Government by an administrative act to virtually effect an agrarian revolution. We know, we ought to know, for we have been told often enough in the other House, that the payment of rent in Ireland can only be enforced by the power of the Government to carry out evictions. The duty, or perhaps, as they may consider, the hateful burden of enforcing the payment of rent by eviction will, after the passing of the Bill, devolve upon the Irish Government, every Member of which has already to some extent pledged himself against the principle. Is it an unreasonable or unlikely anticipation that, without attempting to legislate upon land at all, the Irish Government may, by an Executive Act, decline to use the Executive power at their command to enforce evictions or take any steps whatever to enforce the payment of rent? Or is it not still more probable that they may propose some discriminating conditions which have never received the sanction either of this Legislature or their own. The question I would ask Her Majesty's Government is—Where in this Bill is the provision that would enable Parliament, if proceedings such as these are adopted, to pronounce an opinion or take effective action with regard to the supposed action of the Irish Government. I have referred to the Irish Land Question as part of my argument that I am endeavouring to prove that some greater power of control on the part of Parliament over the Executive action of the Irish Government is required. I have another word to say on this subject of a more general character. We have been reminded by my noble Friend that it was proposed in 1886 to deal concurrently with the question of land and the question of government, and the obligation of the Government to deal concurrently with these subjects was stated in the strongest terms. That intention has been departed from. My noble Friend who moved the Second Reading of this Bill, speaking at Newcastle in 1886, said—

“Everybody knows that there have been many feuds in Ireland—old animosities which cannot be expected to die out at once. Foremost among these is the Land Question. The whole force of Irish agitation at one time was against the Irish landlords. That animosity was bitter and strong. I do not for a moment think it would be just and honest in the British Parliament to leave unprotected and uncared for the landlords of Ireland. We have at different times curtailed their rights by Acts of Parliament, and I think it would be a mean and treacherous thing at this moment if we did not defend what we consider their just interests. But I should like to say this in addition—that I believe it would be most unfair on the new Irish Assembly to leave this question of the land unsettled.”

We have heard to-night the explanation of the change of policy of the Government by my noble Friend. Since 1886 the Ashbourne Act has been extended and the Act of 1891 has been passed. Does my noble Friend intend to convey that in his opinion those two Acts are a final settlement of the Irish Land Question? It is perfectly well known that the amount provided in both these Acts is entirely inadequate to effect the transference of more than a fraction of the land of Ireland from the landlord to the occupiers. Nor is it entirely a matter of the amount which may be sufficient to effect such a transference. The landlord may be perfectly willing to sell, but the tenant, especially under existing circumstances, with the prospect of this Bill passing, may not be willing to buy. What protection is it to the Irish landlord that he is willing to sell or that the Government is willing to advance the money, if he cannot prevail on his tenantry, acting on the advice of their leaders, to buy? Does my noble Friend for one single moment mean to attempt to persuade the House that the existence of the Act referred to places the Irish landlords in a position of such security that it is safe now to do what in 1886 he said it would be "a mean and treacherous thing to do"—namely, not to defend what he considers the just interests of the landlords. I freely admit the right of everyone among us to change our opinions upon any question of policy or expediency; it is a more serious thing to change our opinion and our action on a question which has been admitted to be one of duty and of honour. Whatever may be my opinion of the expediency or policy of the course which has recommended itself to Her Majesty's Government, I cannot think that my noble Friend has given any adequate consideration to the obligations of duty and of honour which he and his Colleagues undertook in 1886, when he puts forward the useful, but tentative and incomplete measure of 1891 as relieving him of the obligations to the Irish landlords which he acknowledged in 1886. On that point I cannot refrain from saying a word upon some other extraordinary denials, and I think I may say evasions, of former declarations—denials and evasions to which we have been accustomed in connection with this measure. I have adverted to one which is inexplicable to me in relation to the Land Question, but that is not the only one. The Prime Minister said at Edinburgh in 1885 that it would be unsafe to deal with the Irish problem unless the Liberal Party were in a majority independent of the assistance of the Irish Members. That declaration was made with the usual adjuncts, and the Edinburgh audience were assured that this warning was given seriously and solemnly. It was not given once but twice. Though I have had the honour of having had correspondence with the Prime Minister on the subject, there is one further extract which I did not use then, and which puts the matter in a more concise shape than we are accustomed to get from the Prime Minister—

"I have said everywhere that I trust you will return a Liberal Party able to sway the destinies of the country in the coming Parliament, because, especially taking into view those necessities that may arise in connection with the government of the Sister Island, nothing, I think, could be more dangerous to the public weal than that they should be handled in a Parliament where there was no party strong enough to direct its action according to its judgment and conscience, without being liable to be seduced from the right path by the temptation which might be offered to it by the vote of the Irish Members. But that, I understand, is the summit of the hopes of the Tory Party in this Election; not that they may obtain such a national verdict as will enable them, possessing the confidence of Parliament as a whole, to direct their course, but that they may obtain such an amount of strength in a minority as, with the assistance of a large Irish contingent, may be made into a majority. Gentlemen, I must say—I am entitled, I think, to say—that is not a state of things which we could accept as a Party. But I may go further and say it is not a state of things that would be safe or honourable to the country."

I took the liberty on some occasion or other to refer to those statements. The attention of the Prime Minister was called to my remarks, and he informed his correspondent that my reference was inaccurate. I sent him passages, not the one I have read, but longer ones from former speeches, and I obtained the following explanation:—

"You have converted a statement growing out of a particular position of Parties and affairs under my view at the time into a general principle applicable to all positions of Parties and affairs."

Now, I think that those denials, and I may almost say evasions, constitute an unfortunate incident of our public life. They are, it seems to me, calculated to diminish the weight and authority of declarations which are made by responsible men. I ask this House whether any declaration on a certain point could be made in terms broader and wider and clearer than those I have read. Whenever in future we have to deal with similar declarations on similar important points, it will become necessary for us, before attaching the smallest consequence to them as a guide to future conduct and action, to pause and consider "what is the particular position of parties and affairs" which is in the view of the speaker at the time. There is another instance to which I may allude. The Prime Minister, speaking at Liverpool—I do not recollect the date—said he would not be a party to Irish Members voting and speaking on English and Scotch affairs when they had their own Parliament to manage their own affairs. The Prime Minister has not denied the accuracy of the quotation ; but he has given an interpretation of it. I doubt whether that interpretation is a satisfactory one. As I gather, the explanation is that he would not be a party to forcing such an arrangement on unwilling Englishmen and Scotchmen ; but that, as I understand, is the very thing the Prime Minister has done. I believe that in the Division which took place on the retention of the Irish Members for all purposes, the Government only carried the change by the assistance of the Irish Members. If that is not forcing this arrangement upon unwilling Scotland and England, I do not know what interpretation to place upon the words. I have endeavoured to give you one or two instances in which it seems to me to be absolutely necessary that some greater control should be conferred on Parliament to control the acts of the Irish Executive. But it is unnecessary to refer to hypothetical cases. I think we ought to know what is the attitude of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the representations of the minority in Ireland. Do they believe that every class but one lives in dread of this Bill ? Do they believe that these fears are insincere or unfounded ? Or do they believe that they are sincere and well-founded, but yet do not care, and are willing to take the risk. I will put the landlords on one side for a moment. I do not suppose anyone will doubt that the landlords have reason to dread this Bill. As to the Protestants, I should like to ask any Member of this House—I would not appeal only to the Protestant Members, I would appeal to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies himself (the Marquess of Ripon)—whether he would like the alternative of being ruled by a Government under the orders of the Irish hierarchy, or the alternative of being ruled by a Government elected by a Party returned under the influence of Irish-American Fenians, dynamiters, and moonlighters ? My noble Friend who spoke before me says he does not believe that the Protestants have anything to fear. Of that I apprehend that they may be better judges than my noble Friend. Then what are we to say to the apprehensions of the merchants, the men of business in Ireland ? What is the attitude of the Government towards them ? If the Government are right and these men are wrong, they have more to gain from this measure than any other class in Ireland. If the Government are right, and this is a measure which is going to bring contentment and prosperity to Ireland, it is these men who have most to gain. Do the Government suppose that these men are fools ? Do they think that they are altogether ignorant of the conditions, political, or otherwise, under which they can safely and successfully conduct their business ? My noble Friend himself cannot profess to think that he knows more about the buying of flax or selling of linen than the Belfast manufacturer, and does he suppose that these men, avowedly shrewd men of business, who attained their present position by their common sense, their shrewdness, and their ability, are absolutely incompetent to form an estimate of the political conditions under which they now carry on, or in future are to carry on, their trade. These classes—landlords, Protestants, merchants, manufacturers, professional men, men of business—all tell you, without exception, that they have confidence in and rely upon the justice and the power of the Imperial Parliament. Can you show to them within the four corners of this Bill a means by which the Imperial Parliament will in future be able to exercise any power whatever for their protection ? If you can show them that, notwithstanding the granting of local autonomy to Ireland, you do reserve power in the hands of the British Parliament to protect minorities against injustice, oppression, and wrong, then I do not say you remove altogether the distrust of your Bill, but you will go a long way towards removing the feeling of absolute dread and apprehension which now pervades the minority in Ireland. But for one reason it is to me a subject for wonder why Her Majesty's Government should have adopted this particular mode of extending self-government to Ireland, when what seems a better and an easier way lay before them. My noble Friend said something this evening about local self-government, but, unfortunately, he was stopped in the middle of his quotation, in which he said he was going to prove that the noble Marquess (Lord Salisbury) expressed an opinion that the extension of local self-government to Ireland would be much worse than Home Rule. It is a very curious fact that the Government of the noble Marquess introduced a Local Government Bill, but it appears to me that a better and safer and easier way might have been found within the lines of an extension of local self-government. All our institutions hitherto have been gradual in their growth, and never has there been wholly absent from them, even in Ireland, the germ of local self-government. In very recent times we have seen an enormous development of the principles of local self-government. In our County Councils and in our County Borough Councils we have seen great and powerful bodies created possessing now very considerable executive and administrative powers. No one can say even now how far this principle may be yet capable of extension; but to whatever extent it may grow, in the course of its growth it destroys nothing, it takes no power away from our Central Government or from our Imperial Parliament. It grows side by side with our Parliamentary institutions. It is like the case of the action of a father who, as his sons grow up and show more and more capacity for business, entrusts a larger and larger share of the management of his affairs to them; or like the case of an employer who, as his business increases and he feels less inclined to devote himself to details, delegates constantly to managers and subordinates a larger amount of power and responsibility. But the course you prefer resembles that of a father who is compelled by his son to sign during his lifetime a bond assigning a considerable proportion of his income and an appreciable amount of control, whether, with or against his will, in the management of his affairs; or like the conduct of the subordinate managers of a firm who insist upon their employer converting his business into a limited liability company, and appointing all of them co-directors with equal power and authority to himself. The reason for this course of conduct on the part of the Government is not far to seek. No proposal to extend local self-government in Ireland would have purchased votes. In an evil and unhappy day the Irish Party accepted at the hands of Mr. Parnell the principle of Irish nationality; and in still more evil day, without consulting his followers, the Leader of the Liberal Party committed the great bulk of his own Party to the same principle. The votes which were then bargained for are now to be had at no lower price, and this appears to me to constitute the only explanation why the Government did not make an honest attempt to solve the Irish difficulty by the extension to Ireland of the measures which had been found effectual in England and Scotland. I will say nothing upon the subject of finance, partly because I feel I am very imperfectly acquainted with it, and partly because it seems to me not especially fit to be discussed in your House. Neither have I said anything as to Ulster, though Ulster is one of the minorities I have referred to. It is said that Ulster is prepared to resist this measure by force if it passes into law; but I do not desire to say anything upon that. I should prefer that your decision should be based upon your own judgment. All threats of violence on one side or the other should be left out of consideration. All I would venture to say is that the attitude of Ulster is such as to be a subject of the utmost gravity, though the responsibility for the position there is perhaps to be borne more by the Government than by your Lordships. The attitude of Ulster is one of the utmost gravity, and a vast responsibility rests upon those who ignore it, and treat as vague and idle the protests and the solemn declarations of men who have never yet given us reason to believe that they do not mean what they say. I will not detain you any longer as to the principles and details of this Bill. The Prime Minister, in the last speech he made on this subject, summed up the other day what he took to be the Unionist views of the case. There was some element of exaggeration, some distortion, some touch of caricature in the right hon. Gentleman's recital of the pleas which the Unionist Party urged against this measure, but on the whole it was not very far wide of the mark. This is his enumeration of our pleas. "It will separate the people." We do say that in our judgment the bitterness of religious animosity in Ireland will not be lessened, but exaggerated by leaving the people to fight out their differences without the controlling power of an authority which, however correct it may have erred in other respects, has in recent times, at any rate on the religious question, endeavoured to do strict and impartial justice. Mr. Gladstone says our next plea is that the Bill will destroy the Constitution. This is an exaggeration of our plea. We do not say it will destroy our Constitution; we do say it will introduce into it innovations which are opposed to its spirit and principle. "It will break up the Empire." That is a misstatement of our contention. We say it will break up the United Kingdom, and relegate Ireland to the position of a self-governing Colony. "It will annihilate financial control." That is a question which I have not touched upon, and shall not touch upon to-night. "It will make an Irish delegation supreme in our affairs." That is a plea by which we abide in its entirety. "It will lead to the virtual slavery of the minority." That, again, is the language of exaggeration. "Lastly, the controversies within the walls of Parliament will become worse instead of better." We fully believe in and adopt that plea. The work in this Bill is only half done. This measure will deprive the minority of political power to which their position and their character fully entitles them; but this minority will not have been silenced, for you have taken care that the loyal minority—the minority to which you have been accustomed to appeal in your times of difficulty and danger—shall still be heard, if not in Ireland, at least here. You have done your best to transform those who were your friends into your bitterest foes, but you have still left them a foothold in this Parliament and arms with which they can fight the battle here in which they are disarmed at home. Under those circumstances the controversy which has too often disturbed our Parliamentary discussion between Englishmen and Irishmen will in all probability be renewed with greater bitterness and intensity after this measure has been passed into law. We have been accused of freely indulging in prophecy. I do not know which of us has claimed that gift, but no doubt statesmanship does consist in the gift of foreseeing, so far as our imperfect faculties will admit, the consequences of certain acts and certain policies. Principles may be important; details may be essential; but what the statesman has to look at are the probable results. We have, as the Prime Minister thinks, a distorted vision of the measure. You also have your visions. We think we see not only the evils and horrors which will result from this Bill, but we have a vision of a happier Ireland under other conditions. Our vision, I admit, is not clothed in any radiant colours, but we see the prospect of a continuous growth in the material prosperity of Ireland which has marked the history of the country in recent years—a growth of material prosperity which we believe was never more rapid than at the time when it received an unfortunate check last year. We believe that contentment and order will in the end follow in the steps of material prosperity. If we have the distorted vision of the facts of your policy which the Prime Minister describes, we are entitled to think that your Utopia is still more wild and improbable than ours. They see in the future visions of order, but it is order evolved out of the deliberations in Committee Room No. 15. They see the increase of material prosperity, but it is a material prosperity unaided by capital, which is already leaving the shores of Ireland. They see a vision of justice for Ireland, but it is justice which has been learned in the Courts of the Land League. Prophecy is as necessary to commend their scheme as it is to condemn it. We believe that the picture we draw is drawn on truer lines and in more faithful colours than their picture, which is so much the work of the imagination. They must acknowledge, at all events, that their remedy is a critical and a capital one. If it does not succeed one of the patients surely dies, while the other must be left sorely afflicted almost unto death. Believing that it is "better to endure the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of," we elect—and we hope that the people will support us in electing—to abide by the Union of the United Kingdom, which we believe was decreed by Nature, and to which laws and treaties have only given a written sanction and record. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the motion ("this day six months.")—(The Duke of Devonshire.)

*THE MARQUESS of ZETLAND said, that he had listened with the greatest possible admiration to the noble Duke who had moved the rejection of this Bill, and he could not but feel it to be somewhat presumptuous on the part of so humble a Member of their Lordships' House to reply to those arguments which had been used with so much eloquence and power. He had listened with the greatest possible interest to the speech of the noble Lord who had introduced the Bill. It was not his intention to follow the noble Lord over the very wide area he traversed, but he would confine his remarks to the Bill which had been introduced into this House, and he confessed that he had searched, and searched in vain, for any convincing arguments for such a change as would take place if this measure were passed into law. If he might venture to make an allusion to the speech of so great a statesman as the Prime Minister of England he would say that in his opinion a strong argument had been adduced in favour of Home Rule in the speech in which Mr. Gladstone introduced his Bill in 1886, but it was useless to compare the state of things then to the state of things in 1891. He was willing to admit that in 1886 the condition of Ireland was such as would disgrace any civilised nation of the world; that the government of Ireland by this country had been tried and failed, and it was absolutely necessary that something should be done; and on this ground was founded the proposal for Home Rule. But many things had been done since 1886 by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Balfour). Crime in the country had diminished to such an extent that they had been enabled to hand over the country to their successors in a state of comparative peace and contentment, and much in the same condition as Scotland is now and has been for many years. As an illustration of the suppression of crime, it appears that when Her Majesty's Government realised the state of affairs they found they could conscientiously suspend those safeguards which they thought it desirable to retain for the purpose of protecting those living and acting in the country and give greater freedom to the criminal classes of Ireland than they had hitherto had. He had pointed out that the crime of the country diminished almost to its normal condition, and measures were taken for the development of the resources of the country and encouraging the industries of the people. They had every reason to believe that the prosperity of the country had increased, and he had been informed by those residing on their estates in the worst parts of the country that a slow but sure change for the better came over every class. He said, under those circumstances, not a vestige of argument remained that the government of Ireland by this country was impossible. He had searched for any sound and solid argument in support of what was called the protection of the loyal minority, and he had seen none. He had searched for any sound or solid argument for the protection of those servants of the Crown, who had been doing their duty, and I have found none. Then, coming to the new administration in Ireland, he would not detain them with the future formation of the Lower House of Parliament, but it was proposed that there should be two Houses of Legislature of Ireland—that the one should be a safeguard of the other. Looking at the formation of the Upper House, they found it was to be elective, and Members were to be elected by persons paying a rent of £20 and upwards. Now that had been tried before, and failed. Their Lordships were well aware what a farce trial by jury became at a certain time in Ireland. The qualification to serve on a jury was a £20 valuation, and he believed he was correct in saying that a jury under those qualifications was unfit to perform their duty, and ultimately the qualification had to be raised, and it was now £40 in the country and £10 in the town. He believed he was correct in saying that in the rural districts the persons with the £20 or £30 qualification were the very persons who suffered most from intimidation at the hands of the National League of Ireland. Many of them had been compelled to join it, and he said instead of being a safeguard, the Upper House would rather add emphasis to the deliberations of the Lower. Under those circumstances he asked what they proposed to do with those faithful servants to the Crown who had done their duty so well in the past? To begin with there was the Civil Service of Ireland, the Imperial servants of the Crown, they had claims which had been derived from long custom, and they had in many cases given up other occupations, in order to make the Service their occupation for life, and having arrived at the time of superannuation they might justly expect to receive in the future that which they had had in the past, compensation for the services rendered to the country. What was the state of affairs under this Bill, the newly-created Government of Ireland would have entire control over those individuals. He believed he was correct in saying that after five years it would rest entirely between the Treasury and the newly-created Government in Ireland whether they will be permitted to retire at any time during the five years, and if so they would receive but small compensation should they be forced to serve five years, and should they at the end of five years be permitted to retire, they would be placed in a similar position. If they should not retire, then they would be at the mercy of the Administration, who would have the power to make whatever terms they pleased. He confessed it seemed to him that that looked like a breach of faith. The remarks which he had made with regard to the Civil servants applied to the other persons; everybody knew what this country owed to the Royal Irish Constabulary, who performed their duty in an exemplary manner. He had himself had much experience during his Viceroyalty, and he felt himself in a position to say that no force at any time or in any country more thoroughly enjoyed the respect or admiration of the law-abiding citizens of the country. He believed their sympathies were with the people, and when the country was destroyed by the potato famine the Royal Irish Constabulary contributed no less a sum than £1,300 for the relief of their fellow countrymen. Not only that, but they gave us their services free of charge, and it was owing to their aid that we were able to bring about a scheme to combat the potato famine in the land. Then their Lordships must consider that these men have in many cases arrived at a time of life when it will be impossible to embark in a fresh career, and they have insured their lives under the impression that they will not be disturbed, and he considered they were treated in a most shameful manner. He understood the noble Lord to say other employment might be found, and he supposed he (Lord Spencer) liked to think there may be other employment found for the Civil servants. But that was not the case here. There were some who believed that something like a political millennium would take place on the passing of the Bill, but it was not likely. They must look to the probable rather than to the possible consequences of the Bill. It was possible that some of those individuals that he (Lord Zetland) had referred to would consent to serve under the future Government, but he confessed to him it was extremely improbable. He could not but characterise the proposals of the Government as being experimental, and in their character revolutionary and unjust. He was not expressing his own opinion only when he said he objected to the principles of a measure which would tend to the severance of the Legislative Union of the two countries. This was not a measure of finality. It was a natural question to ask by whom was this legislation required. He might take it it was not the landlords. It had been amply demonstrated by the public at large; it had been amply shown by the large demonstrations in the North of Ireland, where all the wealth, capital, and commercial enterprise of the country was to be found, that the proposals of Her Majesty's Government were not wanted. Those demonstrations had not been confined to the North of Ireland. Demonstrations of a similar character had been held in Dublin and in the South. Nor had these demonstrations been confined to the Protestants. And similar demonstrations have been held where the delegates have been elected by the people, and resolutions have been carried with the same unanimity. In this great City they had witnessed a scene which they would never forget: when the delegates were sent to this country to free them from this measure which would bring destruction on their country and ruin on themselves. As regarded the feeling in Ireland, he had himself travelled largely about the country and endeavoured to make himself acquainted with the wants and wishes and requirements of the people, and during his travels he had received innumerable petitions and addresses and he had never on any single occasion received a petition or an address or heard a speech delivered containing anything which could by any possibility be taken as meaning anything derogatory to the Crown. He knew the chief troubles of Ireland were the effect of the political agitator who poisoned the ears of the people. He had seen in County Clare an instance of intimidation at the house of a farmer. He interviewed the man, and saw a hole in the window made by a bullet, which, though meant for him (the farmer), had passed through the heart of his young daughter. There were three brothers in the house, and yet not a single scrap of evidence was forthcoming as to the murder. They might talk of the doings of tyrants and dictators in bygone ages, but never in the world's history had cruelty, tyranny, or intimidation been brought to such a pitch as it had been by the organisation which was set on foot by those individuals whose past offences the Government were now prepared to condone, and in whom they now professed to feel such confidence that they are about to entrust to them the destinies of the country. The Government were now prepared to throw over and destroy all that in the past had been faithful and loyal and true in Ireland in order to hand over the government to these men who had done all they could to make the government of the country an impossibility, and who had never on any occasion done anything whatever to ameliorate the condition of the people. Such a state of things as this might well be described as passing the wit of man to understand. It is positively certain that the capital and all that makes a country prosperous and happy will take itself elsewhere; as a natural concurrence the manhood of the country, which is dependent on capital for its livelihood, will also leave. It was not his (Lord Zetland's) intention to say how Irish labour would be received in English markets, but he would ask, under the circumstances, how Her Majesty's Government proposed to continue the Government in Ireland? It seemed to him the taxes would be increased. The English taxpayer would inevitably be called upon to aid a people impoverished by the results of legislation sought to be placed on the Statute Book by an unholy alliance between law-breakers and the remnant of the once great Liberal Party. He rejoiced that the measure had come before their Lordships for consideration, and he believed the course they would take upon it would be sanctioned by the public at large. He was entirely unable to understand what liberty would be conferred on Ireland by the proposals of the Government, unless, indeed, it be the sham liberty of the Land Leaguer, the robber, and the assassin; and he was totally at a loss to know what justice there could be in proposals to hand over to law-breakers of the past the future care of the lives, limbs, and property of that loyal minority in Ireland whose lives, limbs, and property both Parties had in the past been equally anxious to preserve.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT said, as a constant resident in Ireland, they in Dublin and its neighbourhood looked upon the Bill with dread impossible to describe. He spoke on behalf, not only of the Dublin tradesmen and merchants and others, but all the artisans and labourers in the district. They all looked upon the advent of the Bill as a blight which would stop all improvements and all industries in Ireland. Tradesmen had told him that the shadow of the Bill ruined trade, and that in Dublin there was nothing going on. A Cork tradesman, giving his opinion on the subject, said there was not a man in the country with £20 in his pocket who wanted the Bill. If this Bill passed, which they hoped it would not, all improvements such as the light railways would come to an end, because it was quite impossible that such projects could be carried on by the finances of Ireland without the aid of Great Britain. He failed to see how Ireland was to prosper, and the people of Ireland were beginning to find out that under Home Rule the country would not prosper. The more they realised that the only effect of the Bill would be to increase the burden of their taxation the more were they inclined to oppose it. Trinity College had spoken pretty plainly on the subject. Mr. Gladstone brought in an Education Bill for Ireland under which he proposed to obliterate the Chairs of Philosophy and History. Naturally that did not suit the intelligence of the country and the Bill was thrown out. The Dublin people and others are becoming more and more convinced that this Bill would result in national bankruptcy.

*LORD BRASSEY said, he should give his heartiest support to the principles on which the Bill was founded, but he would not pledge himself to support all its details. The Bill embodied the only available plan for dealing with the Irish Question. They might have governed Ireland by coercion. They had the power to do so if they had thought fit. Speaking at Portsmouth, Mr. Parnell said—

"It is impossible for 3,000,000 of Irishmen to contend against 2,000,000 of other Irishmen and the tens of millions of the United Kingdom."

Later in the same address Mr. Parnell gave the reasons why coercion was impossible—

"You can," he said, "silence us in Ireland, but you will have to accompany our silence in Ireland by our silence in the House of Commons."

In other words, they must disfranchise Ireland. English statesmen had shrunk from that alternative. The Act of 1884, unchallenged by the Conservative Party, added more than 500,000 votes to the electorate of Ireland; it was an addition of 200 per cent. The results were immediately seen; out of 102 Members returned for Ireland 86 were Home Rulers. That was a national pronouncement which no Liberal Leader could venture to disregard. They had dealt with the grievance of religious inequality. They had dealt with the Land Question in a succession of measures strongly opposed, but which had been found by experience satisfactory in their operation. There were other grievances, which as yet they had not attempted to remove. The time had now come to deal with the grievance known as the Castle system. Its operation was described by Mr. Chamberlain at Islington on June 17, 1885, perhaps with some exaggeration, in an eloquent passage—

"I do not believe that the great majority of Englishmen have the slightest conception of the system under which this free nation attempts to rule a sister country. It is a system founded on the bayonets of 30,000 soldiers, encamped permanently as in a hostile country. It is a system as completely centralised and bureaucratic as that with which Russia governs Poland. An Irishman at this moment cannot move a step, he cannot lift a finger, in any parochial, municipal, or educational work, without being confronted, interfered with, controlled by an English official appointed by a foreign Government."

He said, with Mr. Chamberlain, the time had come to substitute for that system an Irish Parliament for purely Irish business. It was no sufficient answer to the complaints of the Irish people that they have had in Parliament a Court of Appeal at which they might at all times command a hearing. The Irish Nationalists had been represented. They had been over-represented. But the Irish Members had sat side by side with more than 500 British Members. What was the problem for which Parliament was called upon to provide a solution? It could not be more clearly stated than by Mr. Charles Stuart Parker in his Life of Sir Robert Peel—

"The sphinx of history," he says, "is once more putting the question, yet unsolved. With organised agitation, and with an overwhelming voting power of tenant farmers (such as existed in the Irish counties before 1829 and exists again since 1884), how shall Irish popular demands be reconciled with 'securities,' no longer for a Protestant Established Church (for that, as Sir Robert Peel foresaw, is gone), but for the Legislative Union (which he thought might also go), for enforcement of the civil rights of landlords, for individual liberty of action, and generally for good government, as understood by the majority of the United Kingdom."

Two attempts had been made by Mr. Gladstone to give Local Government to Ireland. Each of his Bills had been an embodiment of the same principle. In both they had a Legislature created for purely local affairs, more limited as to its sphere of action than Grattan's Parliament, but having the power of appointing its own Executive. It was contended that no Executive which could be appointed by an Irish Parliament would be fit to be entrusted with the responsibility of government. The objection to an Irish Executive rested upon a deep distrust of the Irish character. It could not be denied that there had been much lawlessness and disaffection in Ireland; but let them ask themselves whether that regrettable state of things had not been created by poverty and acts of misgovernment. Was it not true, as Mr. Bright once said, that "everything can be made of an Irishman in every country but his own"? That cautious and profound statesman, Sir Cornwall Lewis, made a just estimate of the political capacity of Irishmen—

"Before I went to Ireland," he said, "I had very strong opinions as to the influence of race on the Irish character. But when I came to look at things more closely and to see all the demoralising influences to which they have been, and are, subjected, I asked myself whether a people of Germanic race would have turned out much better; and I really could not answer in the affirmative. . . . Ceteris paribus, I would sooner have a German than a Celt, and a Protestant than a Catholic; but I have no doubt that a peasantry of Catholic Celts may be so governed and placed under such moral influences as to be peaceable, industrious, and contented."

While declining to take a pessimist view of the political capacity of Irishmen, he desired that the changes contemplated should be made with prudence, and, as Mr. Parnell was contented to allow, by gradual stages. Failure need not be anticipated, but they should be prepared for every contingency. Under the Bill it was proposed that the whole administration of the Local Government should be supervised by the Lord Lieutenant, advising with the local Executive, but subject to instructions from the Imperial Cabinet. Imperial unity and control would be preserved by the Irish Peers in this House and by representation in the House of Commons. Two Irish Exchequer Judges were to be appointed under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom. It would be no infringement of the principle of the Bill to retain the appointment to a large number of the higher judicial offices. Under the Bill it was proposed to maintain the fine force of Royal Irish Constabulary for a period of six years. It was certainly not desirable that it should be disbanded until the peace of Ireland was thoroughly assured under the Local Government. The Constabulary might be maintained as a gendarmerie, forming part of the Regular Army, and paid out of the Army Estimates. That was one of the many wise recommendations of the Devon Commission, on which no action had been taken. Turning to Clause 9, under the original Bill of 1886 the Irish Members were not retained in the Imperial Parliament. Their position had been reconsidered in deference to a general wish. If retained, the Irish Members must sit in Parliament for ever and a day. The in-and-out plan was impracticable. The anomalous situation would be considered mitigated if the Parliamentary representation of Ireland were reduced to a proportion like the proportion of its contribution to the Imperial Revenue.

If this were done, the Irish Members would be about 35 in a total of 670. Such a representation would be quite sufficient to sustain the unity of government and the Imperial supremacy of Parliament. It would probably be more beneficial to Ireland than the present excess of Members, while giving the Irish Party less power than they at present possessed to set up or to overthrow Ministries. The Land Question was the most difficult of all the questions with which the Government had to deal in Ireland. It was not touched upon in the present Bill. It was said, and said truly, by Aristotle, the father of political science, "The protection of property is the principal care of statesmen, it being the question on which all revolutions depend." Every Royal Commission had recommended a large conversion of the Irish occupiers into owners, with the assistance of the State. The principle had been accepted by statesmen on both sides. It was obvious that the policy of land purchase could only be carried through by agreement on the part of responsible statesmen on both sides. Not only in relation to land, but in regard to the whole of the complex and difficult Irish Question, was it not true that until some general agreement was obtained on the leading principles it was impossible that the work of legislation could be completed? The late Government, although strongly opposed to Mr. Gladstone's proposals in 1886, did not hesitate to proceed on similar lines when they came into Office. They began with an expenditure of £10,000,000 under the Ashbourne Acts. They made a further proposal to raise £33,000,000 for the same purpose. The principle of State-aided land purchase having once been adopted we must go on to the end. That was the opinion of the Lord Chancellor. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, addressing the Eighty Club in 1889, said—

"I think it would be poor kindness to the Irish Legislature to leave them the task of dealing with the Land Question."

It was only by agreement on both sides that such an arrangement could be adopted, and until such an agreement had been arrived at it would be impossible that our legislation in regard to Ireland could take a final shape. When the principles had been fixed the task of framing a measure could be entrusted, as it was suggested by Lord Rosebery in a speech delivered at Northwich. He suggested when the general principles had been fixed a Royal Commission should be appointed consisting of some of their most distinguished lawyers and permanent Civil servants of the Crown, to whom should be entrusted the framing of the measure in all its details. However protracted the delay, if the policy now proposed should in the end prove successful, nothing could deprive Mr. Gladstone of the credit which was his due for his services to Ireland. In conclusion, let it be remembered that, in dealing with Ireland, Parliament had to deal not only with the inhabitants of an island of limited extent, but with the far larger numbers of Irish descent, who were settled in the United States and the Colonies, and whose hostility was the source of political difficulties, only to be removed by a policy of conciliation. All experience, whether in Europe or in our own Colonies, was in favour of the policy. It was idle to talk of separation, and to argue that Ireland, under limited self-government, could be used as a base for hostile operations. With all the armed force and every military position in the Imperial Government's hands, with its fleets filling Irish harbours, how could Ireland lift up a finger? Separation was not desired by Irishmen themselves. They were not so unintelligent that they should fail to see the advantages to their country of being joined to and protected by a powerful Empire of great resources. It was the hope, it was the confidence of the Government, that when their new plan had been established there would be no desire for separation, but rather that the Union of the Empire would be cemented by indissoluble bonds of common interests and reciprocal regard. He desired to give a hearty general support to the Bill now before the House.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK said, the noble Lord who had just down had comforted himself for having supported the Bill by putting forward the many Amendments he proposed to move if the Bill reached the Committee stage. He congratulated the noble Lord that he would not be called upon to carry into practical effect the promise which he had given the House. They all knew what was to be the fate of this measure, but he did not intend to trouble them again with the arguments which were well known. The title of the Bill itself—it was entitled a Bill for the Better Government of Ireland—showed what it was. It was promoted for the purpose of putting power into the hands of a political Party who lost no opportunity of showing how unfit they were of undertaking the responsibility. It put the power in the hands of two opposing factions. One of the factions had no means or will to reconcile its opponents, and no power to bind the hostile factions into one people. To the Protestants of Ireland the power would be wielded by those they felt they could not trust, to the Catholics of Ireland it dangled before them the dangerous temptations of power that could only be grasped by an unholy alliance condemned by the Church, and whose Leaders had openly defied the Decrees of the Holy See. It came in such a shape that showed that capital and enterprise were already leaving, and on leaving the House of Commons the very last words said about it were words of protest from those whom it was supposed to benefit against the Financial Clauses, and that was why it was not so much as the last word, but rather that it was a second contest that would take place in Ireland, because it had this Bill for foundation and encouragement in the action which brought the Bill about.* That was one of the reasons which made them feel how futile were the hopes of those who looked for relief from this measure. He did not wish to take up too much time, but he thought there were two instances he would bring to their minds. One was the feeling that 'the Bill was to be amended, and so bring to an end the struggle and agitation which had gone on so long; and the other feeling that England ought to expiate her acts of evil government and repent; and, therefore, this Act was an Act of tardy reparation and justice. Surely they could not admit for a moment that this Bill was the price and badge of victory of the Union. The noble Earl who moved the Second Reading assured the House that the Irish would not be so foolish as to let the agitation further, because they knew that separation was hopeless, and that the Bill were the Armies of Ireland.

That was a very strange way of introducing this olive branch. There might be among the Home Rule Party some who understood well enough that there might be a question between separation or civil war, and those who had found in the past that agitation paid so well might get up an agitation for its own sake without really thinking of the bribes they dangled before their dupes. The point need not be discussed whether they intended to go on from demand to demand, though they had given their own assurance that that was their intention, without even paying their Lordships' House the compliment of waiting to see how they were going to dispose of this measure. At a meeting at Dublin on the 9th of August, Mr. Redmond stated that such a measure of Home Rule could not be regarded as final and satisfactory by the Irish people. Noble Lords opposite might say that represented the views of merely a fraction of the Irish people; but it showed to what sort of people the administration of the government of Ireland was to be entrusted. At another meeting, on the 2nd August, Mr. Healy criticised the attitude of the Parnellite Party, and said that the Home Rule measure must be regarded as a compromise—that people must not suppose that in this world they could get everything they wanted at once, and that they ought to know that a compromise must be accepted in this matter and be glad to accept this Bill. Mr. Healy went on to say that the Irish people could not expect, after 700 years of slavery, everything they deserved in one day or in one year. He said they must be content with laying one stone upon another, laying a good foundation, and trusting that by-and-bye somebody would put on the roof; that they must proceed quietly and certainly with their work, and in that spirit, animated by those views and supported by their countrymen, they proposed to proceed to the end. He could hardly understand the contemptuous indifference to the feelings of the Gladstonian Party in England, which must have been present to Mr. Healy's mind when he made that audacious statement. It meant that the Irish Party were using that Bill as a foundation on which to build up an edifice from which to attack us. It meant that the Federative would be on the floor of the House of Commons, turning out Government after Government for the purpose of forcing them to listen to Irish demands for fear of offending the Irish Representatives. He need not dwell further upon the absurdity of this measure being looked upon as final. He did not deny that there had been much of evil in the past in the government of Ireland which we had to make amends for; but the remedy was not, having taken from them all power of managing their own affairs and having sapped and undermined their strength, to give them this pretended boon at a time when it was sure to be used only by one Party against another in that unhappy country. He well knew what the Roman Catholic Church had suffered in Ireland, but he held the conviction that the Church in Ireland could look with trust and confidence to the Government of this united country to meet every fair and just demand and to right anything which might be wrong. Much might also be achieved by a steady policy in the direction of developing the resources of the country. No one could deny that during the few years that the late Government were in Office they showed a practical determination in this direction. The alliance of the Irish Nationalists with the Gladstonians was much to be condemned; and all must feel that such a union was a disgraceful chapter in the public history of our country. What answer should be given to that disgraceful episode in public policy? Their Lordships were helping to shape that answer by the course they intended to take on this Bill. It was for their Lordships to give the nation time to reflect on what it was doing, time to take care that this did not become an accepted policy, and in order to see whether the people were really prepared to follow Leaders in such a disgraceful use of power. The throwing out of this Bill by a large majority would make the people of this country pause and consider that in the Constitutional safeguards with which the wisdom of our forefathers had provided us we might look for, perhaps, a slow but a wise and general unfolding for the everlasting good of the people, and that this would be better than the fads of statesmen who, seeking to gratify their personal ambition, put the nation and the Empire in the jeopardy in which it had stood of late. He trusted that their Lordships would, by a large majority, throw out the Bill.

LORD MUSKERRY said, when he had the honour of addressing their Lordships in February last he told them he had been for nearly 18 years a constant resident in Ireland. He merely reminded them of this to show their Lordships he had a practical knowledge of the subject he was speaking about. To his mind, this Home Rule Bill showed on the part of those responsible for it either a criminal disregard for the welfare of the country and its inhabitants, or an utter ignorance of Ireland and the Irish, together with a childlike trust and belief in the representations of the Irish so-called National Party. A few years ago there had been three Parties in Ireland—Conservatives, Liberals, and those who now called themselves Nationalists—the latter Party hating, or professing to hate, England and all things English, except English money—that they did not hate. At the present time there were three Parties—Loyalists, Nationalists (with their feelings towards England unchanged), and a third Party, and a very large Party—he meant those who were content with and appreciated the Rule they were living under, with its safeguards to life and property, and who dreaded the results that they knew would follow Home Rule. But these people were afraid to give their real views—afraid of the National Party as represented in every district and small village in Ireland by those who had everything to gain and nothing to lose, by those who were too idle to work, and who kept the honest and industrious man in terror for his property—aye, and for his life—should he venture to disagree with them. Now, what were the grounds for giving Ireland Home Rule? The wish of the majority? Well, nearly everyone who had any stake in the country—merchants, traders, professional men, and landowners—were utterly against it. And were the majority in favour of it? He said the National Members in Parliament did not represent the majority, as they claimed, for, as he had said before, a large number of the people of Ireland were afraid to show their real feelings. The Ballot, he assured their Lordships, was very little protection in Ireland. “Ireland, a nation!” That was the great toast of the National Party—“Ireland, a nation!”

The Duke of Norfolk

If Ireland was a nation she had a right to the following: The right to choose her own form of Government, and to say whether it should be a Monarchy or a Republic; the right to separate from Great Britain now or at any other time; the right to her own Army and Navy and foreign policy; and the right to absolutely control her own trade and taxation. If they granted Home Rule on the ground of her being a nation they could not refuse separation hereafter if it were demanded. As to Ireland's nationality, he would quote Mr. Gladstone (as reported in The Daily News, June 26, 1886)—

“Are you aware—probably many of you are—that of the population of Ireland by far the greater number are of British descent?”

Now as to the commercial progress of Ireland under the present rule: In 1852 the Revenue of Ireland was £4,500,000; in 1885 it was £8,000,000, an increase of 77 per cent. In 1852 the tonnage of shipping entering Irish ports was 5,000,000; in 1885 it was 13,000,000, an increase of 160 per cent. In 1852 the Excise Duties of Ireland were £1,500,000; in 1885 they had grown to £4,500,000, an increase of 200 per cent. In 1849 the amount in the Savings Banks of Ireland was £1,200,000; and in 1887 it was £5,340,000, an increase of 340 per cent. In the Post Office Savings Banks (being the popular banks with poorer depositors) the amount in 1870 was only £583,165; in 1888 it had grown to £3,128,000, an increase of 450 per cent. in 18 years. Surely that showed progress, and that the present mode of government was doing good to the country. They could rule Ireland if they would—she only wanted a strong and resolute Government in order to be prosperous and happy. At Aberdeen, in 1871, Mr. Gladstone said—and let their Lordships remember that since then many Acts had been passed, such as the Land Act, Arrears Act, Franchise Act, Relief Act—all to please the Nationalists—the right hon. Gentleman said—

“I have looked in vain for the setting forth of any practical scheme of policy which the Imperial Parliament is not equal to deal with, and which is to be brought about by Home Rule. . . . There is nothing Ireland has asked, and which this country and this Parliament have refused. This Parliament has done for Ireland what it would have scrupled to do for England and for Scotland. . . . What are the inequalities of England and Ireland? I declare that I know none, except that there are certain taxes still remaining which are levied over Englishmen and Scotchmen, and which are not levied over Irishmen; and, likewise, that there are certain purposes for which public money is freely and largely given in Ireland, and for which it is not given in England or Scotland."

And now, to show their Lordships the state of Ireland before the Union, under a Home Rule Parliament, he would read an extract from the speech of Lord Clare, the then Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Advocating the Union, the noble and learned Lord said (on the 10th February, 1800)—

"I will now appeal to every dispassionate man who hears me whether I have in anything misstated or exaggerated the calamitous situation of my country, or the coalition of vice and folly which has long undermined her happiness, and at this hour loudly threatens her existence. It is gravely inculcated, I know—'Let the British Minister leave us to ourselves, and we are very well as we are.' 'We are very well as we are.' Gracious God! of what materials must the heart of that man be composed, who knows the state of the country, and will coldly tell us 'we are very well as we are?' 'We are very well as we are.' We have not three years of redemption from bankruptcy or intolerable taxation, nor one hour's security against the renewal of exterminating civil war. 'We are very well as we are.' Look to your Statute Book—Session after Session have you been compelled to enact laws of unexampled rigour and novelty to repress the horrible excesses of the mass of your people; and the fury of murder and pillage and desolation have so outrun all legislative exertion that you have been at length driven to the hard necessity of breaking down the pale of the Municipal Law, and putting your country under the ban of military government; and in every little circle of dignity and independence we hear whispers of discontent at the temperate discretion with which it is administered. 'We are very well as we are.' Look to the old revolutionary Government of the Irish Union, and the modern revolutionary Government of the Irish Consulate, canvassing the dregs of that rebel democracy for a renewal of popular ferment and outrage to overcome the deliberations of Parliament. 'We are very well as we are.' Look to your civil and religious dissensions—look to the fury of political faction, and the torrents of human blood that stain the face of your country, and of what material is that man composed who will not listen with patience and goodwill to any proposition that can be made to him for composing the distractions, and healing the wounds, and alienating the miseries of this devoted nation? 'We are very well as we are.' Look to your finances, and, I repeat, you have not redemption for three years from public bankruptcy, or a burden of taxation which will sink every gentleman of property in the country. . . . We raise a Revenue of more than £230,000 on British goods imported into Ireland; and in return the Revenue raised by England on the importation of Irish produce is little more than £10,000. And what are the offerings of gratitude and duty on our part in return for these benefits and advantages? A declaration of war by any Foreign Power against the British nation is the signal for faction and rebellion in Ireland. The received maxim is, not to forego the opportunity of foreign war to press forward Irish claims, and ripen every difference and discontent with the British Government into a ground of permanent and rancorous national hostility; insomuch that, in time of difficulty and danger, Great Britain, so far from deriving support or security from her connection with Ireland, feels it as a millstone hung upon her neck. . . . Another argument against a Legislative Union is, that it will drive your nobility and gentry from their own country, and practically impoverish the Metropolis. With respect to emigration, look to the number of Irish emigrants who now crowd every village in Great Britain, and have been driven to seek an asylum there from the brutal fury of the Irish people and the cold-blooded treachery of their own domestics, palpably fomented and encouraged by Irish faction and Irish treason. And let any dispassionate man say whether the evil of emigration can ever be greater than it is at this day. If we are to live in a perpetual storm here; if it is to remain at the discretion of every adventurer, of feeble and ostentatious talents, ungoverned by a particle of judgment or discretion, to dress up fictitious grievances for popular delusion, and let loose a savage and barbarous people upon the property and respect of the Irish nation—what gentleman who has the means of living out of this country will be induced to remain in it?"

In that passage their Lordships had a picture of Ireland before the Union. No one could say it was a pleasing one. Were they going to throw her back into the same condition? Many wise and able men had built up and consolidated this great Empire year by year, and reign after reign. Were their Lordships going to be the first to commence the process of dismemberment and destruction? Let them remember that the men at whose instance this most unpatriotic measure had been brought forward had made no secret—when out of England—of their hatred for, and their wish to injure, England. He saw noble Lords opposite who had been Her Majesty's Viceroys in Ireland. One of them, at least, must well know the sentiments expressed as to England by many of the present Nationalist Members of Parliament. The noble Lords have had a very short stay in Ireland—as, he regretted to say, had been the custom with most Viceroys since the time of Queen Elizabeth—for their Lordships would know that Sir Walter Raleigh, in his history, said—

"Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years, whence, by reason of the shortness of their time, many of them have returned as wise as they went out; others have profited more; and yet, when they began but to know the first rudiments of war and government fitting the country, they have been called home, and new apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that estate."

But even that short stay ought to have shown noble Lords sufficient to prevent them supporting this Bill. Or were Party interests to be supreme before Ireland's good—before the safety and welfare of England and the Empire? This Bill was to destroy the Union of England and Ireland. Pass it, and who could say what would be the next tie they would be asked to sever? They dared not pass it! No one who had any regard for his country could entertain the thought of doing so. And as for Ireland, if, as Churchmen said, they were responsible hereafter for deeds done on this earth, already a heavy reckoning lay with those at the head of the Government for crimes committed and blood spilled during the past few years. He implored their Lordships not to let the crime of passing this Bill be added—for crime it would be, and a cowardly crime; for besides the immense injury to all Ireland, they would thereby forsake and desert those who had always been their loyal and faithful friends, and had trusted in the honour of the British Government. The most charitable way to account for this Bill ever seeing the light was to think of its author or authors suffering from aberration of the intellect! No Government had any right, either for Party purposes or to satisfy the outcry of sedition, to plunge a whole country in ruin; and he told their Lordships—and, as they need not to be reminded, he knew the country well—that as certainly as they granted Home Rule to Ireland so surely would arise the same condition of things that Lord Clare had described in his speech 93 years ago.

EARL COWPER said, the Bill had been so thoroughly discussed that it was rather difficult to find new arguments or to touch upon points which had not been touched upon before. Following the great Debate which had lately taken place in the other House, their Lordships, no doubt, felt rather bewildered, and were rather in the position of men who could not see the wood because of the trees; but their Lordships in that House, from the fact of their removal from the ordinary strife of politics and from their elevated position—from being, as it were, set up in a balloon—could take a clearer view. It struck him that those who advocated this measure had never succeeded in establishing the fundamental point which ought to be the base of their whole argument—that there was a real demand in Ireland for Home Rule for its own sake. He knew it had been adopted there by a large Party, but that was under peculiar circumstances. He would not go back as far as the Union; he would take a point within the recollection of those who were middle-aged or oldish people. He would take the Fenian movement, with which the noble Earl on the Front Bench the Leader of the House had so successfully grappled, in 1865, and would ask whether that movement had anything in the world to do with Home Rule—whether it did not, in fact, aim at the foundation of an Irish Republic? Was it not the fact that, till Mr. Parnell took up Home Rule in combination with other things, it was never made a cry at all? It was by working on the very natural wish of the Irish farmers to pay as little rent as possible that Mr. Parnell and his friends were enabled to get such a hold of the Irish people, assisted and reinforced by the Fenian Clubs that still existed throughout the country. No wonder, then, that when Mr. Gladstone adopted Home Rule in 1886 he found a large—nay, an overwhelming—body of Irishmen in its favour. He maintained that there was no evidence to show that there was ever such a longing on the part of the Irish people for a Parliament to manage their own affairs as there was among the Hungarians or in the Spanish Provinces. On the contrary, he said the genius of the Irish people was not in favour of, and did not induce them to have any great wish for, Local Government to manage their own affairs. It was a nation fond of centralisation. This was the mark of a nation either in its infancy or its decadence. The Land League was one of the most despotic authorities that ever existed. That organisation showed the genius of the Irish people. It was not in the nature of the Irish people to wish for a Parliament to manage their own local affairs, though it was in their nature to wish to be an independent nation. No one had seriously maintained that a Parliament in Dublin would be able to do more for the Irish people than the Parliament at Westminster, which for many years past had shown a sincere desire to remedy every practical grievance experienced in Ireland and more so every day. The argument for a Parliament in Dublin was not that it would be more than a Parliament in Westminster, but that they would be meeting the wishes of the Irish people by giving it; and as he maintained that it was not really the wish of the Irish people, that argument fell to the ground. Nobody would ever make him believe, nor was there any evidence to show, that the Conservative Government ever contemplated bringing forward anything in the nature of Home Rule, or anything which would satisfy the demands of the Irish Nationalists. He could quite understand Lord Spencer being convinced that there would be the greatest difficulty in putting down Irish disaffection; but it had been shown that much could be done by firm government without a single innocent man suffering in the slightest degree. Their Lordships knew that at the end of the six years of the late Government the policy which they had pursued was not really unpopular in Ireland. It was impossible to say that the small majority obtained by the present Government from the whole of the United Kingdom was got together by disgust at so-called coercion. That small majority could be accounted for by the promises made to the agricultural labourer and to various others. In most cases when a measure was brought forward there were strong reasons for as well as against it; and what their Lordships had to do was to weigh the advantages against the disadvantages. But he honestly believed that in this case the advantages were almost none, and that there were serious disadvantages and serious evils to be apprehended from the Bill which, in the opinion even of those who proposed it, could not be denied. In the first place, it could not be denied that to a certain degree the Executive of this country would be weakened in time of difficulty. Surely, if we were engaged in a death struggle with any Foreign Power it must weaken us. These Islands were made by Nature to belong to one another;

and, therefore, they ought not to have two different Parliaments and two different Executives. One of the reasons why Mr. Pitt promoted the Union was that the power of these countries might be consolidated, and that they might be able to present a united front to the enemy. What would be our position if night after night Resolutions were passed in an Irish Legislature declaring against the Sister Country and in favour of an opponent—France or America, or any other Power? Was it not merely possible, but extremely likely, that the Irish majority might be in favour of our enemies and against ourselves? And how could we stop it? What would be our position if there were Debates in a Parliament in Dublin against the Mother Country and in favour of our opponents? If Ireland were disaffected, how much more difficult would our position be made in face of an enemy! Now, at any rate, we had a splendid force of Constabulary in Ireland, and a population of 1,500,000 or 2,000,000 who, whatever might have been the case 100 years ago, were now thoroughly loyal. If we abandoned them and gave them over into the hands of their enemies, was it possible that they would not have bitter feelings against us? It was not in human nature that they would not. He would not enlarge on the shame of abandoning those people. Government by majority was perhaps the best; but when there were two Parties strongly divided from one another, and one was considerably larger, it was quite in the nature of things that the smaller would be oppressed. It was impossible to say that this Bill had been sent up to their Lordships after thorough discussion in the other House. They knew that only about a fourth of it had been discussed, and that the rest was passed without any discussion whatever. The Closure had been compared to the guillotine; but the guillotine was a neat, beautiful, well-acting instrument, which was a great deal too good to be compared to the clumsy process, which was more like the clumsy process of beheading which used to take place in former days, by which the victim was horribly mangled before he was despatched. What was the opinion of the people of England regarding this measure? Even at the last Election there was no demonstration in its favour, and the people had not been consulted on many of its most important provisions. They had not been consulted, for instance, in regard to the retention of the Irish Members. On the contrary, they were led to expect that the Irish Members would be retained only for Imperial purposes, but their retention for all purposes had never been before the country at all. Then there was the question of Imperial control. On every Gladstonian platform in the country it had been said that there was to be such and such control. That part of the Bill had been shown up, and no one could say that the Imperial control now proposed was of much good. He was convinced, as he thought were most of their Lordships, that if the people were to give an opinion now they would give it against the Bill. In every free country of the civilised world there was some check in order to prevent any fundamental change in the Constitution. We were not accustomed to look to foreign countries for any lesson in Parliamentary Government, because we thought that we knew very much more about it; but if a gigantic alteration like this was to be made in a single Session, by the aid of the Closure, without adequate discussion, and by the vote of a small majority, our Constitution, instead of being complicated and ingenious, would become one of the crudest and most dangerous description. If for the future the Closure was not to be the exception, but the rule—if the Second Chamber was to be abolished, or only to exist on the condition that it performed no functions, they would be in such a state of anarchy that they would be obliged to adopt some check like those of other nations in order to prevent violent changes in the Constitution. But the danger was upon them. There might be a better check than a Second Chamber. Like many of their Lordships he had always been in favour of reform in regard to the House; but when the coach was in full gallop was not the time to think whether it was fitted with the best possible brake; they must use the one they had got to the best possible advantage. For the sake of the people of this country, especially when nine-tenths of them were of opinion that the Bill would be most disastrous to England, and to the Empire, and most of all to Ireland, their Lordships ought to insist on this Bill being referred to the country. An attempt might be made to show that the House of Lords had always thrown out popular or Liberal measures, and this Home Rule Bill will be called a Liberal measure, because it was supported by the bulk of the Liberal Party. He admitted that there was an overwhelming majority in the House against the present Government; but Mr. Gladstone had created many Peers, and seven years ago there was a Party of 100 or 120 Liberal Peers constant in their attendance and well able to hold their own in Debate. Where were they now? He remembered the time when the first disastrous Home Rule Bill was sprung upon the country, in 1886, and the great schism took place. The Liberal Party was then simply annihilated. At the first meeting of the Liberal Unionists, in 1886, everyone present remarked that it was exactly like one of Lord Granville's dinners with Lord Granville left out. So many Liberal Peers had joined the Unionist Party that if the Conservative Party were to stand aside and take no part in Friday's division the Liberal Unionist Peers alone would put the Government in a minority, and these Peers, be it remembered, had hitherto voted in favour of every Liberal measure, and were still prepared to support every real, sound Liberal measure that might be brought forward. He knew that they were about to take a most important step. It would be madness in that House to go against the real opinion of the country, and generally it would be a dangerous course for their Lordships to oppose the Representatives of the people. But this was an occasion when the danger was not so great. He appreciated fully the responsibility which they were about to undertake; but he believed that the course which they intended to pursue was one which they ought to follow, even if there were danger of their sacrificing themselves altogether, and that they should no longer remain as one of the Estates of the Realm. He believed, however, that there was no such danger ahead, and that their rejection of this Bill was necessary for the safety, honour, and integrity of the country. The vote which he would register on Friday against this Bill would be given with a clear conscience, and with almost greater satisfaction than on any former occasion.

LORD RIBBLESDALE said, he would not follow the noble Lord into the very interesting inquiry he had instituted into the exact quality of the Irish nature, its morbid inclination to follow Leaders, and its morbid disinclination for anything like self-government. Nor did he intend to follow the noble Lord into the numerous and somewhat complex considerations of other kinds which he had presented to them. But his noble Friend had laid very natural stress upon the isolation of Ulster and upon Ulster's apprehensions. There was one point, however, which he had not touched upon. Seven years ago there was a very general agreement as to the Ulster question, that if Ulster persisted in her objections to Home Rule her case would have to be dealt with by separate treatment of some kind, but he would point out that an offer of separate treatment had been actually made to Ulster and had been rejected by the Representatives of that Province. He did not contend that this showed any acquiescence on the part of Ulster in the policy of Home Rule, but it was a tribute to the soundness of the ground upon which this Home Rule policy was based, that ground being the determination of the Irish people, independently of province or creed, to stand or fall together. Much had been said about the character of the Irish Members. In his opinion their character had been commented upon somewhat harshly. He was asked, "How can you think of handing over the government of Ireland to such men as these?" In reply he would point out that they did not propose to hand over the government of Ireland to the Nationalist Members, but to the people of Ireland, who knew that it would be to their interest to send Representatives to the Irish Parliament who would behave with prudence and moderation and honesty. The attitude of the Opposition and others towards the Irish Members had never been quite fair. When an Irish Member talked savagely the Opposition at once said, "There is the real man," but when he talked fairly and moderately they said, "He speaks falsely." The Opposition always looked back to days which were not these days, to days when the cause of the Nationalist Members was a desperate cause, to speeches which were delivered in Kansas

City, or Cincinnati, or, as the noble Duke had reminded them, in Committee Room No. 15. But the Opposition turned deaf ears to what Irish Members said in another place in the year 1893 when they were brought face to face with the great responsibilities which the Government were proposing to entrust to them. Irish Members spoke fairly, reasonably, and in his opinion perfectly honestly. Passing to the general consideration of the principle of the Bill, he must, like other noble Lords, apologise for the use of quotations. Whether it was that people had spoken so much, or that people had spoken so well, he was always knocking up against his own views expressed by somebody else far better than he could hope to express them for himself. He would, however, give their Lordships his word that these quotations would be as few as possible, and that he would use them, not with the object of bringing home inconsistencies, but of illustrating his argument. Indeed, he might observe that after a diligent study of the literature of the subject from the earliest times, he was tempted to ask in regard to such terms as consistency and inconsistency, "Who, then, shall be saved?" He would begin with Mr. Chamberlain. Although he once declared that he could not allow such antiquities—picturesque antiquities he admitted—as their Lordships' House "to control the destinies of a free Empire," everybody liked to hear what Mr. Chamberlain had to say. Mr. Chamberlain, always a great specialist on the Irish Question and the rights of property, in more recent years had become the consulting, if not the resident, physician of noble Lords opposite. He did not think he had very lately laid down specific lines of treatment for Ireland beyond that a Unionist Government was to come back to Office; but he did so in 1885, and this was what he said ought to be done for her case—

"While we have to conciliate the national sentiment of Ireland we have to find a safe means between separation on the one hand, which would be disastrous to Ireland and dangerous to England, and on the other that excessive centralisation which throws upon the English Parliament and upon English officials the duty and burden of supervising every petty detail of Irish local affairs, which stifles the national life, which destroys the sense of responsibility, which keeps the people in ignorance of the duties and functions of government, and which produces a perpetual feeling of irritation while it obstructs all necessary legislation. That is the problem, and I do not believe that the resources of statesmanship are exhausted, or that it will be impossible to find a solution."

How clearly and concisely put ! might not these have been the instructions to the draftsman of this Bill ? His noble Friend Lord Thring would have known exactly how to deal with them. Mr. Chamberlain was right. The problem was not insoluble, the resources of statesmanship were not exhausted, and this Bill was the solution. He agreed with the noble Duke who had moved the rejection of the Bill that every man had a right to change his opinion on any question of policy and policy, and he was free to admit that he had completely changed his mind upon this Irish Question since 1885 and 1886. He was glad, however, of this occasion to give his reasons for this change. His position then was one which he imagined was common to many Liberal Unionists. Significant as the Irish elections of 1885 and 1886 were, he was not satisfied that Ireland was telling Parliament what she wanted, or that she really knew what she wanted. He distrusted the sentimentality with which, as it seemed to him, an economic and administrative problem had been invested. He was sceptical about the long brutality of Great Britain and the slow martyrdom of Ireland. He hardened his heart, and, what was more important in such matters, his head, against the national sentiment contention. He had thought if some enchanter's wand could send up the prices of Irish stock and agricultural produce 50 per cent. and keep them there, no more would be heard of Home Rule. He used to say, let Ireland be freed from intimidation and agitation by a vigorous administration, and, given such an administration a fair trial, she would shake England by the hand and say, "You have freed us from an intolerable state of things." He asked for a further sign before he would believe that we were face to face, not with a surface discontent, but with a pervading national sentiment. The sign was given when six years of Unionist government—the very kind of government he wished to see tried—was tested by an appeal to the Irish electors last year. What was the result ? Ireland grateful, Ireland rational, Ireland freed from intimidation, freed from agitation, returned a Nationalist majority substantially the same as in 1885–6. In the light of this solid Nationalist vote in 1892, what was the teaching of those six years ? Opinions naturally differed. This, for instance, was the comfortable opinion of a prominent Member of the last Administration, who might be taken to represent the average Unionist view. He asked an attentive audience what was the position in 1893 after seven years' experience, and he genially answered himself thus—

"Under the firm and courageous administration of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Balfour) the necessity for Home Rule, as far as social order is concerned, has proved to be nothing but a bugbear, nothing but moonshine."

He would not follow that gentleman either into the nature of moonshine or bugbears, but he would like to get at what was understood by "social order ?" As his noble Friend Lord Spencer had said, the real test, the only test, of social order in communities which enjoyed the privileges of free institutions was not whether the governors, but the governed, were satisfied. Social order must take its roots in the consent and affection of the people. If he was right in his interpretation of social order, and he hardly thought his contention would be disputed, where were they landed ? On a desolate shore for this prominent Unionist and his seven years' experience. His whole proposition—and the proposition involved all that was understood by Unionism—fell to the ground. The verdict passed upon the seven years' experience he pointed to by the Irish electors last August proved, not that there was no necessity for Home Rule, but that the opposite policy, the firm and courageous administration of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Balfour), had failed to establish social order. What was the consequence ? the inevitable conclusion ? Why, it was this : the necessity for an alternative policy. There were only two ways of dealing with the Irish Question—the way of noble Lords opposite and the way proposed under the Bill. And here he found himself in very tolerable disagreement with his noble Friend (Lord Cowper). The Unionist policy had been administered for seven years, and at the end of it they were no nearer than at the beginning to securing the elementary conditions of social order. Now, could this failure be in any way accounted for by extraneous causes? it was only fair to inquire. The noble Marquess had a great chance in 1885, if he could have seen his way to settle the Irish Question in concert with Mr. Gladstone, and in accordance with the wishes of the Irish Parliamentary Party. But he could not see his way to do that. He had another great chance in 1886. His resources were considerable, and even unusual. He had a resolute majority in the House of Commons, a magnificent majority in the House of Lords; the power of the purse, the power of the Press, and influential and instructed opinion largely with him, able men at his back, inside and outside his Cabinet, inside and outside his Party. This was no Cabinet of compromise, or caretakers, as in 1885. There was to be none of the natural and innocent vacillations of 1885. The faintest shadow of turning towards the Irish Parliamentary Party was to be as an accursed thing. The Government was in earnest. The noble Duke had said the Irish Question had never been before the country. [The Marquess of SALISBURY: The Bill.] The Bill involved the Irish Question. The noble Marquess himself, speaking at the Conservative Club in 1887, declared that the word "Ireland" summarised the politics of the moment. They were summarised in that word all through the six years of firm administration, and at the polls in 1892. Upon the whole, those six years were good years. There were fair harvests and fair agricultural prices. At a not inopportune moment for the noble Marquess the stars in their courses declared themselves Unionists. It seemed as if the Irish Party was breached and must share the fate of a house divided against itself. All this was good, and Mr. Balfour certainly ruled and governed Ireland with courage and determination. If his circumstances obliged him into exceptional legislation, his inclinations led him into exceptional beneficence. The cup was sweetened. He had only to point to the Light Railways, and Drainage Acts, and the work of the Congested Districts Board, which showered all sorts of good things on the Irish peasantry, from Scotch seed potatoes to bantam poultry. He did not believe all he saw in the newspapers, but he liked to believe this, that in one of the poorest districts a pig—the only individual, he understood, in Ireland who paid his rent—was named Arthur James Balfour, after the Chief Secretary. That surely was an eloquent tribute to resolute government. In short, he believed they had seen resolute government as well done as was possible. But it would not do, because they had not the people of Ireland with them. Failing the millennium of Unionist government or the disfranchisement of Ireland, they had to reckon with the Irish people. Unionists asked for time. How much more time did they want? The see-saw of coercion and concession was no new discovery. It was the old miserable habit that had prevailed during the best part of the century. Moreover, the average duration of Ministries during the last 50 years was several months under four years, and therefore the late Government had in that respect an exceptional opportunity. But, granted that they had perpetuity of office, what had they to rely upon? Local Government, he would be told, was to make straight paths for their feet, the rough places smooth, satisfy Irish sentiment. But the Irish people did not want it. The Unionists themselves did not believe in it, and the days of miracles were over. Its author, speaking with perfect frankness, said that, as a means of substituting a good for a bad state of society, he did not class it with his Land Bill, his Railway Bill, his Congested Districts Board Bill, or his Coercion Bill, and he added—

"I do not anticipate any of the advantages for Ireland which she has derived from any of the four Bills to which I have referred."

So much for Local Government from the point of view of the Unionists. If ever there was a quack remedy for a sore disease that was one. How could they hope to get rid of the people of Ireland? They might have once, but they gave them the franchise in 1884. Their Lordships' House did not divide against that measure, and the noble Marquess himself seemed to have recognised it as a turning point from which there was no going back. Speaking at Newport in 1885 in regard to the renewal of exceptional legislation, the noble Marquess said—

"You have passed an Act of Parliament giving supreme power to the great mass of the Irish people. To my mind, the renewal of exceptional legislation against a population whom you had treated legislatively to this marked confidence is so gross in its inconsistency that you could not possibly hope to renew any legislation which expressed on one side a distrust of what on the other side your legislation had so strongly emphasised."

That was the noble Marquess's view of the importance and significance of the position in 1885 as it was affected by the Franchise Act of 1884. "Supreme power" and "marked confidence" were strong expressions—perhaps too strong for 1884, but not too strong when taken in relation to the Elections of 1885, 1886, and 1892. The Government had given these facts full value in the Bill, just as the noble Marquess wished to give them their full value in 1884. They disliked gross inconsistencies as much as the noble Marquess, and they held that a people who had been treated legislatively with marked confidence were entitled to have their opinions considered as to how they would and how they would not be governed. His general conclusions were that Unionist policy in Ireland had failed; that this failure could not be accounted for by lack of time, as in its essential features it had had nearly a century's trial; and that failing perpetuity of office by Unionists or the disfranchisement of Ireland (both of which were impossible), it had no better hope of success in the future. Mr. Pitt avowed the great object of the Act of Union was the tranquillisation of Ireland and the attachment of her to this country. Ninety-three years was a long trial, and the experience formed thereon was not formed on insufficient experience. Most would admit—whatever abstract or ideal virtues might reside in the idea of a legislative Union—that that Union had failed in achieving the objects Mr. Pitt had in view. Having failed in attaching Ireland, had the Union succeeded in legislating for her? The prime plea of Unionism was that Westminster could do all or more for Ireland than she could do for herself. To hear some people talk it might be imagined that the Imperial Parliament not merely satisfied the claims and needs of Ireland but even anticipated them. If those claims had been satisfied—and he would not dispute that Parliament had honestly tried to do so—it had been always at England's own time and at England's own convenience; according to English ideas and even prejudices, and not according to Ireland's. Catholic Emancipation took 30 years; and from the Devon Commission in 1843 it was nearly as long before anything resulted from it. Instances might easily be multiplied, but he would come to later days—to September, 1886, and remind the House of the instructive history of Mr. Parnell's Tenants' Relief Bill. Mr. Parnell gave reasons for the necessity of revising judicial rents, and explained that the Bill was a temporary measure to meet the existing emergency. He advised Parliament to consider it seriously and to deal with the emergency, or he would not be responsible for the social and agrarian trouble which might follow. After being denounced by the Secretary for Ireland as a measure of gross injustice and confiscation upon the landlords, after doubts had been thrown upon the gravity of the crisis, this Bill was hounded out with the greatest contumely in the House of Commons by a majority of 95. The Government then appointed the Cowper Commission, which early in 1887 reported confirming the views taken by the Irish Members as to the distress in Ireland due to the great fall in prices, and as to the necessity for a reduction and revision of judicial rents. But although the Conservative Government dealt with the Land Question in 1887 they gave no effect to those recommendations in their Bill. The Bill was introduced in the House of Lords, and the Government declared that judicial rents were not to be revised or the question of judicial rents re-opened. In the Commons, however, the Liberal Unionists compelled the Government to give way on the subject of a revision of judicial rents fixed prior to 1886. And what happened in the Lords when the Commons Amendment came up? The noble Marquess still held the revision of judicial rents to be confiscation, but he accepted the Amendment. Because he said that, if he did not do so, he would lose the Ulster vote.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I never said anything of the kind in my life.

was delivered on the 11th of August, 1887, and was as follows:—

“They would have had to face this political contingency—that some time or other a Dissolution would have taken place, and an election would have been made, in which, owing to the overwhelming pressure of a secondary controversy the votes of the loyal people of Ulster might for a time have seemed to be upon the side which the Government believed to be absolutely fatal to the interests of the Empire.”

The Bill then, as amended, was passed, but what had happened in the meantime? There had been agrarian agitations. The Plan of Campaign had been organised, and the Government was obliged by the state of the country to renew the exceptional legislation which appeared such a gross inconsistency in 1885. “Delays have dangerous ends.” In this case they had dismal consequences, as they forced the noble Marquess on the one hand into a measure of confiscation, and on the other into an inconsistency. Sir Robert Peel in 1829 said that something must be done for Ireland. Something always was being done. Since 1869 Parliament had not wearied in the doing of it. Ireland had been the objective, as Mr. Chamberlain said the other day, of innumerable Bills, all of which, at all events, had been kindly intended. Yet the stock of Ireland's grievances accrued, and her discontents—as Lord Clare said—kept pace with her prosperity. He should be told it was all the work of the Irish agitator and the Irish priests. It was no more the Irish agitator and the Irish priests than it was the Irish landlord or the Irish climate. They were the incidents, not the essentials, of the Irish question. The essentials of the Irish question were dealt with by the Bill their Lordships meant to throw out, on the Second Reading. Lord Carnarvon, whom he might style the Lord Fitzwilliam of this century, once said that the failures in Ireland had been so many that their wrecks lay strewn all about, but that he should not lightly believe that a combination of good government in Ireland, and of good feeling in England was a hopeless task. It was because he did not wish to see another failure added to the already long list, and because he believed that such a combination was not a hopeless task, that he should vote sincerely for the Second Reading of the Bill. In 1829 a witness before the House of Lords said that the Irish Roman Catholics were more desirous of a settlement than a triumph. He believed that that was true of the Irish people in 1893. Which did their Lordships desire, a settlement or a triumph? Was it the triumph of throwing out this Bill? That was a foregone conclusion, for on Friday, half-an-hour before the Division was taken, not a patch of scarlet on the Benches opposite would be visible. But their triumph would be short-lived. It was not a long way through the Lobbies back into the House, and when their Lordships came back after the Division the Irish question would still demand a settlement.

*EARL CADOGAN: My noble Friend began his able if somewhat discursive speech by a statement that there is in some quarters a morbid inclination to follow Leaders. I am not inclined to dispute the knowledge which my noble Friend may possess of that interesting game with which my noble Friend and his friends opposite must be so well acquainted; but I am entitled to ask whether all the Members of the Government who have spoken to-night share this morbid feeling of following the Leader, and whether we are to take the statements made by at least one Member of the Government as representing the views of Her Majesty's Government as they have been hitherto expressed. I was not in the House when Lord Brassey addressed your Lordships, but I am given to understand that among the interesting statements he made were the following. Speaking as a Member of the Government he proposed that there should be more Exchequer Judges, a reduction in the number of the Irish Members to 35, that there should be a change of the constabulary into a gendarmérie under the Imperial Government, and, finally, until a general agreement has been arrived at no settlement can be accomplished; and he proposed that a Royal Commission should issue on the subject of Home Rule. I think we are entitled to ask whether in the chameleon-like course of this Government measure we are to discuss these fresh proposals which have been made, or whether the Government are intending for one more day to adhere to the proposals within the four corners of the Bill. My noble Friend went on to speak of our attitude towards the Irish Members. He said that we had treated them with contumely, that we had listened carefully to the rhetorical excesses to which they had given way in Ireland, and had not paid attention to the more Constitutional language they had used in another place. But one of the chief points of our indictment of this measure is that the Government of Ireland is to be conducted, not in England, not in London, but in Ireland and in Dublin; and if we are to form an opinion of the character of those who are to form the Government of Ireland under the new state of things proposed, surely we are as much entitled to form that opinion from the language which hon. Members used in Ireland as from that which they more prudently make use of in another place. The whole case, indeed, for this Home Rule Bill should be taken and considered as argued on the two speeches with which the Debate opened. We may conclude that the noble Earl opposite, with all his great experience of Irish affairs, was in a position to state as fully as possible all the points which could be made in favour of the course which the Government recommend the House to pursue; and I think that no one will deny that a more crushing reply and a stronger indictment of any measure never were uttered than that which followed in the speech of the noble Duke. We who have followed the course of the noble Earl during past years have fully realised the debt of gratitude which we and the country owe to him for the manly, straightforward, and courageous manner in which he performed the duties of Viceroy of Ireland during eight long years. We have seen with regret and dismay the gradual deterioration of his political course during the last two or three years. We recognise what influence his opinion must have on Irish affairs, and naturally we have watched with considerable regret the action which he has seen fit to take. There was something like an Oriental refinement of cruelty in the fact that it has fallen to-night to the noble Earl to stand forward as the author in this House of a measure which reverses every line and every principle of the policy which he followed during the brighter part of his career, and which he ought to know is fraught with danger to those interests which he for so many years supported. I am one of those who hold that the cardinal and chief object of this Bill as laid down by Mr. Gladstone—namely, to establish a Legislative Body for Ireland sitting in Dublin as distinct from Imperial affairs—is a proposal as to which we have no mandate except one of rejection. One word on the view of the country as indicated by the General Election. In the early part of the Session, a noble Lord on this side of the House alluded to the undoubted fact that at the Election of 1892, in Great Britain, a majority was returned in opposition to the policy of Her Majesty's Government. In reply to that the Leader of the House reminded us that in 1892 that majority had considerably diminished, that it was much smaller than in 1886, and he drew from that fact the argument that, inasmuch as so large a reduction of the majority had taken place between 1886 and 1892, before long that majority would be converted into a minority. Did not the noble Lord understand or see that the fact of the diminution of the majority in 1892 as opposed to 1886 tells exactly the other way? In 1886 the country had before it a Bill for the establishment of Home Rule in Ireland. During the seven years which followed it is perfectly true the abstract question of Home Rule was before the country, and it was discussed whenever men met to discuss public subjects. But when the Election took place in 1892 there was no Bill before the country, and the argument which I deduce from that is this—that the abstract question of the management of Irish affairs by Irishmen, which had been before the country, might possibly receive the assent of the country; but that the moment you attempt to convert these abstract theories into concrete proposals, the moment you attempt to formulate in a Bill the policy you have described in generalities, then you not only fail, but you fail also to receive the support of the right-thinking men of the country. The country has begun to realise the situation. Probably if you were to poll the country through you would find that the idea of Home Rule, after having seen your measure, resolved itself into something like this—in order to give to the Irish self-government in Irish affairs this Bill proposes to hand over to the Irish the practical control of British and Imperial affairs. The country cannot be surprised if, in these circumstances, while we reject the main proposals of the Government, we also want to inquire into the steps which were taken for carrying out the policy you now ask us to adopt. In the speech of the Prime Minister on the introduction of the original measure he laid down five propositions as cardinal principles, from which, he said, there ought to be no departure. He made use of explicit language; he said, "To these propositions we have endeavoured closely to adhere." The noble Earl (Earl Spencer) enumerated only three of them. They were 1st, Imperial unity; 2nd, equality of all the Kingdoms; 3rd, equitable repartition of Imperial charges; 4th, any and every practicable and adequate provision for the protection of the minority; and, finally, the 5th one is, if not finality, at all events a real and continuous settlement. With regard to four of these points, I shall have little to say. Respecting Imperial unity, it appears to me to be a curious cardinal point to lay down preparatory to bringing in a Bill for separating the two countries. With regard to the second, equality, I hardly think it can be contended that it exists under provisions which allow one country to enjoy the privilege of legislative independence in its own country, to have a Parliament of its own, and also allows the citizens of that country the privilege of sitting in the Parliament of another. With regard to the third point, relating to Imperial charges, I shall say nothing, because it is a matter not to be discussed in this House. With regard to finality, I have only to say it has been proved by the speeches made to-night by the mere mention of the consecutive measures to be passed dealing with land and other questions, that in Gladstonian legislation no such thing as finality is apparent. As to the condition that practical provision shall be made for the protection of the minority, it is clear there is only one way in which the minority in Ireland can be protected, and that is that the supremacy of this Parliament, which, after all, is the most important safeguard, and that which embraces all others, shall be fully and thoroughly carried out and maintained. The Prime Minister was good enough to say that this demand was "not an unreasonable one." Mr. John Morley has told us that this Bill "is saturated with it," and it is upon the reality and validity of these special provisions that the stability of the whole measure depends. It is fair to say, in regard to supremacy, that neither as to its necessity nor the manner in which it is to be enforced and carried out, do the Members of the Government and their friends appear to be agreed. I venture to ask this House to allow me to refer it to two short extracts in a speech made by the Prime Minister, in which he admits the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. One was in 1880, and he repeated almost the same words, and same sentiment, in 1882. On two occasions he gave expression to the same views. The Home Secretary, speaking in 1889 of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, said it would remain intact, and on another occasion that it remained undiminished, and that was emphasised by Sir William Harcourt. Those were the opinions of Her Majesty's Government on the subject of the Imperial Parliament. On the other hand, Mr. John Dillon said they would try Gladstone, and see if his Bill would give over the government of Ireland to the Nationalists of Ireland, and restore to the people of that country the privilege they held 100 years ago to manage their own affairs. Mr. John Redmond and Mr. T. P. O'Connor said it was their ultimatum that the Irish Parliament must be supreme, and free from interference from the English Parliament. I think that, at least, shows a considerable difference of opinion with reference to the question of supremacy, and I call attention to it because it is my intention to show that the supremacy is not sufficiently provided for, and if it is not so it is because the Government were not permitted to carry out their views by their Irish allies. The question of supremacy was confined entirely to the Preamble of the Bill; that was a course that did not commend itself to both Parties of the other House, the result was that after considerable discussion an addition was inserted in Clause 2 for the mention of the supremacy of the British Parliament. Her Majesty's Government would not even agree to insert the words "a subordinate Parliament." In Clause 5 it is obvious that the central figure in the whole of the system is the Lord Lieutenant. The noble Earl will not treat him as one of those organic details by which the Prime Minister is apt to designate the great principles of the Bill. The position of the Lord Lieutenant is one of extreme difficulty and complexity, and if these difficulties and complexities are insurmountable, as I maintain they are, they are sufficient to wreck the whole of this Bill. Everything turns on the Lord Lieutenant and his action. The Office of Lord Lieutenant never was a sinecure, or one which afforded much pleasure to its holder. I had occasion a short time ago to call the attention of the House to the difficulties in which the present Viceroy found himself placed by being prevented from carrying out the directions he had himself laid down for his own guidance in being obliged to receive certain addresses which he had refused previously to receive. Her Majesty's Government inserted a provision in the Bill that the tenure of Office of the Lord Lieutenant shall run for six years. They will be extremely fortunate if they find any Viceroy who survives the occupation of that position six weeks. The supremacy of the Imperial Parliament can only be vindicated in one of two ways. The Lord Lieutenant must either veto the action of the Irish Parliament, or the British Government must repeal the Acts after they have been passed, or legislate over the heads of the Irish Parliament. The Lord Lieutenant is to exercise the veto in the first place on the advice of his Irish Cabinet, in the second place on the advice of the Imperial Government, and in the third place he is required to act on his own responsibility. It will be extremely difficult for the Lord Lieutenant to decide what Acts and Bills would have to be vetoed and what would not. It must be noticed that the cases in which he is to act upon his own responsibility are those of the greatest difficulty and the greatest emergency. By Clauses 3 and 4 the Irish Legislature is placed under certain disabilities with regard to the subjects it may deal with and its power of initiating Bills. I believe it was Mr. Morley who said in the other House that we might take it for granted that the Lord Lieutenant would not break the law, and someone else said that he would not act either as a knave or a fool. In fact, there seems to be some angelic theory set up about the Lord Lieutenant, just as there is an angelic theory with regard to the Irish Members who are to form his Cabinet. But in spite of all the powers given to the Lord Lieutenant it is proved to be possible that the Irish Government might, after all, act under this Bill entirely independently of the Lord Lieutenant or the Imperial Government. It has been suggested that the Irish Parliament might pass a Bill infringing the limitations of Clauses 3 and 4, and that they might tack that Bill on to an Appropriation Bill and send it up to the Lord Lieutenant. The Lord Lieutenant would then either have to submit to a stoppage of supplies or to assent to a Bill which would infringe the provisions of Clauses 3 and 4. That would not be a state of things which would secure the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. It has been said that there is a similarity of position between the Governor of a colony and a Viceroy. The Governor of a colony is directed to veto all Bills infringing certain matters; he has power left him to reserve those Bills for the assent of Her Majesty and the Imperial Government. It was proposed in the other House to enable the Lord Lieutenant to reserve similar Bills; but there is no such power under this measure, and the Lord Lieutenant must either assent or veto. I should like to quote the opinion of a gentleman long resident in New Zealand. Sir John Gorst said there was such a state of things in New Zealand 30 years ago that it cost millions of money and thousands of lives. There was one difference in the case of the Colonies and the proposed Irish Executive. Under Clause 9, Irish constituencies will be represented in Parliament, but there is no Act under which the Colonies can be represented in Parliament, and the result will be this—that the Irish Members will by their votes control the majority in the Imperial Parliament, and they may control the decision of the Government with regard to Bills referred to them from Ireland, and the Lord Lieutenant in such cases will be controlled by the very men whose decisions he has tried to control. So much for the supremacy of Parliament. As the noble Duke said, supremacy is of two kinds—Legislative and Executive. Her Majesty's Government have hardly appreciated the difficulties of administration in Ireland. There has been plenty of legislation in past years for Ireland, but, undoubtedly, the chief difficulty is with regard to exercising the Executive functions of the Government in Ireland. This Bill confers no power to enforce the administrative orders of the Imperial Government or the decrees of the Imperial Courts. I can find no power which provides the Lord Lieutenant for enforcing any power he may receive from home. Every Civil servant, every officer, every official in Ireland will be appointed by the Irish Government, and, as far as I can see, we have no sort of control over the action they take, whether it be in accordance with Acts of Parliament or not. There is one more point with regard to the position of the Lord Lieutenant—namely, his control over the military forces in Ireland. In the other House, when the matter was under discussion, it was found that the Prime Minister differed from the Home Secretary. The Lord Lieutenant or the Magistrates are able to call out any troops quartered at any time in Ireland, and the result will be that the Magistrates appointed by one Government would have the right and power over military belonging to another Government. This is a matter worthy of the serious attention of the House. If under the Bill the right to control the military forces remains with the Irish Government, what becomes of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament? I think I have said enough to justify my contention that the exercise of this supremacy, which is one of the chief safeguards provided by Her Majesty's Government, is, to use a mild expression, a sham and a delusion, and I submit that this fact is absolutely fatal to the proposal of the Government. It is the question upon which the whole system turns, and I have thought it right to call the attention of the House and the country to what the Prime Minister has called an "organic detail," but on which depends the success or failure of the entire measure. Upon the general question of the action of this House with reference to this Bill, I have nothing to add to what has been so ably and eloquently stated by the noble Duke. I have no doubt as to the result of the Division on the Bill, nor have I any doubt as to our duty in connection with the Bill, nor as to the mandate which the country lays on us to deal with it. In my belief this Bill was never intended to pass this House. It is hardly any secret that the passing of this measure through the House of Commons was the price paid for Irish votes, in order to carry the Newcastle Programme, and in order to obtain a new lease—I will not say of power, but of Office for Her Majesty's Government. It was an unholy compact, made with the knowledge that it would be our duty to prevent the Government from performing their part. This is, perhaps, a strong accusation to make, but it is sustained by the facts. We have seen the measures which have been adopted to pass this Bill through the other House, measures which were calculated to make it absolutely impossible for your Lordships to receive any Bill so carried. The proposals so made were such as could not find favour in your Lordships' House, and we have seen during the last few weeks that the Government in the House of Commons have absolutely refused to accept Amendments even when they carried out intentions which they had expressed themselves, and when they were quite unable to advance any arguments against the Amendments proposed. The Bill comes to us with its policy reversed, with its provisions modified, and with its character transformed at the will of the Irish Members. The noble Duke has referred to-night to the results which may follow the rejection of this measure. I do not deny that the results may to a certain extent be said to be serious and such as we cannot contemplate with confidence; but, if this be so, the Government are responsible. You found Ireland when you came into Office in 1886 relatively prosperous, contented, and happy. You found it reviving under a system of so-called coercion, which was practically dormant in its provisions, which simply contained a power to enforce the law against those who were disposed to disobey the law. You found restored confidence, an increase of wealth, and a state of things generally that gave brighter hopes for the future. You have altered all this; you have put back the hands of the clock, and upon your heads be the responsibility. The noble Duke read to-night the expression used by the Prime Minister in enumerating the objections which he said had been brought against the Government measure. Those expressions were to a certain extent exaggerated, but they were none the less descriptive on the whole of the objections which we have to the Bill. Mr. Gladstone said that if these objections were sound it must go hard with the Home Rule Bill. In our deliberate and conscientious opinion these are sound objections, and we believe it will go hard with the Home Rule Bill when its principles and details are explained to the constituencies, as they will be by every Member of the Unionist Party within the next few weeks. It will go hard with the Bill wherever, freed from the galling bondage of Party slavery, and influenced only by a patriotic desire to promote the best and highest interests of the Empire, Englishmen are permitted to examine into and give judgment on the monstrous provisions contained in this Bill. It will go harder still with the Bill when that day of reckoning arrives, which cannot now be long delayed, when the doom of your policy will be finally sealed by the verdict of an indignant and outraged people.

Further Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCHOOL ATTENDANCE) BILL.

Reported from the Standing Committee without further Amendment; the Report of the Amendment made in the Committee of the Whole House to be received To-morrow.

EDUCATION (SCHOOL ATTENDANCE) (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.]

Reported from the Standing Committee without Amendment; and to be read 3^a To-morrow.

COMPANIES (WINDING-UP) BILL [H.L.]

Reported from the Standing Committee without Amendment; and to be read 3^a To-morrow.

SHERIFF COURTS CONSIGNATIONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT (PLUMSTEAD AND HACKNEY) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; to be printed; and referred to the Examiners. (No. 267.)

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Twelve o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 5th September 1893.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Mellor, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table, and after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

THE RELIGIOUS RIOTS IN INDIA.

MR. A.C. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can furnish the House with a statement setting forth the number, with dates and other particulars, of riots between Mahomedans and Hindoos in British India arising out of or connected with cow killing, festival processions, or other matters of religious difference, during the period commencing with the 1st January, 1880, to 1st June of the present year?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): I stated last Thursday, in reply to a similar question by my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire, that the Secretary of State was not in possession of the full information which would enable a Report for five years to be prepared ; but that the Government of India would be asked to submit, with Reports on the recent riots, a general Report on the questions of administration involved.

THE MOEL ISPRI AND CHAMPION MINES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in the case of the Royal mines known as the Moel Ispri and Champion mines, situate near Dolgelly, the Crown has power at Common Law, or otherwise, to prevent the removal of fixed machinery (erected solely for the purpose of extracting gold) from these Royal mines ; and, if so, whether, in the interests of the State and the industry, they will exercise such power ; whether the Woods and Forests Office intimated to the late lessees, or their representatives, some time since, that the Crown claimed at Common Law (or otherwise under the rights of the Crown) the right to prevent the removal of such machinery ; what was the date of the first application by Mr. J. R. Roberts and another, of Dolgelly, gold miners, for a lease to work the above-mentioned mines ; what was the date when Mr. J. R. Roberts received intimation that the lease would be granted to him ; what was the date of the sale of the machinery referred to ; on what date did the former lease terminate ; what was the cause of the delay in granting the lease to Mr. Roberts and another ; and will explain why the Woods and Forests Office, when requested by those interested in the gold mining interest at Dolgelly either to grant a lease before the sale or to intimate that they would grant a lease to any person who purchased the machinery, did not accede to such request ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : The Crown has not the power to prevent the removal of machinery from the mines in question. The leases are either determined or in process of surrender and the late lessees are empowered to dispose of the machinery. When the leases were in existence the Woods and Forests Office intimated to the lessees that the Crown claimed the right to prevent the removal of the machinery. The date of the first application by Mr. T. H. Roberts and Mr. Pritchard Morgan for a lease to work the above-mentioned Mines was 29th December, 1892. The application of Mr. T. H. Roberts and Mr. N. T. Williams was dated the 10th June, 1893. The offer of a lease was made to Mr. T. H. Roberts and Mr. N. T. Williams on the 22nd ultimo. The machinery was advertised to be sold on the 24th ultimo. The lease of the Moel Ispri Mine was determined on the 20th December, 1892, and an agreement was entered into for the surrender of the other leases as on the 5th April last, but the formal completion of the deeds of surrender has been delayed. There were several causes for the delay in offering a lease to Messrs. Roberts and Williams. An opportunity was given to those who had provided the machinery to obtain fresh capital for continuing their operations, and when that failed considerable delay took place in obtaining replies to the references given by Messrs. Roberts and Williams. The Woods and Forests Office has acted throughout with a desire to save the machinery from being removed ; but it could not have given a general undertaking to grant a lease to any persons who might purchase it without knowing their names and qualifications.

STEPNEY UNION.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is in possession of any further information respecting the case of Samuel Ely Hobbs, a dock labourer, lately residing at Love Lane, Ratcliff, who died at the Bromley and Stepney Sick Asylum ; and whether an additional doctor to the Union, comprising the parishes of Limehouse, Stepney, and Ratcliff, is to be appointed ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston) : The Local Government Board have received the depositions taken by the Coroner at the inquest in the case of Samuel Hobbs, and have been furnished with a reply of the Guardians. Dr. Downes, one of the Board's Inspectors, has also made inquiries as to the case. He has seen the relieving officer and Mr. Godding, who was acting as the substitute of the medical officer, and the dispenser. He finds that the application for the attendance of the medical officer in the case was made on Thursday, 17th August, at 10 o'clock in the morning, and that the acting medical officer, although there was nothing to show that the case was an urgent one, visited the patient about 1 on the same day. Mrs. Hobbs, who has also been seen by Dr. Downes, admits that this was the case. She further states that she went to the dispensary in the afternoon for the medicine prescribed and obtained it. A reference to the dispenser's book shows that the medicine was made up on that afternoon. Mrs. Hobbs accounts for the discrepancies between her present statement and her statement before the Coroner by saying that she was very much confused when giving her evidence. The district medical officer of the Stepney Union is required to devote his whole time to the duties of his office. He receives a salary of £350 per annum. Dr. Downes ascertained from the acting medical officer that the number of cases which he has to attend at their own homes has averaged about 15 a day. I cannot say upon the facts at present before the Local Government Board that the duties of the medical officer are more than can be efficiently performed by one person who devotes his whole time to the attendance on the sick poor.

POST OFFICE ACCOMMODATION IN LIMERICK.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if his attention has been directed to a Memorial forwarded some months ago from the traders and representatives of the largest houses in William Street, in the City of Limerick, requesting that the Post Office in that street may also become a Telegraph Station; and whether he will favourably entertain the application?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): There are already two Telegraph Offices within a short distance of the Post Office to which the hon. Member refers, and I regret, therefore, that I cannot favourably entertain the application.

Sir W. Foster

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that the ship Discovery, which arrived at Haulbowline on the 29th ultimo with a steam pinnace on board for Government use, had to proceed to Cork to unship it owing to the defective condition of the crane at that dockyard; and whether a suitable steam crane will be included in the machinery about to be erected at Haulbowline?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The crane in the yard at Haulbowline was not powerful enough to lift the launch of the Discovery. Among other machinery proposals shortly to be considered at the Admiralty is one for a crane of greater strength at Haulbowline.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL'S ANNUAL REPORT.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the cause of the delay in the issue of his Annual Report; and whether it is intended to issue that Report before the end of September instant?

MR. A. MORLEY: The Annual Report of the Post Office was laid on the Table of the House on the 31st ultimo, and ordered to be printed. It will be issued to Members in the usual course as soon as the supply of copies has been delivered by the printer.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will cause to be laid before Parliament a copy of the Parliamentary Electorates and Elections Act which has now passed through the Parliament of New South Wales, and which includes the whole of the Electoral Law of the Colony within one consolidation Statute, with new self-acting provisions with regard to the redistribution of seats every five years.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Yes, Sir; it will be laid on the Table of the House.

THE AMERICAN MAILS.

CAPTAIN DONELAN : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that, by promptly utilising the special mail service, American letters landed at Queenstown ex Etruria at 7.30 p.m. on Friday last were delivered in London and other large English centres sufficiently early on Saturday to allow ample time for reply by the outgoing steamer Lucania on Sunday ; and whether the terms offered for the continuation of this special service have been accepted by the various Companies interested ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I am aware of the facts mentioned in the first paragraph. I have also come to an understanding with the various companies concerned for the continuance of the special service up to the 31st December next.

CAPTAIN DONELAN : I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to a letter in to-day's Daily News from a London merchant, stating that his American correspondence did not reach his office until after 1 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, though it was due at 10 a.m.

MR. A. MORLEY : No, Sir ; I have not seen the letter.

MR. SWEETMAN (Wicklow, E.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in his late offer to continue for another four months the special postal service from Queenstown to London, he has offered the London and North Western Railway Company 3s. a mile for express trains, and has offered the Great Southern and Western Railway of Ireland only 2s. a mile for a similar service ; and, if he has done so, whether he is willing to inform the House of his reasons for offering less to a Railway Company in one portion of the United Kingdom than to a Railway Company in another portion of that Kingdom for similar services ?

MR. A. MORLEY : The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The reason why a payment of 2s. a mile was offered to the Great Southern and Western Railway Company was because that was the rate originally mentioned by the Company, and corresponded with the payment quoted by the Company for special trains in the opposite direction.

POST OFFICE ACCOMMODATION IN SOUTH CARNARVONSHIRE.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the reason that no Post Office is established at Penmorfa, in South Carnarvonshire ; whether he is aware that the village itself contains 81 houses and a population of about 300, besides being the centre of a large and well-populated agricultural district, and also contains the parish church, Board school, and two chapels, and is a polling station ; whether the neighbouring village of Pentrefelin has a Post Office, although it is not one-half the size of Penmorfa ; and whether the inconvenience will be remedied ?

MR. A. MORLEY : This question was recently considered on the application of the hon. Member. The post to Penmorfa and the neighbourhood is little more than self-supporting, and an office could not be established at Penmorfa without actual loss to the Revenue. The number of letters left to be called for is very small, and Penmorfa is already supplied with a letter-box. A shopkeeper in the village has a licence for the sale of stamps. The village of Pentrefelin has a sub-Post Office. In the present circumstances, I cannot see my way to meet the request of the hon. Member.

CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES ABROAD

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when he can lay upon the Table the further instalment of Returns relating to the majorities necessary in Foreign Legislatures for the ratification of constitutional changes, promised on 18th May ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick) : Replies have now been received from every country except Venezuela. They will be laid on the Table as soon as possible.

DEMURRAGE CLAIMS IN BRAZIL.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Brazilian Government have yet made any reply to the representations of the British Government in regard to claims for demurrage, &c., on behalf of the Fulwood and other British vessels against the Brazilian Government?

SIR E. GREY: A reply has recently been received. The Central Railway Company of Brazil have expressed their willingness to count as lay days and to pay for the days spent by the Alpheus Marshall in quarantine, there being an express stipulation to that effect inserted in her charter-party. As there was no such stipulation in the charter-parties of the other vessels, the Company will not admit a corresponding obligation. This information has already been sent to the persons interested.

THE BENGAL TENANCY BILL.

SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to the statement that the survey of Behar is an outcome of the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885, and any questions respecting the permanent settlement must be considered to have been determined by the passing of this latter Act, whether the official draft of the Bengal Tenancy Bill, circulated in the vernacular in 1883, contained any reference whatever to any provincial survey, or any reference to any survey at the expense of the landlords and tenants (even in local areas), except in cases where the landlords and tenants demanded it, or where there were existing disputes; whether the statement of objects and reasons for the Bengal Tenancy Bill, signed by Mr. Ilbert, contained any such reference; whether the Government, when pressed on the 12th March, 1885, to republish the Bengal Tenancy Bill in vernacular as amended in Committee, declined to do so, on the express ground that almost all alterations were excisions favourable to Zemindars, and not new clauses; and whether one of these alterations empowered the Government to impose heavy fresh taxation on the Zemindars to meet the costs of the Behar Cadastral Survey, as well as an annual tax of nearly 5 per cent. on the gross rents of their lands, to meet the costs of the maintenance of the record of right?

MR. G. RUSSELL: The original draft Bengal Tenancy Bill mentioned a record of rights, but did not contain any reference to a "Survey"; and, as has already been stated in my reply to the hon.

Sir G. Baden-Powell

Member for North Ayrshire on 7th August last, the two conditions quoted refer only to cases in which the Local Government act without the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council. The answer to the second paragraph of the question is, No; and to the third paragraph, Yes. The Bill as amended in Committee merged into one chapter: (a) "Settlement of rents," and (b) "Survey and record of rights," and extended to all three heads the powers of settling the proportion of cost to be paid respectively by the Zemindars and the ryots, which, in the original Bill, had been confined to the "Settlement of rents."

VACCINATION OF SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education by what authority the Department declines to admit as pupil teachers young persons who have prepared themselves for the profession, and are in all respects fitted for appointment, on the ground that they are not vaccinated; is there any Statute making the above a condition precedent; can the Education Department exclude from the schools any child as scholar on the ground that it is not vaccinated; and is he aware that by law no one over the age of 14 years can be compelled to be vaccinated?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (MR. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): There is no statutory authority in this matter; but it is laid down in the Code, which has been approved by Parliament, that candidates for admission as pupil teachers must produce a medical certificate in a form prescribed by the Department. If this form does not show that the candidate has been successfully vaccinated, it has been the practice of the Department for many years, under successive Governments, to refuse admission. I do not think it desirable to alter these arrangements pending the Report of the Royal Commission. It is the case that no one over 14 can be compelled to be vaccinated. The Education Department have no power to exclude any child from a school on any ground whatever.

THE WELSH EDUCATION SCHEME.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he can state what provision has been made in the Welsh Education Schemes to enable boys and girls, more especially being children of poor parents, to pass from the primary to the new secondary schools, and thence to University Colleges and institutions of higher technical instruction; and how far the Address to Her Majesty, passed in the House of Lords, will affect any such provisions?

MR. ACLAND: The usual form of the Welsh County Schemes, under the Intermediate Education Act, provides for a system of county schools throughout the county to meet the wants of its various districts. There is a County Governing Body, through which the whole system is to some extent under central control, and there are Local Governing Bodies. Under the supervision of these bodies, very considerable sums are allotted in the various counties. First, for County Scholarships for scholars from public elementary schools; 2nd, for county bursaries to cover travelling and lodging, or other incidental expenses of poor scholars; 3rd, for the county exhibitions which the boys and girls who do well in the intermediate schools may hold at Universities and University Colleges. In the case of the Cardigan County Scheme, to which, I assume, the hon. Member refers, the Address passed in the House of Lords has swept away the whole of these provisions which are contained in Clauses 48 and 81 to 87, for carrying scholars from elementary and intermediate schools, for giving bursaries to poor scholars, and for taking the most successful scholars from the intermediate schools to University Colleges, and other places of higher instruction.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he received any authoritative demand for this scheme?

MR. ACLAND: I believe the whole of the provisions which were swept away by the House of Lords had the fullest consent of everybody concerned in the scheme.

AFFAIRS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a statement of Mr. F. R. Thompson, a gentleman who has been ten years in the Colonial Service and is well acquainted with South Africa, in which that gentleman states that Lo Bengula's Impis have massacred some 10,000 unoffending Mashonas within the past few years; and whether he will ask Mr. Rhodes to send an estimate of the number of Mashonas massacred by the Matabeles within the past 10 years?

MR. S. BUXTON: My attention has been called to the statement in question; but Her Majesty's Government do not see that any advantage is to be gained by communicating with Mr. Rhodes in reference thereto. The system of raiding the Mashonas appears to have become, to a great extent, a thing of the past even before the Mashona country was occupied by the Chartered Company; and Her Majesty's late Government, acquainted as they were with all the facts, entered into a Treaty of Peace and Amity with Lo Bengula, and maintained friendly relations with that Chief. Indeed, it may be said that the existence in past years of the system of raiding the Mashonas was the principal evidence which supported the doctrine that Lo Bengula ruled Mashonaland, and was, therefore, entitled to grant the land and minerals to the promoters of the Chartered Company. The Company were granted this Charter as a commercial and administrative Body, and not with a view to institute crusades against the Matabele, as seems to be suggested in the question.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: There is no such suggestion in the question. Am I to understand, from the answer given by the hon. Gentleman, that he does not deny the statement in the question that in the past few years 10,000 of these unfortunate Mashonas have been massacred?

MR. S. BUXTON: I do not deny that the Mashonas have been raided; but I say that these raids have for years come to an end, and that subsequent to them the late Government entered into this Treaty with Lo Bengula.

WORMWOOD SCRUBS PRISON.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that political agents, acting on behalf of the Conservative Party, have been permitted to attend at the Wormwood Scrubs Prison, that on July 4 two agents occupied one of the waiting rooms within the precincts of the prison, and that various officials were requested to attend the said agents and explain their political opinions, their names being marked accordingly; whether these arrangements were made with the knowledge and consent of the Governor of the prison, and, if not, by whom they were made and who was responsible; and whether he will cause full inquiry to be made into the whole matter without delay, so that the facts may be laid before the Revising Barrister, who will shortly be sitting for that district?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I am informed by the Deputy Governor in charge that two agents of the Conservative Association applied in June last to be allowed to see the officers of the prison with a view to completing the register. They were informed that they could only see those officers who wished to have their names registered, and that if they attended at the ordinary waiting room, which is outside the inner gate of the prison, the officers might be informed they were there. They came on July 4, the officers were informed, and were told that anyone who wished to see them could do so. No officers were requested to attend—their attendance was purely voluntary. These arrangements were made with the knowledge and consent of the Governor. There does not appear to me to be need for further inquiry, nor is the matter one of which the Revising Barrister could take cognisance. But I think that the practice of allowing the agents of either political Party to visit the prison in this way is open to objections, and it will not be permitted in future. If the agents wish to see the officers they must visit them in their houses or quarters.

THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH'S LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the customary or regulation period of leave allowed annually to Admirals holding the appointment of Admiral of the Port at Devonport and other naval centres; and whether, during the recent tenure of this post, His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh conformed to the Service Regulations in this respect; and, if not, what was his total absence on leave or otherwise each of the three years he held the appointment, and also that of his predecessor in the office?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The amount of leave granted to the Commander-in-Chief at the Home Ports is at the discretion of the Admiralty. It is governed first by the exigencies of the Service, and, secondly, by the reasonable requirements of the officers. His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh was subject to, and complied with, the Regulations with regard to leave while holding the appointment of Commander-in-Chief at Devonport.

MR. KEARLEY: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can give me specific details as to the amount of leave that the Duke has had year by year during the three years that he has held his appointment?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: If hon. Members will read the last paragraph of my hon. Friend's question they will notice that he himself recognises that if the Commander-in-Chief conforms to the Service Regulations no further question arises.

MR. KEARLEY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question. I ask him can he state specifically whether His Royal Highness, while holding this command, has not had, on an average, six months' leave every year?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Certainly not; and for such absence on leave as the Duke enjoyed the Admiralty are responsible, and they are prepared to bear that responsibility.

MR. A. C. MORTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Regulations allowed of all these absences; and, if they did, what is the good of having an officer appointed at all?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I do not know what my hon. Friend means by referring to "all these absences." The Duke of Edinburgh was most assiduous in the performance of his duties.

MR. KEARLEY : Am I to understand that the right hon. Gentleman objects to giving the total absence year by year of His Royal Highness whilst holding this command?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : If my hon. Friend desires further information on the subject he will put a question upon the Paper.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : I desire to ask whether it is usual to publish the absences of other commanding officers; and whether there is any reason why there should be a special inquisitorial inquiry about the Duke of Edinburgh's absences?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (King's Lynn) : I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not a fact that the Duke of Edinburgh, having now become a Foreign Prince, has ceased to belong to the British Navy?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : A similar question has been put upon the Paper by the hon. Member for Peterborough, and the hon. Member has very kindly postponed it at my request. In reference to the other question, it is unusual to publish the number of days' leave of absence of the officers in command. If the hon. Member will put a question upon the Paper I will consider whether an answer can be given to it.

MR. KEARLEY : I will put a question upon the Paper on the subject.

THE GRAND JUNCTION WATERWORKS.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to a notice issued by the Grand Junction Waterworks Company to alter and adopt, at a considerable expense to householders, the existing service, so as to render it suitable for a constant supply; and whether the Government will now bring in a Bill to compel Water Companies to charge by measurement the water used in all houses over £100 per annum?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) : I am aware that the Grand Junction Water Company have issued notices of their intention to give in a certain area a constant supply of water and require the owners and occupiers of premises in that area to provide the necessary fittings. This is only an extension by this Company of the system which has been very generally adopted by the London Water Companies—according to the latest Returns, 553,000 houses, or about 70 per cent. of the whole number supplied by the Water Companies, being on constant supply. A proposal that houses over £100 per annum should be relieved from the present mode of assessment to water rates is not one that I could recommend.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON : Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that the inhabitants of houses of over £100 a year rent are frequently absent for several months of the year, and consequently consume no water during such periods?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : The charge for water supply is a statutory charge, and is based, not upon the amount of water consumed, but upon the rateable value of the houses. This mode of assessment was arrived at in the interest of the working classes, and is adopted generally throughout the country.

INSANITARY DRAINS AT WINDSOR BARRACKS.

SIR W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is true that the insanitary condition of the drains at Windsor Cavalry Barracks has been reported several times during the last two years; whether, since December last, three very strong Reports condemning the whole system of drainage have been presented by War Office officials; whether the sum so urgently demanded to put the barracks in a secure sanitary condition has been struck out of the Estimates for 1893-4; whether, during the last few weeks, an expert from the War Office has been sent down who has ordered small temporary repairs, leaving untouched the deeper drainage, the real seat of the mischief; and whether, in spite of these Reports, and the urgent representations of the medical officer in charge, it is intended to allow the regiment now quartered in these barracks to remain on a spot so condemned as dangerous for at least seven months longer, before any radical alterations are made?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): Several Reports have been received on the drainage of the Cavalry Barracks at Windsor. The first, from the General Officer commanding, complaining of the system, was received in December, 1892. Two others were received from him on July 26 and August 23, 1893. When the Estimates were considered the first Report of the General Officer commanding of December 8 only had been received. Two have been received from the War Office Sanitary Inspector, one dated August 1 and the other August 29. The system of drainage appears to be old-fashioned and bad in principle, but the health of the troops has not in any way suffered. The Sanitary Inspector, who in his inspection used the smoke test, states—

"I found no direct escape of gas from the drains into the building, but the bad smells are sufficiently accounted for by the proximity of filthy latrines and numerous escapes of lighting gas within the building. It is probably unnecessary to explain that small escapes of gas, undetectable by a light, are often the cause of smells closely resembling those from drains. In this case, from the evidence of persons living in the building, I am convinced that many of the complaints have been due to the escape of gas which occurs in several parts of the building."

After recommending certain alterations and repairs, which are now being effected, he states that he cannot help thinking that hitherto the smells have been rather offensive than dangerous, and that when the above-mentioned alterations have been made the air of the officers' house will cease to be offensive, and that no special steps need to be taken till the drainage comes to be reconstructed in due course. The plan of reconstruction of the drainage system is being considered, and the question of the occupation of the barracks is under the consideration of the military and medical authorities.

SIR W. HART DYKE: This is a matter involving life and death, and therefore I hope the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me if I appear to be pertinacious. It is in the officers' quarters that the old and miserable drains terminate in a cesspool. Do the Government propose to put an end to the danger that arises from this system of drainage, or to allow it to continue?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The whole system of drainage at the barracks in question is under consideration. The evil smells complained of are only perceived in the officers' quarters, and what can be done to put an end to them will be done at once.

TROOPS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what Imperial military forces are now available in South Africa for the protection of British colonists in Mashonaland?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The troops now in South Africa number about 3,300 men. Whether these may be held to be available for the purpose of the hon. Gentleman is a question upon which opinions may differ.

THE GUARDS AND EGYPT.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a battalion of the Guards is to be ordered for service in Egypt this Autumn?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It was contemplated to relieve one of the Line battalions in Egypt by a battalion of Guards, but that proposal will not be given effect to during this season.

THE MAXIM GUN.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many black powder .303 cartridges can be fired from the Maxim machine gun before the barrel becomes unfit for accurate shooting?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No experiments have been carried out which would enable me to give the hon. Gentleman the information he desires.

GUNNERS' QUARTERS AT SHOEBURY-NESS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the huts at Shoeburyness, in which 100 gunners with their families are quartered, were constructed during the Crimean War, and are in such a condition as to be unfit for habitation; and whether steps will be taken to provide proper accommodation for the gunners and their families?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Some of the huts at Shoeburyness, containing accommodation for 34 unmarried and 24 married soldiers and their families, were constructed about the time of the Crimean War. Although old, they can hardly be said to be unfit for habitation. It is desired to get rid of all such huts as soon as possible, and this is gradually being done.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : This is the second question which has been asked in regard to the insanitary condition of military accommodation, and the Army Reports are full of such statements. What is the reason why these things are not attended to at once. I must say this neglect is most unfortunate?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : There has been no neglect. The huts are not insanitary. They are old and worn out, and the sooner they are replaced by new ones the better it will be.

THE IRISH POST OFFICE UNDER HOME RULE.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present value of, or what sums have been expended upon, the property of the Post Office in Ireland, which will under the Government of Ireland Bill be handed over without repayment to the new Irish Government?

SIR W. HARCOURT : If the hon. Member will procure a copy of the Bill he will find that there has been no such transfer, that the property remains in the hands of the Imperial Post Office, and that no question of repayment will arise.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : The Chancellor of the Exchequer has perverted my question. I asked for the value of such Government property as will be transferred.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I do not understand how it will be transferred when the Bill does not transfer it. It will be in the hands of the Imperial Government.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : Ultimately?

SIR W. HARCOURT : Yes, ultimately. I have already stated that the way for the hon. Gentleman to obtain an answer is to obtain a copy of the Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN : But may we not take it that the policy of the Government is to hand over the Post Office to the Irish Government, and that that will be the ultimate result of the passing of the Bill?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I am afraid that I can only reply that my right hon. Friend should also procure a copy of the Bill.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to assert that there is no possibility, under the powers of the Bill, that the Post Office may be transferred to the Irish Government? What kind of property is there power to transfer?

SIR W. HARCOURT : Well, I must distribute some copies of the Bill amongst the gentlemen opposite. It has been before them 82 days. They should know what it contains.

MR. TOMLINSON : Yes, but it has been altered.

DEER FOREST COMMISSION.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that Mr. Gordon, land valuator, one of the Deer Forest Commissioners now engaged in Caithness, has for a number of years acted as valuator for many of the landlords in that county; and if he will inquire into the circumstances of the case?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : Mr. Gordon is a land surveyor and valuator who has been long established in general practice, and as such has, no doubt, been employed by the owners of land. He was placed on the Commission on account of his professional qualifications, which have proved to be of great value in carrying out the work. As it is a usual custom in the case of professional men who serve on Commissions where their professional knowledge is made use of, the Treasury has granted Mr. Gordon professional remuneration.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that, in consequence of Mr. Gordon having acted for so many years in the interests of the landlords, the Highland people have lost all confidence in him?

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is a fact that a communication was received from the Scotch Office in London by the Commission stating that no exceptional payment would be made to Mr. Gordon, and whether he is aware that the fact of Mr. Gordon receiving payment apart from the other Commissioners has caused very grave dissatisfaction, and, in fact, has led to suspension of the work of the Commission?

MR. WHITELAW (Stockport): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not a fact that the majority of the Members of the Deer Forest Commission are notorious advocates of the programme of the Highland Land League?

MR. WEIR: In reference to the question, may I ask whether the majority of the Members of the Commission are not Tories and landlords' representatives?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Whatever be the political opinions or the positions in life of the Members of the Commission, I believe it to be as good a Commission as could have been constituted, and it has done its work most thoroughly. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, I should be glad if he could give notice of it. I hope he will put it down, after having asked it now.

NAVIGATION OF LOCH BROOM.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the fact that the Treasury Committee of 1891 on Railways in the North-West of Scotland, consisting of Major General Hutchinson, R.E., C.B., Rear Admiral Sir G. S. Nares, K.C.B., and Henry Tennant, Esq., reported Loch Broom, Ross-shire, to be encumbered with islets and rocks, and that this Report has been repeatedly quoted in this House as a reason for refusing the promised grant in aid of the Garve and Ullapool Railway extension scheme, while the Admiralty charts show no islets or rocks in the course of vessels sailing to and from Ullapool, and the sailing directions, as well as the Admiralty officials, state that Loch Broom is remarkably free from rocks and islets, a Committee of careful and competent persons will be appointed to inquire into the accuracy of the Report referred to?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think the Government could find a Committee of more careful and competent persons than that which has already reported.

*MR. WEIR: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Secretary to the Admiralty has distinctly stated that Loch Broom is not encumbered with islets and rocks, while the Report of the Committee, to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, distinctly states that Loch Broom is encumbered with islands and rocks, and the Admiralty charts show no islets or rocks in the course of vessels sailing to and from Ullapool? May I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take some steps to set the matter right?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think Sir George Nares is a person who could form an opinion on the subject better than I or the hon. Member.

*MR. WEIR: Then am I to understand that the Secretary to the Admiralty is incompetent to give an accurate opinion, and that the Admiralty charts are inaccurate?

MR. WHITELAW: Does the right hon. Gentleman not know from his own experience that there are no islands or rocks to interfere with the navigation of Loch Broom, and also that, of the three gentlemen who formed the Committee, not one of them went near Loch Broom in order to find out the state of matters for themselves?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am loth to speak of my personal experience of the navigation of Loch Broom, but I should certainly say there were a good many islands at the mouth of Loch Broom.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I may be allowed to say that my answer, to which my hon. Friend has referred, was in reference to rocks interfering with navigation.

*MR. WEIR: But the Admiralty charts show no rocks in the course of vessels.

IRISH SUNDAY CLOSING.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of his statement to a deputation last Thursday that the present position of the Irish Sunday Closing question is a scandal to Parliament, and that the Bill dealing with the question has come down from the House of Lords, the Government will give the necessary time to complete the measure in this House?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): It is quite true that I borrowed the language of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, and also of the Leader of the Opposition, in describing the state of this particular measure as a scandal, and that, I think, is my view. But my hon. Friend knows as well as I do the great difficulties which we are under in the way of finding time, and he must have heard yesterday the declaration that the Government cannot undertake to find facilities for passing or furthering any private legislation. I was reminded the other day of the circumstances that in 1878, when the Bill concerned became law, it was passed almost as late as the period at which we have now arrived, because Sir Stafford Northcote, the Leader of the House, gave facilities for it. I find these facilities were effective because there was a practical concordat or agreement between the parties concerned in the Bill, and I simply throw out this hint to gentlemen sitting in the quarter of the House and elsewhere, whether some sort of agreement could not be come to now upon one or two of the outstanding details of the measure.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I ask whether the small minority who were opposed to that Bill did not resist it to the close, and that there was no compromise?

MR. J. MORLEY: If that is so I was misinformed, but I was told on authority almost as good as the hon. Member's own. If there is no chance of any such arrangement now I am afraid the difficulty will be very serious.

SIR T. LEA: I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if there is no chance of passing the Bill this Session, will he consent to place it on the same level as another measure—the Evicted Tenants Bill—referred to yesterday, and put it down as a Government measure for next Session.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I desire to know, Sir, if the Chief Secretary, when he talks of the scandal to Parliament, means that it is a scandal to the present Government for not finding time for the Bill.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not think that is a question I ought to answer. The language which I quoted was used by the Leader of the Opposition and by the Prime Minister from time to time during the period of years during which this Act has been constantly renewed instead of being made a statutory enactment. In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for South Derry, I cannot undertake to put it on the same footing as the other measure mentioned without consideration, but, as I assured him the other day, the Government are most anxious to pass this Bill, and the course they may take next Session in respect to it will have consideration if nothing is done this Session by gentlemen themselves.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: With respect to the necessity for the promoters of the Bill to come to terms, I would like to ask whether the promoters, first of all, did not consent to the exemption of the five exempted cities from the Bill in order to pass it, and whether they did not still consent to three cities being exempted from the measure in order to facilitate its passage?

SIR T. LEA: The Bill has been qualified, and is now a practical compromise.

MR. J. MORLEY: These are argumentative questions, and we cannot discuss a matter of this kind in questions and answers across the floor of the House.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): In reference to a suggestion, of which I am not aware, that there has been a practical compromise, I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that many of the Irish Members are strongly of opinion that this is a matter which should be reserved for the Irish Parliament?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am aware that is so, but I may say that in my own view it would not be undesirable to get the measure passed even now if we could find time.

SIAM.

SIR R. TEMPLE asked whether Her Majesty's Government would object to any Commercial Treaties being concluded by Siam with any Foreign Power, which infringed the most-favoured-nation privileges possessed by England under existing Treaties?

*SIR E. GREY said that, according to the information at their disposal, there was no intention of infringing the provisions of our Treaty with Siam. That being so, he had nothing to add to the statement which he made to the House on the previous day, and that which was made by the Secretary of State in another place.

HOME RULE BILL.

*MR. HOZIER asked when the House would be called upon to consider the Lords' Amendments to the Home Rule Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) said, he supposed the hon. Member had some authority for stating that the House of Lords were about to amend the Home Rule Bill?

*MR. HOZIER: Do the Government wish the Bill to pass without amendment in its present unworkable condition?

[No answer was given.]

EVICTED TENANTS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether, in view of the sacrifice of the Evicted Tenants' Bill for another year, the Government were willing to consider the re-enactment of the 13th section of the Land Purchase Act, under which tenants were reinstated under perfectly fair terms?

MR. J. MORLEY said, he could not answer that question offhand. If the hon. Member could give him an assurance that hon. Gentlemen opposite would approve of the re-enactment of the clause, the matter might be considered.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he supposed that hon. Gentlemen opposite would not object, because they had approved of the provision.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE
DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS I.

"That a sum, not exceeding £142,176, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894, for the Erection, Repairs, and Maintenance of Public Buildings in Ireland, for the Maintenance of certain Parks and Public Works, and for Drainage Works on the Rivers Shannon and Suck."

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) moved to reduce the sum by £500, arguing that, as the Government had forced the Home Rule Bill through the House, and thereby separated the financial arrangements between the two countries, it was unfair to call upon the taxpayers of Great Britain to pay for the acquisition of new sites and for the erection of new buildings in Ireland necessary to the government of that country. The matters referring to the Coastguard and Inland Revenue might be left, but his objection certainly applied to the erection of new Constabulary barracks and other buildings. The cost of this new work should be left to the Irish people under the new Parliament, and if the Government had had the strength of their convictions they would have taken that course. It was very unfair that his constituents should be taxed in this regard; and although he acknowledged that they must pay for the present what was necessary to maintain the buildings, it was not reasonable that they should be called upon to supply new sites and buildings for the purpose of carrying on this work.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Purchase of Sites and Buildings, be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Bartley.)

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham), who was indistinctly heard, was understood to say that the services referred to would remain under Imperial control. He hoped the hon. Member would be satisfied with having made his protest, and he was obliged to him for not having occupied much time.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) urged that it was the custom of every Government to ask for more money for England than was expended there. In the last Appropriation Account, £16,000 was saved in respect of this Vote, and £8,000 was expended.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the whole Vote could not now be discussed.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, that the hon. Member who moved the Amendment had had strong support in his arguments from the Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), who had urged that certain things in which the Irish Members were interested ought to be left for the consideration of the Home Rule Parliament. That was not his own position. He would like to know why it was necessary to provide new Constabulary barracks at Rathfarnham, County Dublin, in respect of which he saw an item of £250, as the present one was a very substantial building?

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he must protest against the statement of the hon. and gallant Member as to the practice of the British Government in regard to Irish Estimates. The hon. Member's statements were not borne out by the figures which the Government had laid on the Table. While he admitted that the expenditure on Irish objects must now be more carefully watched than hitherto in view of the contingency of the success of the Government in their Home Rule policy, he would be most unwilling to see Ireland treated in the meantime in any churlish spirit and without due consideration being given to her just claims. He would, therefore, advise his hon. Friend to be content with the protest he had made, and not to take a Division upon his Amendment.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT, in reply to the hon. Member for South Tyrone, said that the ground was not required for a new Constabulary barracks, but merely to make the present one more secure and complete. As to the Estimates for Ireland for this year, he had kept them down as much as possible, so as not to have any surplus in respect of particular items of expenditure; but so much depended upon the state of the labour market and other circumstances that it was impossible to make an estimate of the exact sum required.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said, with regard to the item for £700 for a site for the Inland Revenue, he presumed it was for the purchase of some existing premises, and that some of the money would be spent upon alterations?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that was so, and that there would be a considerable saving when the alterations were made.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer could not act in an impartial spirit between the English and the Irish taxpayer. He naturally worked for his own side. The Irish people considered that both Parties, Conservative and Liberal, tried to rob them in different ways.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not now discussing the item before the Committee.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) remarked that, after having severed as far as it could by the Home Rule Bill its connection with Ireland, the House was asked to go on pouring capital into Ireland. It was proposed to spend money in acquiring Inland Revenue premises at Rathmines. In six years, if the Home Rule Bill passed, the House would have nothing to do with Inland Revenue in Ireland, and it was perfectly ridiculous to ask the House to make capital expenditure on the purchase of premises for which, after a few years, it would have no use whatever. If the House was to give up certain duties in Ireland it ought not to be called upon to pay anything in the form of capital expenditure on the establishments required to levy the duties. If the Government needed fresh premises they could hire a house.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I entirely agree with the doctrine laid down by the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), that it becomes our duty as British Representatives to look with the greatest possible care at all new expenditure in Ireland, and all the more because we now have it on the authority of the Government that the principle on which repatriation of expenditure between Ireland and Great Britain is to be carried out is that Ireland should pay what it pays now. On that basis everything we spend in Ireland is capitalised for the benefit of Ireland and credited to Ireland. If we are now the gainers we shall not only now have to pay for our present generosity, but shall have to pay permanently. We have, therefore, a double interest in seeing that economy is enforced in regard to new expenditure. I agree with those who have spoken that we need not take account of such expenditure as the increase for the Coastguard, but, as regards the other expenditure, Members opposite who have called attention to it have been perfectly within their rights. I meant to ask my hon. Friend the Chief Secretary what will become of these valuable buildings which are being kept up at our expense in Ireland after we have done with them? I really was never able, after the most careful study of the Home Rule Bill, to find out what was the intention in regard to this matter. Take the Vote with which we are dealing. Who will get the £950 after the Inland Revenue has been placed in the hands of the Irish people? I really think that is a question which has a very important bearing on this Vote. Of course, if the Chief Secretary can assure us that our property in all these buildings will remain intact after the Bill has passed, and that we shall be able to make the best bargain we can with the Irish Government, or to sell in the open market, there will be some reason why we should pass over the present demand. I should like to know, however, what will be the position of these buildings after we have paid for them if the Home Rule Bill becomes law?

MR. J. MORLEY: As to the principle which my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer laid down—namely, that the Committee ought to scrutinise Irish Votes with extra care in view of the possible changes in Ireland, I do not complain of that principle. But, of course, my right hon. Friends will concede that Ireland must be kept going, and these three items are thought to be desirable in the interests of Ireland as the Administration now subsists. In answer to my right hon. Friend's question, I would remind him at the end of six years, and not till then, there is to be a complete review of the financial arrangements and relations between Great Britain and Ireland, and that will be the time at which the value of these buildings will have to be considered. The precise terms on which they will be handed over to the Irish Government will be a most important matter for consideration.

MR. GOSCHEN: Will that apply to Post Office buildings?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I must point out that we have now reached a very serious question, because it is evident that there has been a very important causus omissus in the Home Rule Bill. The Post Office expenditure, I suppose, is to be reviewed at the end of six years as well as all the others, but I would take the case of the barracks. That, at all events, is a very clear case. At the end of six years the intention of the Government is that we should no longer have any interest in the Constabulary, which would, as soon as possible, be disestablished. What, then, is to become of these enormous barracks and buildings which have been erected at the expense of the United Kingdom? Are they to go to the Irish Government without any return to us? My right hon. Friend says that the matter ought to be considered and settled at the end of six years; but have not the Government made up their minds on the point already? This is another provisional point in the Bill. I very much regret that we had not an opportunity of discussing it when we had the Bill before us; but that is not owing to any fault of ours. I think, under the circumstances, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite will reconsider the advice he gave to the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley). I think we ought to vote against every item of expenditure proposed by the Government on buildings in Ireland, inasmuch as the Government have not the least idea what is to become of these buildings.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not know whether it is in Order, Mr. Mellor, for Gentlemen to rediscuss the Home Rule Bill. [Opposition cries of "No!"] If so, I conceive that the whole financial arrangement will be open to rediscussion. I have no objection whatever; and if the 82 days already devoted to the Bill swell out to 100 or 150 days I cannot help it. Only I should like to understand, Sir, whether it is in Order, because, if so, we must provide ourselves with the requisite Papers and materials.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): On the point of Order, I submit that we are not trying to discuss the financial relations.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! It is perfectly plain that it is not in Order to discuss the Financial Clauses of the Home Rule Bill in this Committee. Of course, the question may be raised whether this is a permanent or a temporary improvement, but it would be out of Order to go into the Home Rule Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN: On the point of Order, Mr. Mellor, should we be entitled to argue that certain expenditure would be desirable if it were in the nature of capital expenditure, and that such expenditure would be unfair to this country? We are now on Estimates involving, to a certain extent, capital expenditure in Ireland. We hope we may be allowed to discuss that from the new point of view, as it is possible that capital expenditure will now have to be treated in a totally different manner from the capital expenditure hitherto incurred. I quite agree that we cannot discuss the financial relations between the two countries—that is to say, as to whether Ireland or England pays too much; but I trust that we may be allowed to take into consideration the different state of things that may arise under the Home Rule Bill.

MR. J. MORLEY: On the principle laid down by my right hon. Friend opposite, there is no reason why we should not on all Votes discuss all imaginary or possible contingencies. I must remind my right hon. Friend that the Bill has not yet passed into law. If the Home Rule Bill had become the Home Rule Act, I could understand the position; but I do not think that on a merely hypothetical contingency it is possible to bring up every item of expenditure. I cannot see how you are going to draw a distinction between capital expenditure and other expenditure, and I am bound to say I must protest against the course that is being followed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I do not quite understand the line taken up by the Chief Secretary. He admits, of course, that there is a contingency which it is justifiable to contemplate when discussing the Estimates, and that there are other contingencies so absolutely remote, so shadowy, so outside the purview of any practical statesman, that it would be a mere waste of time for us to take them into account when we are dealing with the Estimates. The point we have to determine now is one which will be closely affected by the financial arrangement to be established by the Home Rule Bill. The right hon. Gentleman did not show his usual apprehension when he said he could draw no distinction between capital and ordinary expenditure. It is evident that such a distinction is absolutely vital. The question of the amount we are to give to Ireland for purposes of the expenditure within the year is naturally outside any Home Rule proposal, and the discussion would be irrelevant if annual items only were involved. But when we come to capital expenditure of large amount, when we are taking out of the Imperial Treasury relatively large sums, and spending them in Ireland, it becomes important to know whether, if Home Rule passes, these sums are to be handed over to the new Irish Government, and also whether there is any probability of the Home Rule Bill passing? Are the Government going to take up the position that, in spite of the vote of last Friday night, the chances of Home Rule are so remote that no sane politician would take them into account? If they declare that this is their view, I should be inclined to agree with them, and I should vote with them in the coming Division. If, however, on the other hand, they take the view that Home Rule is a matter which cannot be long deferred, I say it is absolutely incumbent on us to see that we do not, by rashly voting money now, hand over large capital sums, which will ultimately have to be dealt with, not by the Imperial Parliament, but by the Home Rule Parliament.

MR. J. MORLEY: I may inform the right hon. Gentleman that whilst he was absent his right hon. Colleague advised the Mover of the Amendment to be content with making a protest, and not to take a Division.

MR. BARTLEY said, that since that advice was given the circumstances had changed by the information which had been given to the Committee, and he must reserve to himself the right to divide if he thought proper to do so.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, a very simple question had been put, and the whole Treasury Bench had been puzzled by it; and because they could not answer it on the spot they desired to raise a point of Order. The Committee was asked to vote £950 for capital expenditure on the Revenue Office at Kilkenny. In the event of the Home Rule Bill coming into operation, he wished to know whose property the freehold would be when the arrangement was made?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot go into the Home Rule Bill on these items. Of course, I cannot say that it is out of Order for an hon. Member to say—"I do not vote for this, because many years hence, or a few years hence, the building may cease to be the property of the country," but that is not the question we are now on. I wish to point out to the Committee that it is absolutely necessary to keep to the proper context of these items.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On the point of Order, Sir, I would remind you of a case which arose last year, or the year before. A very vigorous attack was made by the then Opposition on certain proposed capital expenditure upon buildings required for the British Resident at Cairo, the whole basis of the attack being that the British occupation in Cairo was to be of a temporary character, and that, therefore, capital expenditure should not be indulged in.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I must suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that his memory is not quite accurate. I took part in the Debate to which he refers, and the question was not respecting the temporary occupation of Egypt, but with regard to the erection of a permanent Embassy at Berlin. It was pointed out that we should be put to enormous cost if we erected a permanent building at Berlin, and that it would be cheaper to hire houses for Ambassadors than to erect them. The discussion had nothing to do with the temporary occupation of Egypt.

MR. GOSCHEN: Frequently, and not on one occasion only, the expenditure in Egypt has been discussed from a hypothetical point of view. The Estimates have constantly been argued with reference to the future policy of the Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: I was not present during the discussion which has been referred to between that case and the present. In the present case, we must regard Ireland as it is. It is impossible to go into the question of the possible passage of a Bill which may never pass the House of Lords. That would be introducing into this discussion an element which would raise an enormous question, and one of extreme difficulty, and altogether foreign to the nature of our proceedings.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, the Committee had no right to vote this £950 unless Members knew what was to become of it. They had no right to sit round the House, like Mr. Jabez Balfour's Directors, and take for granted everything that was said. He asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland to whom the buildings would belong if the money was voted?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he thought the Act furnished a reply to the hon. Member's question. By Section 35—

THE CHAIRMAN: What Act?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I mean the Home Rule Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is clearly out of Order.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES contended that Members were strictly within their right in discussing the fate of that portion of the Vote which related to future years—namely, the capital portion. Members were naturally anxious to know what was to become of the freehold premises after the Home Rule Bill had passed. The Government asked them to hand over an enormous sum as a bribe to gentlemen below the Gangway (the Irish Members).

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already ruled that this is out of Order.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether he was not in Order in giving his reasons for his objections?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is entitled to give his reasons; but I have already ruled that he cannot go into the details of the Home Rule Bill.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, his reasons were plain. There was part of this Vote which they never enjoyed the benefit of, and they had a right to oppose it. The Government had taken power to hand over these buildings to others, and he said they on that side were not willing that their capital should be invested for the purpose of having the buildings handed over afterwards to gentlemen below the Gangway. [Cries of "Order!"] He did not for a moment suppose that these hon. Gentlemen would put public money into their private pockets; they all knew that they were always ready to do their duty—they were ready to get as much money as possible; but they on their side had a duty to perform to their constituents, and if they passed this Vote without a Division it would form a precedent that they were willing, notwithstanding altered circumstances, to provide for the needs of Ireland for all time.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, they (the Irish Members) had voted for British expenditure which was necessary, and they were ready to vote against an expenditure that might be considered unreasonable. In this case the sum was small; the need was, he understood, somewhat urgent, and he thought hon. Members might allow the Vote to pass.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, they were asked by this Vote to lay down a precedent. They had to remember that they were not to deal with Ireland as in the past. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) laid down a good rule with regard to voting money for current expenditure; but when they came to vote it as capital, they should look upon it in a different light. The Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) said he could not see the difference between money for current expenditure and capital expenditure. Surely that was the case of the bankrupt—the man who could not make out the difference between what was current expenditure and what was capital, and who, consequently, went to the wall. That should be considered here, and he would like to know from the Chief Secretary whether this rule was to apply to other cases as well as that which was before them? He did not want to discuss the matter as if they were discussing the Home Rule Bill; but he hoped this was not to be regarded as a precedent.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said, he hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would get them out of the difficulty, because the case before the Committee was one which, it seemed to him, emphasised the principle of the discussion that had taken place. He understood the Secretary to the Treasury to say that the Vote was for the alteration of premises occupied by the Inland Revenue officials at Kilkenny, and rented by them. Why should they not strike out the £500 which, as he understood, was not necessary for keeping the concern going? In view of possible contingencies, this appeared to him to be unnecessary capital expenditure, and such expenditure should be avoided as far as possible. No one would fail in agreeing with him that as the amount of expenditure increased the balance left was so much less. He had no desire to add to the difficulty of the position in these particular matters, but he was bound to say this was a matter of very great importance, and he did feel that this was hardly a time at which to enter upon the purchase of premises for the purposes of the Government. That was the question raised in this case.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the question was one of providing proper premises for the officers of Inland Revenue at this place. The present premises were in an insanitary condition, and must be given up, and other premises taken. They were getting these premises at a ground rent of £28 on condition that £700 should be spent in alterations.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Is that purchase money?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT was understood to say that was included. The buildings would require alterations to meet the necessities of the men. But so far as concerned the premises in which the men worked, it was quite impossible they could remain there; the men must leave. The Committee would see, therefore, that there were special circumstances in this case, and he did not think it was a time at which they were entitled to enter into the general question raised by the Home Rule Bill.

MR. HANBURY said, he would like to ask if they were going to spend this money, or a large portion of it, on a rented house?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the house was subject to a ground rent of £28.

SIR T. LEA said, he was not quite sure that he and his friends could take the same view as Members opposite on this matter. They were going to give Home Rule to Ireland. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN : Order, order ! I have already stated that hon. Members cannot go into the Home Rule Question.

SIR T. LEA said, he bowed to the ruling of the Chair. He merely wished to say that his constituents were anxious to get any advantage they could from this House. They were not anxious to be deprived of its protection, and it was his duty to object to any step that tended to an alteration in the present system of control in these matters.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, what the hon. Baronet had just said might be good enough from the point of view of Irish Members. But the question the Government had been asked was a very simple one, and they ought not to remain in doubt upon it. It was a question involving only a comparatively small sum ; but supposing they should have a question involving £2,000,000 ? It seemed to him that the precedent was a serious matter, and he was inclined to think that, as the Secretary to the Treasury had said as much as he could about the matter, the Chief Secretary should now give them a reply which, he hoped, would be more satisfactory.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 60 ; Noes 146.—(Division List, No. 290.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wanted to ask a question with regard to the Royal Hibernian Military School. There had been an outbreak of fever at that institution and a Committee was appointed. He would like to know whether the Committee had reported ; and, if so, whether any proposals made in regard to the sanitary arrangements of the school were being carried out ? It did not appear to him that any money was being taken for the purpose.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the Committee had reported, the water supply of the school being said to be very defective. He could assure the hon. Member that the matter was having attention.

MR. JACKSON said, he would like to ask whether any decision had been come to with regard to the proposal to erect new barracks in the Phoenix Park, Dublin ? A considerable sum had been voted, but there had been no expenditure during the two years that had elapsed. If there had been any change of policy, and it had been decided not to build the barracks, the item put down in the Estimates for it should be omitted.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, this was a matter to which he had paid attention. As the right hon. Gentleman knew, a site had been fixed upon in a corner of the Park for the erection of the barracks. From information he had received, however, he had come to the conclusion that a building on the spot indicated would be very unsightly, and that it would arouse feelings of strong dissatisfaction among the people of Dublin. He had, therefore, thought it would be well to look about for some other site for the purpose—a site which would be equally convenient, and which would not be open to the objection that would be taken in this case. They had found great difficulty in discovering within the Park itself any piece of ground suitable, and his own view was that it would be better to acquire land outside the Park near Chapelizod rather than interfere with the beauty of the Park. At the same time, he quite agreed that this barrack was needed for the Constabulary, and it was especially desirable it should be near the Park. If they could not find a site on the Chapelizod Road they might have to fall back upon some other place in the Park, and possibly the old site. He hoped the hon. Member would not think there was anything wrong in keeping the question open for another year. He did not say it would be kept open for another year, because he believed a decision would be arrived at in a few weeks.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, the right hon. Gentleman had used the word "Constabulary." Did he mean the Metropolitan Police ?

MR. J. MORLEY : Yes, the Metropolitan Police.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) complained that the money voted for specific purposes was not spent on these purposes. This had been the practice for years, and he thought it was a wrong state of affairs to make such a system habitual. It was giving an enormous temptation to Irish officials to spend this money on whatever they liked. The money was transferred from one object to another in a perfectly reckless manner, and so long as this was the case the money would be spent irregularly.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) desired to raise a question of some importance to the citizens of Dublin—namely, the condition of the Green Street Court House, and the proposal the Government made in regard to it. There was a sum of £1,000 in this Vote as a grant in aid for the improvement of the Green Street Court House. During the last Session this question was before the House, and it was proved in the Debates upon it that it was a building that could not be improved. The highest sanitary engineers in the City of Dublin declared it to be unfit for human occupation, and yet the Government—or rather because the previous Government failed to bring about a settlement with the Corporation and the County Jury—were now going to throw good money into what was just a pit. It would do no good, the money would be absolutely wasted, and on that ground he proposed to move to disallow this Vote altogether. Green Street Court House was a Crown Court House, and it was also a City Court House. That was to say Crown cases were tried there by the Judges of Assize, and the Recorder of Dublin sat there almost permanently trying civil bills and criminal cases from the city. Many years ago a proposal was made to build a new Court House for Dublin. The estimate, in the first place, was £39,000, and the Government proposed to pay one-third, namely £13,000, as their contribution to the cost. The arrangement was that the County of Dublin Grand Jury, in view of the fact that they were interested in the Court House, should pay a second third, and the City, which by the way used the Court House more than either the Crown or the County of Dublin, should pay the remainder. That was an absolutely fair arrangement, and if the Corporation had not allowed political motives to dominate public considerations that new Court House would have been built, and there would have been an enormous expenditure for the benefit of the artisans of Dublin; these cases would not have to be tried in an insanitary building, and a legitimate and fair settlement might have been arrived at. It so happened at the time, however, that there was political trouble in the county, and the Lord Mayor of Dublin was struck out of the Commission by the Lord Lieutenant of the day. This was ancient history, but it lay at the bottom of the whole case. He did not argue whether it was right or wrong, but because the Government took that step the Corporation withdrew from their part of the bargain and refused to contribute the £13,000 it was proposed they should contribute towards building the new Court House. There was nothing like the Green Street Court House in the Kingdom. He saw an hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bodkin), who he was sure would agree with the whole of his professional brethren and the sanitary engineers of the City of Dublin that it was not a pleasant place to spend a day in. He (Mr. Russell) had had personal experience of that Court House. It was his fortune to spend nine consecutive days in it as a special juror; he had sat in the Court House on Licensing Sessions, and he could say he had never sat five hours in the place without feeling the worse for it, whilst lawyers had had serious illnesses which their physicians directly traced to the insanitary condition of the building. What was proposed to be done? Because the Government could not arrange with the Corporation and the Corporation chose to play this dog-in-the-manger policy it was proposed to patch up this old building. Lord Chief Justice O'Brien last year used these words, which he quoted from Hansard, containing the Report of the previous references to this matter—

“If the responsibility for the Court House was conjoint the disgrace equally belonged to the Corporation and the Government. To-day it was impossible to move or breathe in the Court. The place was pervaded by a mephitic atmosphere. If he did not find before the next Commission that some practical move was taken to remedy the state of things, he would summon a meeting of the Common Law Judges and take counsel with his brethren as to whether they could not go elsewhere.”

This matter was raised by him (Mr. Russell) in a question to the Chief Secretary (and which contained the above quotation) on the 15th February, 1892. A little later on the Member for Mid Tyrone (Mr. M. J. Kenny) asked the then Chief Secretary the right hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Jackson) a question on the subject, and he gave the following extract in his question:—

"When the jury was sworn one of the jurors complained of a great draught in the jury box. The Lord Chief Justice said the special jurors of Dublin should not be allowed to get the influenza, and ordered that the windows should be closed.

To order the window to be closed was one thing, getting it closed was another.

"One of the jurors tried to close the window near the jury box, but was unable to do so.

"The Lord Chief Justice: This is scandalous. This state of things is an outrage upon civilisation."

On the 1st March, 1892, one of the Members for Kerry (Mr. Kilbride), on behalf of the Member for Mid Tyrone (Mr. M. J. Kenney), asked the Chief Secretary the following question:—

"If it has been arranged that the Commission of Oyer and Terminer and General Gaol Delivery hitherto held in the Green Street Court House, Dublin, will in future be held in the Four Courts, if the criminal and civil business of the Recorder of the City of Dublin is to be discharged as heretofore at Green Street; whether Mr. W. Kaye Perry, C.E., has reported to the Lord Chief Justice that Green Street Court House is unfit for human occupation; and whether the Irish Government refused to do anything to replace the present Court-house unless there is a local contribution of two-thirds of the total amount of the estimated cost?"

The Chief Secretary (Mr. Jackson) replied—

"No general arrangement of the nature indicated in the first paragraph has been come to; but it has been decided to hold the next Commission sitting at the Four Courts. This decision does not include the business of the Recorder. Mr. Kaye Perry has, I understand, reported to the effect indicated. It is not the fact that the Irish Government refused to do anything to replace the present Court House. As I have already stated, they are willing to ask the Treasury to revive the charge sanctioned in 1883, which was accepted at that time as satisfactory by all parties concerned, but from which the Corporation of Dublin subsequently withdrew."

He thought that that was sufficient proof, at all events, of the insanitary state of this Court House, and yet in face of all these facts the Government proposed to give £1,000 to patch up this wretched building. It was simply throwing away the money. It was perfectly impossible to patch up the Court House. It was situate in the worst part of the City; it was inconvenient, so far as the locality was concerned, to the lawyers; it was inconvenient to the general public, and it was not safe for the public. The building ought to be demolished and a new Court House erected, but the Government were proposing to simply cover this wretched wound. They would not make the place sanitary by the expenditure of this £1,000, and he did not know how much the Corporation were proposing to spend upon it.

MR. J. MORLEY: £2,000 in addition to this £1,000.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL did not care how much or how little was spent upon it; it would be impossible to make it a decent place for people who had to spend their time in it. This quarrel to which he had referred took place in 1883—in the pre-union of hearts days; and would it not be worth while for the Chief Secretary to see whether it was not possible to renew the old arrangement, or to make some new arrangement upon this question? Considering the use which the Government made of the Court House he regarded the proposal made by the Government in 1883 as a perfectly reasonable one. The Recorder sat in Green Street for eight months out of the 12, disposing of City cases; and the City of Dublin ought to pay a larger contribution than the Government, which simply used the Court House now and then; and if the County of Dublin had responsibilities in connection with the matter they ought to be compelled to meet them. The County did not stand in the way of carrying out the proposal of 1883, and he did not think any difficulty would arise in connection with the County of Dublin Grand Jury. The Committee ought not to sanction the spending of this £1,000 on an object which could never be achieved. The Government were now on the best terms with the Corporation of Dublin, and they ought to endeavour to come to some arrangement with them. For his part he thought the present Corporation was much more efficient than that of 1883, and as the original cause of the quarrel had been removed and the name of the Lord Mayor restored to the Commission, he did not see any difficulty in arriving at a settlement of the question. He begged to move that the Vote be reduced by £1,000 in respect of the Green Street Court House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item B, New Works and Alterations, be reduced by £1,000, in respect of Green Street Court House."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, they had to look upon all sides of this question. It was not a matter altogether for the Government; in fact, it was a matter in which the Government had very little control. This matter rested more or less with the Corporation, in whose hands was the choice of a site. The Corporation after, he supposed, due consideration, had decided upon the Green Street site, and they had plans prepared which, after considerable discussion and consideration of the two sites, the Board of Works, as representing the Government, had agreed to. The other site discussed—namely, the Four Courts, would have been much more convenient to the Judge and the lawyers, and perhaps to the public men; but in this matter they had considered the wishes of the Corporation. On the 28th of August last, the Lord Chief Justice and several other representative men went through the plans and assented to the proposal, which, as he had said, were agreed to by the Board of Works, and by the Grand Jury also, so that it would be very difficult for the Government to act like a dog-in-the-manger, and say they would have nothing to do with this proposal. He supposed the Lord Chief Justice, and other gentlemen who visited the place and examined the plans, were satisfied that the place could be made suitable for its purpose, and he trusted, therefore, the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his objection to the Vote.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.) said, he considered that the Green Street Court House was very bad, but at the same time he was strongly of opinion that a great deal could be done with £3,000. It would, at all events, suffice to replace the window fastening, which the Lord Chief Justice, with that moderation of language which characterised him, had described as "an outrage on civilisation." The incident would give some idea of what was meant by outrage when used by his Lordship in the future. Certainly, the argument of the speech of the hon. Member (Mr. Russell) was most creditable. A few moments before he argued that there should be no capital expenditure, because they were going to get Home Rule. The hon. Gentleman said there should be no capital expenditure in reference to the building of a police barrack.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he wanted to know who would be the owner in certain eventualities?

MR. BODKIN said, the hon. Gentleman objected to the former Vote, because it was capital expenditure. He took his objection to this because it was not capital expenditure. He (Mr. Bodkin) believed they would not be long without a new Court House after they got Home Rule. In the meantime something should be done for all those attending the Green Street Court House, and he believed the best thing that could be done was to carry out the proposal which had been referred to.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): The hon. Gentleman, if he had been more continuously in the House, would not have accused my hon. Friend with being inconsistent. The fact is, my hon. Friend raised the previous point as to the capital expenditure on one ground, and he is now opposing it on another ground. His first objection to capital expenditure was that it would be thrown away, so far as the British taxpayer is concerned, because the property might pass into other hands. His objection to the present capital expenditure is, that it will be thrown away because it is entirely useless. That is not in the least inconsistent. A further argument against this particular expenditure, that it is capital expenditure which ought to be met by the Irish Government, has been supplied by the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, who has stated that when the Irish Government had the power and had our money, they are going to spend a portion of it in building a new and "illigant" Court House, somewhere outside the neighbourhood of Green Street. Well, Sir, I say that under these circumstances my hon. Friends are perfectly consistent. I very much regret that my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has left the House, because this is a matter on which I should have much liked to take his opinion. Some years ago, when I first entered the House, I took a great deal of interest in that portion of the Estimates which deals with the expenditure of Metropolitan Court Houses and Courts of Law. I moved a great number of Amendments to the Estimates on that subject. Circumstances prevented me continuing my investigations on the point, but my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board took them up, and I venture to say there has been no more eager advocate of economy of the public money with regard to this class of expenditure than he. His contention was that no money ought to be spent on these Court Houses other than by the Local Authorities. I think it a great hardship on my constituents, and on other constituencies, that while we do not get a single farthing from the Government ourselves, while we are made to pay heavier rates because Government officials are so highly paid, those officials come down and draw the rates for Government property, although at the same time we are called upon to pay for capital expenditure in London, Dublin, and other parts of the country. I admit that there has been in the past some reason for sharing the expenditure in the present case, inasmuch as the Government have shared the accommodation. The Assize Courts have been held there, and there is no doubt that is a ground for contributing to the expenditure, although I believe the contribution would be much better made if made in the form of rent for the house for the time for which the Court is used. That claim for expenditure entirely disappears, in view of the fact that has been stated by my hon. Friend behind me. The Judges of the land will not sit in this Court, and, under these circumstances, I cannot conceive why we should go on paying for buildings from which we derive no advantage. I intend to revive this question of Imperial expenditure on local Courts. The most important case is that of London, but we should not be able to deal with London if we did not deal also with Dublin.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, he did not conceive how the Board of Works in Ireland could lend their sanction for a moment to this extraordinary proposal. He could not for a moment believe that a Board of Works official had led the Government to suppose that by an expenditure of £3,000 the Court House could be placed in a sanitary condition or in a fit state for carrying on the business that was to be conducted there in the future. He should like to know whether the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir J. T. Hibbert) was prepared to give any guarantee to the House that the expenditure of this money would place the premises either in a sanitary condition or in such a condition that there would be no complaints whatever from the barristers or suitors? The Corporation of Dublin was now trying to escape from the duty which fell on most other Corporations, and nearly all Local Authorities, of providing proper places for the administration of justice.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, that if there were one body more than another that he was inclined to distrust, it was the Irish Board of Works. Ireland was bestrewn with memorials of the failures of the Board of Works. He was very glad to see that the attractions of "another place" had palled upon the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), and that, having just returned to the House, he appeared to concur with him (Mr. Russell) in this opinion. The mere fact that the Board of Works had authorised or approved of this expenditure did not influence his judgment one iota. Seeing that they approved of it, it was very likely that it was wrong expenditure, and bad. The next reason why this expenditure had been incurred by the Government was the fact that the Lord Chief Justice had been down to Green Street. The Lord Chief Justice and the Board of Works, the Grand Jury and the Corporation, all approved, and, therefore, it was determined to give the money. That was the position of the right hon. Gentleman. Well, no one had greater respect for the Lord Chief Justice than he had in a matter of law, and in some other matters he would take his Lordship's opinion very much sooner than he would take the opinion of most people in Ireland; but, most assuredly, he should not take his opinion on sanitary science. The Lord Chief Justice had to sit in that Court a few days in the year, but the public had to sit there for months. It did not follow because the Lord Chief Justice thought this expenditure better than nothing, that he would not prefer a new building. As to the Grand Jury, he supposed they merely saw the plans, and thought they would be an improvement upon the present Court House. And in regard to the Corporation it was now, no doubt, a more efficient body than it was in 1883, when this squabble took place. There was one gentleman on it who had full right and title to speak on this as a sanitary engineer, he meant Mr. Maguire; but he did not think the Corporation, as a Corporation, knew anything about sanitary science, and he should not be inclined to take its opinion upon any improvement of this kind. To his mind, what should be done is this—the Judges should sit in the Four Courts, which they could legally do. The Lord Chief Justice and the Lord Chief Baron had done it—they had refused to sit in the pestilential hole in Green Street, and had sat in the Four Courts, leaving the Recorder and the city business to this Court House. The Government should remove Crown business to the Four Courts and leave the Court House to the Corporation—who had refused to come to terms. The money it was proposed to spend on this Court House was pure and unadulterated waste—throwing good money after bad. Were the Board of Works going to control this expenditure?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: No.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Then who is to control it?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: It is subject to their inspection and approval.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he had not the slightest faith in the control of the Board of Works of Dublin. He would rather trust the Corporation engineer than the engineer of the Board of Works. If the Board of Works did not control it the Corporation must. He protested against their sanctioning this expenditure of £1,000 without proper Government control.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, that in this case a Vote was to be taken for the spending of a considerable sum of money in order to do that which the local ratepayers in England did wholly on their own responsibility. The President of the Local Government Board had opposed this kind of Vote on a previous occasion, and if the right hon. Gentleman was sincere—as no doubt he was—he should now use his influence to prevent an injurious system being pursued by the Government. He (Mr. Williams) objected to the Vote on another ground. It was an expenditure of a considerable sum of money on a purpose which was almost certain to fail. Patching up an old and unstable and insanitary building of this kind seldom or never answered. He did not say that without some reason, for as a member, for a considerable number of years, of a Local Authority, he had had great experience of the expenditure of money on purposes of this kind. In Birmingham for 40 years very large sums of money had been spent on a certain building. During the past two or three years no less than £9,000 had been spent on it to correct inherent and incurable defects entirely without success. He happened to have been in the Court under discussion once in his life in an entirely honorary capacity, and he was bound to say that he never saw a more miserable place in his life. Though he had no special skill in architecture it was plain that the only possible way to cure defects in the Court was to pull it down right to the ground and erect a new building in its place. He was satisfied that this was a waste of the taxpayers' money. No good at all was likely to result from the outlay proposed, and if the hon. Gentleman went to a Division he (Mr. Williams) should certainly support him.

Question put.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he observed in the Estimates an item of £4,650 for the building of a wall at the Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum. He knew this asylum, and knew the wall, and was convinced the sum asked for was a most exorbitant one for the rebuilding. But he had risen for the purpose of moving to reduce the Vote for National Education buildings in Ireland by £100, in order to call attention to the insanitary state of the Marlborough Street Training College, which was in a most wretched condition. This College had been in existence almost since the foundation of the National system of education. It consisted, as far as the dwelling-house accommodation was concerned, of two houses, one—that for females—was in Great George Street, and the other in Talbot Street. Since the formation of this College there had been three offshoots from it on denominational lines. The House had voted large sums of money to it, and large sums had been received to enable the authorities to erect splendid buildings which had been in every way adequately provided. But when they came to the Training College itself it was in a most miserable condition.

MR. J. MORLEY pointed out that the grant for the Marlborough Training College was not included in the Vote under consideration.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL thought it was included in the Literary Schools Vote. The houses in Talbot Street and Marlborough Street were in an utterly unfit sanitary condition, and unsuitable for a College of the kind for which they were used. Some of the female teachers had been seriously ill as a result of the insanitary state of the Great George Street School, and the place had been visited by the Sanitary Inspector. He thought it very unfair if they were going to provide the Denominational Colleges with everything they required and leave the College of the Board itself that the Government were directly responsible for in an insanitary condition. He had the other day received a complaint from the Lady Superintendent that she had been seriously ill, and he had himself inspected the house, and found it in bad repair. Indeed, both houses were in a wretched state, and utterly unsuited for Colleges. So long, however, as they were to be retained, he thought they ought to be put into a proper sanitary condition. He begged to move the reduction standing in his name.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The question raised by the hon. Member does not arise on this Vote. The College is provided for out of the Vote for Irish Education.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he only wished to know where to raise it. A Training College could not be called a model school. Where could the question be raised?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: On Class IV., Vote 11.

MR. JACKSON thought the question could be raised on this Vote if not on this particular sub-head.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he would withdraw the Motion for the present, and move it again later on.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished to call attention to the manner in which the money provided for National school buildings in Ireland was expended. Last year there was a Vote of £30,000 provided, of which only £24,283 was expended, leaving something over £5,000 unused. The Commissioners of National Education stated in their Annual Report that this undesirable result was in a great measure due to the system under which grants were sanctioned. The Commissioners had no power to control the expenditure of the money. He would like to ask the Government—who he did not suppose desired to perpetuate a system which undoubtedly led to complication of the Estimates—whether they intended to take any action on the portion of the Commissioners' Report referring to this matter, in order that the evils and difficulties resulting from it might be avoided in future?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, it was quite true that a great difficulty did arise from the uncertainty of expenditure of the money voted for National school buildings in Ireland. The sum voted each year for the last three years had been £40,000, and that had been expended during the first two years, but not in the third year. It depended entirely on the managers of schools whether the money was spent or not. The Board of Works had no control over the managers in the matter of expenditure, and it would be a very good thing if some better plan could be devised for exercising control over the actual expenditure of the money provided for the erection of school buildings in Ireland.

MR. JACKSON said, when he was Chief Secretary he had a good deal to do with this question. He found the Commissioners being pressed for grants which they were precluded from making owing to the limited amount of the grants, and in consequence of that his Government increased the amount to £40,000 a year for three years. To his surprise that sum was only expended for two years, and as in the third year the full sum provided was not claimed in grants, the Vote was then reduced to £30,000. Now it appeared that even that sum was not spent, though the Board of Works stated that sanctions had been given by the National Education Commissioners for nearly £60,000. He would venture to suggest that they had arrived at a point when the sanctioning of a loan should be made conditional on a guarantee being given that actual work on the school should be begun and completed within a certain specified time. There should be some such pressure put on the managers of schools, because it was inconvenient for the Treasury not to know the amount of money which would be required each year.

COLONEL NOLAN : There is too much pressure on the managers. They have to raise a certain portion of the required amount by public subscription in order to obtain the grant.

MR. JACKSON : The managers should make sure of subscription to the necessary amount before getting the sanction of the National Education Board for a loan. It would, in his opinion, be a great improvement if the Commissioners made it a condition before sanctioning a grant that the managers of the school should come under an obligation with regard to the time for the commencement and completion of the work.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that the funds for the erection of schools in Ireland had to be raised partly by subscription, and often managers had to wait a long time for those subscriptions. If the course suggested by two previous speakers were adopted it might nearly stop school building in Ireland.

SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.) said he wished to draw attention to the condition of Queen's College, Belfast. The success of that College had been most marked in the highest branches of education. He was sorry the Colleges in Galway and Cork did not extend their work so far as could be desired, but that was attributable, he thought, to the terrible agricultural depression of late years. The College in Belfast, however, had made extraordinary strides, not only in the efficiency of its various classes, but in the increase in the number of students attending the classes. But although the City of Belfast had more than doubled in size since the College was founded, with the exception of a detached laboratory and anatomic room, there had been no addition made to the College until last year or the year before, after the matter was fully gone into and representations had been made to the late Government. The late Government agreed to contribute a moiety of the cost of a suitable laboratory, but the necessary additions had only been partially completed, and he regretted to find this year that there was no sum adequate for the purpose. The late Government thought they went as far as they could in granting £4,300, but the amount really required was £9,000, and this he thought the Government might well supply for the completion and proper equipment of the new building, seeing that the inhabitants of Belfast had from time to time contributed in the shape of exhibitions and prizes no less than £26,000, and that they were now erecting outside students' rooms at a cost of some £5,000. Altogether £31,000 had been found by the outside public—although the public ought not to be called upon, having regard to the fact that the College had been established by Act of Parliament. The success of the College educationally had been most marked. This was recognised every year by public examiners in England who had to examine the students who had matriculated there. Scarcely a year passed without special reference being made to the great ability and talent turned out by this University, and a large proportion of Civil Service appointments was carried off by Belfast Queen's College men. He, therefore, felt that this College deserved the greatest consideration at the hands of the Government, whichever side might be in office. The Vote under consideration amounted to £212,000, and Belfast was now asking for only some £5,000. This was a small sum to ask for when they remembered that Ireland's contribution to the Imperial Revenue was £8,306,576, of which Belfast contributed £3,205,167, or 38 per cent. If Belfast got its fair proportion back again it would receive £76,000. He might say that this classroom question was thrust on them through the Sanitary Inspector condemning the old quarters where the students worked. The students, therefore, were between two stools. They were put out of one set of rooms and yet were not furnished with another. When they had regard to the immense increase of students in the University and the small demand made on successive Governments for the extension of the College, he hoped that the Treasury would see that the necessary funds were provided next year, so that the Principal and the Professors might look forward to having the necessary accommodation for pursuing their tuition with success. When he told the Committee that in the scientific class-rooms the old fashioned methods of demonstration were continued, that in connection with natural philosophy and applied mechanics there was not even a dynamo or gas engine in use, instruction being given orally in the way of descriptions rather than ocularly with the necessary scientific appliances, it would be seen how necessary it was to improve the equipment of the College.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he was ready to admit that the hon. Baronet had placed the case very fairly before the Committee, and no doubt from his own point of view he had made out a strong case. Looking at the matter from a Treasury point of view, however, he did not think the authorities of Belfast College had raised sufficient money from voluntary sources as compared with other districts. The students had raised £4,000 for rooms used for entertainments, though he did not complain of it. The hon. Baronet had stated that the people of Belfast had raised something like £30,000 for the College. That was a very large sum, of course, but in Manchester, in the case of the Victoria University, a far larger sum had been raised by public subscriptions, and the same could also be said of Cork in the case of the Queen's College. He therefore thought the Treasury had some right to ask the people of Belfast to assist themselves, and if that were done he had no doubt that the Treasury would be willing to do something further for the College. A claim for the expenditure of a large sum of money on the College had been laid before the Treasury under the late Government, and it was cut down by them to £4,000, or something like half. That sum had been spent on the College, and a further sum of £1,875 towards fitting and heating apparatus for the laboratories. Therefore the interests of Belfast had been well attended to by the Treasury, and under the circumstances he hoped the Committee would be satisfied with the discussion, and allow the Vote to pass.

*SIR E. HARLAND said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite, when he asked the people of Belfast to subscribe towards the College, had overlooked the fact that they had already spent over £30,000 on the College, and he thought that compared very favourably even with Manchester when the magnitude of the two cities was considered. The original Act, by which the Queen's College of Belfast had been founded, provided for the repairing, enlarging, and improvement of the buildings from time to time, and for the furnishing of the College from time to time; and as therefore these means were provided by Act of Parliament, he did not see why the public should be called upon to maintain the College. The new building was only half completed, and looked like a barn, and surely, in these days, when grants were given in aid of every description of education, to make us all ladies and gentlemen, it would be unfair and unjust to grudge an extra £5,000 for a College in which the most useful description of training was carried on, especially as an Act of Parliament clearly provided for this expenditure.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, the hon. Baronet was not asking for aid for a College which had failed in carrying out the intentions of those who founded it. A case could fairly be made out that the Colleges of Galway and Cork had failed, and a good case could be made out against spending any more of the public money on those institutions. But the Queen's College, Belfast, was a highly successful College, and apart altogether from the question of private benevolence Parliament was bound by the Act of Parliament establishing the College to repair, enlarge and improve the buildings from time to time. His hon. Friend the Member for North Belfast had made out a clear case. The late Government had spent so much on the buildings; that expenditure had left the buildings uncompleted, and therefore his hon. Friend was justified in asking for more. In the Report of the Queen's College, Belfast, for the year, the President complained that the College was still far from being properly equipped in respect to laboratories. The citizens of Belfast had contributed £32,000 towards the College, but that was not as much, according to the Secretary to the Treasury, as had been contributed in Cork. In the case of

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): I think it cannot be denied that the Queen's College, Belfast, has, of all the Irish Colleges, being most successful, and has most largely fulfilled the purposes for which it was founded. Looking at the Act which has been quoted, I think it is clear that responsibility in the matter rests with the Government. The Secretary to the Treasury said the late Government had proposals before them which they cut down by one-half. I believe that is true, and I believe also, speaking from memory, that the reason the proposal of the Irish Board of Works in this matter was cut down was because we thought it desirable to limit the amount to be put in the Estimates for the year to the sum that was likely to be expended in the year. The case laid before us was so overwhelming that it was impossible for us to refuse to do something. Reports from medical officers were furnished showing that cases of fainting had occurred amongst the students, if not amongst the teachers, owing to the unsanitary state of the rooms because of their crowded condition. It appeared to me then that the most practical way of dealing with the difficulty, so as to give the most immediate relief, was to divide the building into two, so that one part might be completed at one operation, and rendered available for use immediately after completion. But I cannot say that there was any positive refusal on our part to accept responsibility for the completion of the whole scheme as submitted. I think that if there is one class of expenditure which might be made in Ireland with advantage it is expenditure in the direction of promoting technical education, and you could find no more useful field for operation of that kind than in Belfast. Of course it is for the Government to make the last bargain they can with the people of Belfast; I do not blame them for trying to get public subscriptions for the College, but I say it would be false economy to refuse to spend £3,000 or £4,000 additional, which would really complete the scheme. Under the circumstances, I hope the Government will lend a favourable ear to the case made out by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Belfast.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I rise to call the attention of the Committee to the time which has been spent over this matter.

MR. JACKSON: I did not occupy 10 minutes.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Baronet opposite spoke for more than half-an-hour. The right hon. Gentleman himself had to admit that all the present Government are doing is carrying out the plans of the late Government, arranged probably by himself, which promise that certain portions of these buildings shall be completed and no more. Here we are wasting time on a matter with regard to which no proposal has been made. The hon. Baronet has not proposed, and cannot propose, that an additional sum should be asked for this purpose. The hon. Baronet quoted an Act of Parliament, and the hon. Member for South Tyrone got up and repeated that Act of Parliament over and over again.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Nothing of the kind.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We have spent over an hour this time, and I must therefore protest against time, of which we have so little now, being taken up with these discussions when no additional money can be obtained at the present time.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I hope these Estimates will be discussed quite irrespective of Party considerations. The Chancellor of the Exchequer must be aware that in the last Session of the last Parliament the whole of these Estimates were most indecently passed through this House without any discussion whatever. An abortive attempt was made by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) to raise discussions, but the hon. Member was snuffed out by his Party—they were so anxious to get to the General Election. We are not in any particular hurry now, and we ought to have legitimate debate on the Estimates. I admit that this item has occupied a long time—[“Hear, hear!”]—but Members of the Government must remember that there are Members who have not had for a long time the opportunity of bringing to account the Executive Government, either the present or the past. I hope hon. Members will not be prohibited from doing their duty to their constituents, but will make such observations and ask such explanations from the Government as they are entitled to.

Mr. J. Morley rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Original Question be now put."

Original Question put accordingly.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

COLONEL NOLAN said, there were one or two questions he wanted to ask. The first was in regard to the Galway and Clifden Railway. Would the Midland Railway Company of Ireland be spurred on to hasten these works. He had not been in favour of hurrying on the Midland Company, but now some three or four years had elapsed since the commencement of the railway, and it was time something should be done. With regard to the Tuam and Claremorris Railway, it appeared a sum of money for that railway would probably not be wanted until the 31st March, 1894, but he hoped there would be no delay regarding the opening or completion of it.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL remarked that it was usual for the Chief Secretary for Ireland annually to give a detailed explanation as to the progress that was made with these railways, and he thought that would be a suitable time to have the statement made.

MR. BARTLEY said, he had an Amendment to this Vote which he intended to move on the ground that under the altered circumstances it was not fair to the people of Great Britain to be asked to go on paying these large sums for light railways in Ireland. He heartily supported the late Government in their proposals for the construction of these light railways, because he thought it was an excellent means of opening up and developing the resources of Ireland. Under the present circumstances he felt it was not fair, when they were going to alter the whole position of Ireland, that they should continue to vote these large sums, especially considering that there were many poor districts in England which greatly needed to have their resources developed. He moved to reduce the general Vote by £15,000.

THE CHAIRMAN : The Government are only asking for £8,676.

MR. BARTLEY said, then he would move to reduce the Vote by £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,676, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Bartley.)

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT was surprised that the hon. Gentleman should seek to break faith even with the Irish people. They were bound to the payment of this money by Parliament. Both items which appeared in the Vote were pledged for this purpose by Parliament. One was pledged under the Public Companies (Ireland) Act, 1883, and then under the Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889, they were obliged to provide a sum each year in the form of an annuity. In respect to the progress made in connection with the light railways in Ireland, he thought he could advance good reasons why he should give that account rather than the Chief Secretary. He (Sir J. T. Hibbert) had at Whitsuntide an opportunity of going over a considerable number of these light railways, and, therefore, he spoke not only of what he had heard from other people, but from the actual experience of his own inspection. Speaking generally, he must say that when these light railways came into actual operation they would perfectly justify the hopes and intentions of the late Government in undertaking the construction of them. Many of them traversed congested districts—districts, he might say, which had had no opportunity of receiving communication and accommodation in times past, and which he thought would be served very well indeed by these new railways. There were something like 12 of these railways, and he went over five or six of them. He would take the information that appeared in his Return. The Donegal and Killybegs Line, which was 13 miles in length, had been inspected by the Board of Trade, and opened for passenger traffic a short time ago. The Stranorlar and Glenties Railway, 24 miles in length, would be opened in August, 1894. The Ballina and Killala Railway, eight miles, was opened last year. The Baltinore and Skibbereen, seven and a-half miles, was complete, and had been opened for traffic, as had also the Bantry Extension, two miles. The Downpatrick and Ard-glass Railway, eight miles, was completed and opened for traffic some short time ago. The Headford and Kenmare line, 19 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles, was opened this month, and on the 15th inst. the Killorglin and Valentia Railway, 26 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles, would also be opened. The Westport and Mulrany Railway, 18 miles, and the Achill Extension, eight and a quarter miles, would be opened in January, 1894. With respect to the Achill Extension, he was glad to learn that arrangements had been all but completed with the Midland Railway Company for taking over the line. The Collooney and Claremorris Railway, 47 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles, would not be opened before August, 1895, but 43 miles were now up to the formation level. The Galway and Clifden Railway, 49 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles, was expected to be open in August, 1894. He agreed that it would be a wise thing if one portion of this railway, which was in an advanced state, could be opened before the remainder of the line was completed. He would do his best to bring pressure to bear on the different companies to push on the completion of these lines. It was important in the interests of the industries of Ireland that they should be completed as rapidly as possible, and no efforts would be spared to try to bring them to an early completion.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: Are not the Railway Companies under a penalty to complete them by the date specified?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT replied yes, or else they had to make out a very good case before any extension of time was granted them. He did not know that he could add anything more, except to promise that, so far as he could help the matter forward, he should do all he could. He did think that when completed these railways would prove of the greatest advantage to Ireland.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL asked, could the right hon. Gentleman make any statement about the contribution from the baronies, in regard to which he believed he contemplated some change?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, with regard to the contribution of 2 per cent. from the baronies, he was not in a position to give any definite information to the House, and he did not think it would be wise at present to do so. He might say, however, that the Treasury were conferring with the Irish Government as to the proposals the Treasury had made for a commutation of this 2 per cent. They thought that the commutation should be carried out voluntarily, and not compulsorily, and it would certainly relieve the cesspayers of the different baronies from very severe pressure. He hoped, before they met again in the Autumn, to bring forward their proposals, either by Amendment to the Bill of the hon. Member for West Kerry, or by means of a short Bill.

*MR. A. C. MORTON inquired if these Companies responsible for the construction and equipment of the railways did not lose the grant unless they completed their work by a certain time? If not, the whole thing would be an utter absurdity.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) expressed his pleasure at hearing the right hon. Gentleman say the late Government, in their policy with regard to these light railways, would be justified by the results. He was glad to learn that the question with regard to the Achill Railway was now almost definitely settled. He supposed it would be taken over and worked by the Midland and Great Western Railway in conjunction with the Westport and Mulrany Railway. It certainly would prove a very important extension; it would be a great benefit to the people of the district, who would be brought within reach of the markets, and he thought it would prove remunerative to the Railway Company. The hon. Member for Peterborough asked whether the Railway Companies were under penalties to complete the work by the specified dates. The position of the Railway Companies was this: By the Order in Council there was a limited time in which to complete the lines, and unless they were able to give very good reason for this, they would be unable to obtain assent to an extension of the time. That in itself would be one of the very gravest penalties, because they would have spent of their own money probably one-third of the total cost, and they could earn nothing whatever on that capital expenditure until they got the line open; therefore, the Railway Companies themselves had the strongest inducement to push on the work. He was very glad to hear the different railways had approached so near to completion, and their experience, so far, had thoroughly justified the late Government in the arrangements they had made.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, the hon. Baronet the Member for West Kerry (Sir T. Esmonde) had, he understood, intended raising a question, and had risen before the retirement of the Chairman; but he was not now in his place. He (Mr. Russell) wished to say that nothing could be more satisfactory than the statement of his right hon. Friend (Sir J. T. Hibbert) on this matter. It was a clear statement, to which no one could take objection; it was, he would say in the first place, very satisfactory to those who had taken an interest in the light railways—and especially satisfactory was it to those who believed that those railways would be likely to carry out the ideas of their original promoters. They were told that of 13 railways guaranteed, eight were opened—or, at least, eight would be opened within this month—and five were in an unfinished state. Only one line occurred to him to say anything about—the Claremorris, Collooney, and Swinford branch of the Galway and Clifden Railway. The last they heard of it the contractor and the Railway Company were fighting, and matters were brought to a standstill. He would like to know how the work was progressing, and was it progressing at all?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the works had started again.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he was glad. Was there, then, a fair chance of the line being opened in the course of 1895?

Mr. Jackson

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, that was satisfactory. With regard to the Clifden and Galway line, it was the longest line, and they could not expect that it would be opened very soon; but he would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that a great deal could be done to the open part of the line. It was most important that the tourist traffic should be developed—the smallest accommodation was important. If 20 miles of the railway was ready for opening, they should be opened. He understood there was a difficulty in the way with regard to a bridge outside Galway.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Corrig?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, that was the bridge he referred to. It was near Galway. Why should they not, if there was any difficulty, make a temporary bridge outside Galway and run on the trains? He understood from a prospectus which he had seen that something had been done towards the development of tourist traffic by Mr. Crossley; and, as the question was of enormous importance to the district, he thought that might be done. If his suggestion were adopted, a great boon would be conferred upon the locality. He was glad that the policy of the late Government was being maintained by the present one. There was one other question which he thought ought to be referred to. It was a very sad subject—that of the calamity which happened on the Dingle Railway. This line was in the constituency of the hon. Baronet (Sir T. Esmonde), and he regretted he was not here to call attention to the matter. It was one of the saddest railway calamities that had happened in Ireland. He would say that it was an accident of a very singular character; and, as far as he could see, it was due to the state of the railway.

MR. J. MORLEY was understood to say the inexperience of the driver had something to do with it.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, the inexperience of the driver might have had something to do with it; but, in his opinion, it was due in a great degree to the condition of the line.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.) said, on a point of Order, he would ask the Chairman whether on 21st July, 1881, Mr. Flynn was speaking on this very Vote, and referring to a matter of this kind—the bad condition of a railway—when the Chairman at the time (Mr. Courtney) ruled that the question was not relevant to the Vote, being a matter only in the power of the Railway Company, and under their administration?

*THE CHAIRMAN: I was just about to interrupt the hon. Member for Tyrone. There can be no doubt about the ruling referred to by the hon. Member (Mr. Knox). It is necessary for the hon. Member for South Tyrone to bring it home to the Government before he can be considered in Order.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he was going, not upon the general Light Railway Votes, but under Sub-section A, where £2,500 was voted towards the Dingle Railway—

MR. KNOX rose, but—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he hoped the hon. Member would allow him to finish. The railway was badly managed, and they were called upon to vote £2,500 towards it. That being so, he thought they were entitled to raise the question on this Vote.

MR. J. MORLEY, on a point of Order, submitted that the asking for £2,500 did not associate or connect the Government with the management of the line.

*THE CHAIRMAN: It is clear, I think, that the Government are not responsible for the administration or management of this railway. The hon. Member is, therefore, out of Order in referring to the matter.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): But, Sir—

*THE CHAIRMAN: I have ruled the point of Order. It is very inconvenient that Members should rise in this manner after I have ruled a point.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, of course, he would accept the ruling of the Chairman. But he did think it was not a proper thing to prevent discussion; and he was sorry that the Nationalist Members should prevent the discussion of a matter of such importance. On the general policy, therefore, he thought the statement of the hon. Gentleman was exceedingly satisfactory and encouraging; and he was glad that the policy inaugurated by the late Government was being continued by their successors.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he recognised, as other Members did, the satisfactory character of the statement which the right hon. Gentleman had made to the Committee, as well as the courtesy with which he received observations that came from that (the Opposition) side of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman's example were followed by other right hon. Gentlemen it would expedite the passing of these Votes. He wanted to ask with regard to the Donegal Railway—Stranorlar to Glenties. This line had made very little progress since March last, when the last statement regarding it was made. The right hon. Gentleman then told them that he was not satisfied with the progress made, and that he would do what he could do in the matter. He did not blame him if his efforts had not been successful, because he was sure there were difficulties, and the responsibility must be laid on the contractors. He told them in March that 34½ miles was the length of the line, and that it had progressed to the extent of 17 miles of the foundation level. Since then, he took it, further progress had been made with the foundation level. He did not know whether the progress had been satisfactory; but he desired to know whether the matters referred to in the Report of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland regarding the line had been settled?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the only other question he had to put was as to the Ardglass line, and the question as to the pier there. Had that question been settled?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that was all he wished to know.

MR. THORNTON (Clapham) said, he did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that he had gone over the Skibbereen line.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: No.

*MR. THORNTON said, he had gone over that railway, and the people there desired him to express their view that the work was very imperfect for the object that was in view. At Baltimore, where the line ran to, the works were unfinished. It was understood that the original design provided greater facilities for the landing of fish. When the boats came in, the fish had to be thrown up and then removed to the railway, generally in a broken condition. This should be remedied by constructing a pier, and it could be done at a comparatively small cost, as the distance was only about 100 yards, and the expenditure would be a very useful one. At present, £56,000 had been expended without attaining the object desired. He believed an additional £7,000 would do all that was required, and if it were done the undertaking would be carried through and made successful. He would say that, looking at the work which was carried on at Baltimore, with its Fishery School, something was owing to the memory of the late Father Davis.

Several hon. MEMBERS : Hear, hear !

*MR. THORNTON said, it was just to the memory of Father Davis, and what he did in that district towards the development of industry, that the line should be placed in a more satisfactory condition. The Baltimore railway promised to improve the fisheries there, and he was sure they would all like to see it completed and made as useful as possible.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) was understood to urge the Government not to starve these Light Railways. In the case of the Donegal and Stranorlar line, which would be of enormous advantage to the chief congested district in the country, he wished to know if it would be connected with the narrow gauge line to Strabane? He also desired to know if there was any prospect of a line being constructed to Falcarragh. It seemed to him it would be a great advantage if they could make the system more complete than it was. Great Britain might object to find the necessary funds for opening up all the congested districts ; but for his own part he believed that the expenditure of British capital was due to Ireland in this direction. It was 10 years since he had brought the matter before the Chief Secretary of that day—the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for Scotland—and it had taken the intervening period to get the Government up to the mark. He was thankful to think that they had risen to the crisis they ought to have faced years ago.

Mr. Thornton

SIR J. T. HIBBERT hoped that the Committee would consent to go to a Division on that question so that the next important point may be reached. He agreed with the hon. Member for South Tyrone as to the importance of opening up the district from Cong to Oughterard, and he had made a suggestion to the Railway Company that they should consider the desirability of making such extension. With regard to the Skibbereen Railway, it was a matter for consideration in the future whether the connection referred to should not be completed. No doubt the result of such connection would be very advantageous.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

CLASS II.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed,

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that on this Vote it was his unfortunate duty to draw attention to the first of a long series of pluralists who appeared on the Estimates. There were 12 pluralists on this Vote, and by pluralists he meant persons holding two or more places and receiving salaries from two or more sources. The Lord Chancellor was the first and worst pluralist of them all, and therefore he moved to reduce the Vote by the amount of £4,000—his salary as Speaker of the House of Lords. In addition to this £4,000 on the Estimates the Lord Chancellor received £6,000 a year as President of the Supreme Court of the Chancery Division. The duties of the Lord Chancellor as Speaker of the House of Lords were not to be compared in importance with those of the Speaker of the House of Commons. The noble Lord had not the authority over the House of Lords that the Speaker had over the House of Commons. He was not even addressed by Members of the other House in Debate—a circumstance which he (Mr. Gibson Bowles) mentioned to show the inferiority of the Lord Chancellor's position as compared with that of Mr. Speaker. In addition to that the time occupied by the Lord Chancellor in the discharge of his duties as Speaker of the House of Lords was as nothing compared with the time occupied by the Speaker of the House of Commons. Neither was the strain, mentally and physically, upon the one in any way comparable with that on the other. When they considered the relatively small importance of the duties performed in the House of Lords and the importance of the issues raised in the House of Commons, and practically decided there, and when they considered the large number of gentlemen on the Benches opposite who paid no attention to the decisions of the House of Lords, it must be apparent that the position of Speaker of the House of Lords was in no way comparable with that of the Speaker of the House of Commons. The salary of the Speaker of the House of Commons was placed on the Consolidated Fund to show that he was far removed from all Party affection and Party consideration—that he was, in fact, as said by Mr. Speaker Lenthall, the eyes and ears of the House. Could that be said of the Speaker of the House of Lords? They knew how the Speaker of the House of Lords was chosen. He had never known of one being appointed except for serious and considerable Party services, or services believed to be such. He had another grievance against the Lord Chancellor—the most serious grievance of all—and it was that he was a lawyer, one of those about whom Junius said—

It seemed to him (Mr. Gibson Bowles) that a long course of the indiscriminate defence of right and wrong was not a good preparation for the post of Speaker of the House of Lords. Apart from the dignity of the office and from the fact that the duties of the office were far less onerous than those of Speaker of the House of Commons, it behoved the Committee to consider the kind of man they were certain to get as a lawyer, and to take that into consideration in reckoning the salary. There never had been in living memory a Lord Chancellor who had given satisfaction who had not been accused of jobbery—

MR. H. H. FOWLER : Name one.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : All of them. Under the last Government never a day passed without an attack being made in the Radical Press on the eminent person who filled the position of Lord Chancellor—

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. Member must confine himself to the duties of Lord Chancellor as Speaker of the House of Lords.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : On the point of Order, am I to understand that in moving a reduction of the salary of the Lord Chancellor I am debarred from dealing with the noble Lord in his capacity as Lord Chancellor?

THE CHAIRMAN : Certainly ; there is no doubt about it.

MR. HANBURY : Take the next item, the Sergeant-at-Arms in Attendance upon the Lord Chancellor. Cannot we discuss that except when the Sergeant-at-Arms is in attendance upon the Lord Chancellor as Speaker of the House of Lords?

THE CHAIRMAN : No ; there is no question on this point.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he bowed to the Chairman's ruling ; but he failed to see how he could deal with the question of the Lord Chancellor being a pluralist if he was compelled to deal with him as two entities, unless he could deal with him both as Lord Chancellor and Speaker of the House of Lords.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he understood that the Lord Chancellor received £6,000 salary as President of the Supreme Court and of the Chancery Division, that being purely for judicial duties. On that he would ask whether it was possible to discuss anything else besides the noble Lord's duties as President of the Supreme Court—patronage for instance?

THE CHAIRMAN : No ; because patronage belongs to the Lord Chancellor as Lord Chancellor, and not as Speaker. The Lord Chancellor has a double capacity, and the capacity before the Committee is that as Speaker of the House of Lords.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : As a point of Order, is the ecclesiastical patronage belonging to the Lord Chancellor exercised as President of the Chancery Division?

THE CHAIRMAN : Certainly not as Speaker of the House of Lords.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether he was to understand that he could not discuss the messengers of the Lord Chancellor, because the Lord Chancellor did not exist in this Vote? He submitted that he was warranted in calling attention to the fact that the Lord Chancellor received these two salaries in his different capacities. He thought his salary of £4,000 as Speaker of the House of Lords was too large. The Lord Chancellor had been constantly denounced in the Press as "The Lord High Jobber"—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is distinctly out of Order in these references.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will you allow me to conclude my sentence—denounced as a jobber in connection with the exercise of his patronage as Speaker of the House of Lords and not as Lord Chancellor. [Cries of "Order!"] He had a perfect right to refer to that.

THE CHAIRMAN: But, as Speaker of the House of Lords, I do not think the Lord Chancellor exercises patronage.

MR. HANBURY: Oh yes; in regard to the Clerks at the Table.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that history would bear out his statement that the Lord Chancellor had been accused of being a jobber. He thought that the Committee should put an end to one of the two salaries of the Lord Chancellor. He would move to reduce the Vote by £4,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £4,000."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

MR. HANBURY said, he should like to make this remark in behalf of what had been said by his hon. Friend indirectly—that there appeared to be some misapprehension as to the amount of patronage that the Lord Chancellor had at his disposal as Speaker of the House of Lords. Judging from the Report of the Public Accounts Committee, the Lord Chancellor, as Speaker of the House of Lords, had a considerable number of officers in that House at his disposal. He appointed the Clerks at the Table with the exception of the Clerk of Parliaments. Therefore, the hon. Member for King's Lynn was quite entitled to point out that if the Lord Chancellor wished to job he had it in his power to do so. He thought hon. Members opposite were inclined to be a little ashamed of the accusations they made against the late Lord Chancellor. The Liberal Press had teemed with accusations against the late "Lord High Jobber," as he was called. ["Order!"]

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) rose to Order, and asked what on earth they had to do with the character of the late Lord Chancellor?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; it is not in Order. We are restricted here to the salary of the Speaker of the House of Lords.

MR. HANBURY: I have pointed out that the Speaker of the House of Lords has patronage, and it was in connection with patronage that the late Lord Chancellor was accused—

MR. WADDY: I ask, again, if the hon. Member is in Order in referring to the late Lord Chancellor?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; he is not in the Vote at all.

*MR. A. C. MORTON asked if the late Lord Chancellor could not be referred to for purposes of illustration?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that these references were clearly out of Order.

MR. HANBURY said, that his object in rising was to protect the present Speaker of the House of Lords from the gross insults that were hurled against the late Lord Chancellor by the Liberal Party. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I rise to Order. What right has the hon. Member to charge Members on this side of the House with hurling insults against the late Lord Chancellor? [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The President of the Local Government Board is entitled to rise to Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Preston will have regard to the orderly conduct of Debate. Whatever his motive may be in persisting in these references, I would point out that no charge whatever has been made against the present Lord Chancellor, and the only question before the Committee is that of his salary as Speaker of the House of Lords.

MR. HANBURY said, the House had a right to protect everybody to whom it paid these large salaries from the violent insults often directed against them. [Cries of "Order!"] He was perfectly in Order, and was not going to be put down by the President of the Local Government Board.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I rise to Order. The question is as to the salary of the present holder of the Office of Speaker of the House of Lords. I venture to say that this House has no right to discuss the conduct of any previous Lord Chancellor, whether for good or for evil. I say that all that the Committee is entitled to do is to discuss the administrative action of Lord Herschell.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I would ask whether it can possibly be out of Order for the hon. Member to deprecate the holding of more than one Office by the Lord Chancellor on the ground that the tenure of such Office has previously been made a cause of attack?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not the ground taken up by the hon. Member. As I pointed out, he was out of Order in referring to the late Lord Chancellor in connection with this matter. The only question before the Committee is the position of the present Lord Chancellor as Speaker of the House of Lords.

MR. HANBURY said, it was exactly Lord Herschell's position as Speaker of the House of Lords that he was endeavouring to support. ["Oh!"] He was deprecating any treatment of the noble Lord as Speaker of the House of Lords by any Party in the House similar to the treatment to which the late Speaker of the House of Lords had been subjected. ["Oh!"] He was glad to see that the Gladstonian Party were thoroughly ashamed of their attacks. [Cries of "Order!"] He was not going to submit to these interruptions.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I ask whether the hon. Member for Preston is to defy the Chair in the way he is deliberately doing?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is distinctly out of Order, and I must request him to discontinue his observations.

MR. TOMLINSON: On the point of Order—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I cannot permit this. When I have ruled an hon. Member out of Order somebody else rises and raises the same point in a different form.

VOL. XVII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MR. SEXTON: As to a point of Order, does not the Standing Order empower the Chair to direct an hon. Member who defies the ruling of the Chair to withdraw?

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no question about that. But the hon. Member has submitted to my ruling, therefore there is an end of the matter.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT was sorry the hon. Member for King's Lynn had thought it necessary to use strong expressions in connection with the Office of Lord Chancellor.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I was defending the Lord Chancellor.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am sorry he should have used strong epithets—

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I was provoked by the denial of the President of the Local Government Board.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he thought they ought to discuss these things in a reasonable frame of mind, and not throw stones at either the late or the present Lord Chancellor. The salary of the Speaker of the House of Lords had been fixed at £4,000 a year so long ago as 1832; therefore, for 60 years it had been paid, sometimes by a Conservative and sometimes by a Liberal Government, and yet he did not suppose that it had ever been called in question before. The hon. Member for King's Lynn was a new Member, and, to that extent, was justified in going into these matters. But however objectionable the system of holding a plurality of appointments might be, he did not think it would be said of the Offices of Speaker of the House of Lords and Lord Chancellor. The Speaker of the House of Lords stood in a peculiar position. He had not the powers possessed by the Speaker of the House of Commons; but, at the same time, the condition of things which now prevailed had continued for 60 years. Unless there was some real grievance—any objection upon which anyone could put his finger—it was not a wise thing to raise these questions in Committee of Supply. He, for one, should certainly oppose the proposal.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he thought it desirable to raise this question of pluralism, especially in the case of this most notorious and remarkable pluralist the Lord Chancellor. As to the present arrangement having continued since 1832, he should think that, in the minds of hon. Members opposite, that was a good argument for making the change now. In 1832 there was a larger proportion of work in the House of Lords than at present, and a less proportion of work in the Commons. He had no desire to press his Amendment, however. He was satisfied with having raised the question, and perhaps some day when they had a real Radical Government in power, and not a sham one, these salaries of the Lord Chancellor would be brought down to proper proportions, or one of them would be done away with. He would withdraw the Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to move to reduce the salary of the messenger to the Crown Office and the messenger to the Lord Chancellor, but after what had occurred he was doubtful whether he could do it, for he understood that the Lord Chancellor was not on the Vote. He could not conceive how the Lord Chancellor could have this messenger if he was not on the Vote.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: He has the messenger as Speaker of the House of Lords.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: No; it is not as Speaker, but as Lord Chancellor, according to the Estimates. It certainly is not as President of the Supreme Court of Chancery—

THE CHAIRMAN (interrupting): It is out of Order to do indirectly what cannot be done directly. The position of the Lord Chancellor cannot be discussed on this item.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he wished to move to reduce the Vote by £84 for the messenger of the Lord Chancellor, who did not exist in the Vote. If this messenger was attached to the Speaker of the House of Lords it would be a different thing.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £45."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he did not think this was a question on which they should spend much time. If the hon. Member wished to strike out the salary of the messenger of the Lord Chancellor they had better at once have a Division upon the question. He moved that the Question be now put.

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £45," put accordingly, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HANBURY said, he desired to call attention to the disproportion that existed between the salaries of the officers of the House of Lords as compared with the salaries of the officers of the House of Commons for precisely similar work, or, he should say, for a great deal less work. He was one of those Tories who, while he thought that this branch of the Constitution, which some people looked on as anomalous, ought to be maintained, at the same time thought they ought, as far as possible, to relieve it of many excrescences which deprived it of its value. The House of Lords, with regard to the salaries of its officials, stood in an unfavourable position. Though the officials of the House of Lords did less work than the officials of the House of Commons, their salaries averaged at least 30 per cent. more. Take the case of the Clerk of the Parliaments. He received £2,500 a year, whilst the Clerk to the House of Commons received £2,000, or £500 less. The Clerk to the House of Commons had a residence in the House of Commons, but the Clerk of the Parliaments had another £500 in lieu of a house. That the work of the Clerk of the House of Commons was much more important than that of the other official was demonstrated by the fact that it was deemed necessary for the former to reside here, but not for the latter. With regard to the officials of the House of Lords, he had to complain that they were all pluralists or drew salaries "personal to the holder." These were two points in the Estimates which he, for one, was prepared to fight from beginning to end. If a salary was good enough for one man it was good enough for another. There were, he believed, 32 officials on the establishment of the House of Lords, and no less than 27 of those had asterisks or other marks against their names, showing that they were either pluralists or had salaries personal to them as present holders of the Office. The Clerk Assistant in the House of Lords received £1,200 a year, and the Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons received only £1,000 a year. Take the case of the senior clerks. In every individual instance in the House of Lords, they started at higher salaries than in the House of Commons. All the senior clerks in the House of Commons started at the initial salary of £650; but every clerk in the House of Lords started at £50 higher—namely, at from £700—which was the lowest—to £850. Nearly every one of them, also, for no special reason that he could see, had an extra £150 a year. In one case the extra allowances amounted to £350 a year, and in another case to £450 a year. There were in the House of Lords 12 junior clerks—and all these clerks did the same kind of work as that performed by the clerks in the House of Commons, only much less of it—and the number of junior clerks in the House of Commons was 23. They started at a minimum salary of £100 a year in the House of Commons, and the 23 in that House received only £200 a year more than the 11 in the House of Lords, the total figures being £6,250 and £6,450. It was monstrous that there should be that difference—a difference which ran all the way through the list from the Clerk of the Parliaments to the messengers. The messengers in the House of Lords rose to £170, while in the House of Commons they only rose to £150, the bulk of them receiving £120 per annum. Why there should be this difference he was at a loss to imagine, particularly as the work was a great deal less. Salaries ought to be paid according to the work that the recipients performed, and it ought to be possible to point to the House of Lords as an example in this respect. If the House of Lords did not set an example, how could they expect other Departments of the Civil Service to attend to the matter. The House of Commons was bad enough, but the House of Lords set a shocking example. He was aware that they could not disturb the holders of these offices, but now that they had a Radical Government in power, he thought that there ought to be some security that when new appointments were made the holders should be paid on a lower scale than the present. They had had Committees inquiring into this matter. He found that one sat in 1889, and brought in two Reports. Would the House believe it, that the whole of the first Report was that the salaries of four housemaids should be reduced to 10s. per week? That was the beginning and the end, and the sum total of the whole of the Report, and in order to carry out that revolutionary proceeding the Committee had to support itself by the Report of the previous Committee which had similarly dealt with 12 housemaids. The language they concluded with sounded strange and mysterious—

“The scheme of the Lord Great Chamberlain (that was, as to the reduction of salaries) has been found to give a better security for the Palace of Westminster, and for the maintenance of order and regularity therein.”

Another matter on which he felt strongly was the number of official residences. There were a great deal too many of them, and they did not know where the expense began and ended. The House of Lords was a notorious offender in this respect. The House of Commons was an offender, but nothing to be compared with the House of Lords. There was in the House of Lords an official called the Black Rod. He was a distinguished Admiral who did not do his work. He had an official residence valued at £500 a year, he drew a salary of £2,000 a year, and he got full Admiral's retired pay. He received fees in addition as an officer of the Garter. Well, when the House of Commons had to be summoned to the House of Lords, Black Rod, who was the proper person to do the summoning, sent to them an official called “The Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod,” who got £300 a year for doing Black Rod's work. He (Mr. Hanbury) was not sure that it was not proper for the dignity of the House of Commons to have the right official to summon them. At any rate, the officials of the House of Lords ought to come under the Rules and Regulations which bound other Departments of the Government. There was a Rule that men in the Public Service should retire at the age of 65. If Black Rod was over 65, then he ought to retire. If he was under 65, he ought to come and do his work, and not employ a deputy to do it for him. There were other official residences in the House of Lords. The Librarian had an official residence, but the Librarian in the House of Commons had not. The Secretary to the Lord Great Chamberlain had a house—why on earth he could not conceive. Why should such a functionary as that occupy space in this building when they all knew that space was very much wanted here? Similarly the resident Superintendent had a house in the House of Lords. He (Mr. Hanbury) held that these residences ought to be done away with altogether, and that, if necessary, residence salary should be substituted. That would be found economical in the long run. The House of Commons voted these moneys, and the House of Commons ought to have control over the officials in the House of Lords as well as in the House of Commons. At present the regulating Act was 5 Geo. IV., chap. 82—an Act for the Better Regulating of the Office of Clerk of the Parliaments. What was the reason the House of Lords officials were not regulated by the ordinary rules that covered Civil Departments? They were under a special Act of their own. There was no limit as to age. A man might be appointed to a position at any age. There was no qualification for a clerkship in the House of Lords. They should insist upon the ordinary qualifications—that was, they should insist upon the person to be appointed having a Civil Service certificate. Then, again, there should be equality as between clerks of the House of Lords and the Civil Service clerks. That was not the case at present. Then he came to the bargain struck with the Lords as to fees. In return for the Commons voting the salaries the Lords handed over certain fees. It had been a standing rule of the Civil Service for years that these fees should be treated as appropriated in aid, and he did not understand how it was that the same rule did not apply to the House of Lords as applied to the ordinary Departments. But, as a matter of fact, the Lords did not hand over all the fees, for the pensions were to a large extent paid out of them. The manner in which the fees were dealt with, and in which they might be dealt with, was such that it was perfectly ridiculous to say they got any quid pro quo. The expenses of the House of Lords reached £100,000 annually, and they only got £25,000 back, leaving £75,000. This was a question that ought to be dealt with. They in the House of Commons had set a better example in regard to their own clerks. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed himself very favourably to the view he (Mr. Hanbury) now took, and he hoped he would have him on his side in these matters when they came up. He would urge that the two Houses of Parliament ought to set a good example in all respects connected with their officials, and both Houses should be put on the same footing as other Civil Departments. He moved to reduce the Vote by £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item C, Salaries, be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the hon. Member who had just spoken had not looked fairly at both sides of the question. He had looked only at one side; but he might have drawn attention to the other. He sympathised with the hon. Member in many of the remarks he made on the subject of economy, but he certainly could not agree with him in the opinion that the House of Lords had done nothing in that direction with regard to the salaries and charges of its officials. In 1889 a Committee went fully into the question of the salaries, pensions, and other expenses connected with the House of Lords, and that Committee, whose Report had been laid before both Houses, recommended changes and reductions in the salaries, &c., which, if carried out, would effect a saving of £6,874.

MR. HANBURY said, there were two Reports. The second one only made recommendations.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the second Report was adopted by the House of Lords, and the recommendations made had, so far, been acted upon that up to the present a saving of £2,304 a year had been effected. Reductions were being effected as vacancies occurred; sooner was impossible, because of vested interests. The figures were:—Serjeant-at-Arms, including Deputy (£250)—present, £1,500; future, £1,250; saving, £250. Clerk of the Parliaments—present, £3,000; future, £2,000; saving, £1,000. Clerk Assistant, £2,100 present salary ; future, £1,500 ; saving £600. Chief Clerk—present, £1,200 ; this remained as at present. Then they had two junior Clerks at £700, to be abolished ; accountants to be reduced from £1,030 to £600 ; Black Rod, reduction from £2,000 to £1,000 ; Secretary to the Lord Great Chamberlain and Yeoman Usher, £1,200 to £500—reduction of £700 ; Doorkeepers, &c., £3,075 to £2,500—reduction of £575 ; housekeeping, £783 to £364—reduction, £419. Of these the following had been effected to date, vacancies having permitted : — Clerk Assistant, £2,100 to £1,500, reduction £600 ; allowance of a senior clerk, £150 saved ; one junior clerk reduced, saving £350 ; accountants, £600, reduction of £430 ; Yeoman Usher of Black Rod, £1,000, reduction of £700 ; housekeeping, £783 to £709, a reduction of £74. The total was, as he had said, £2,304. The points of attack might be summarised thus :—(a) absence of age-retirement rule ; (b) independent treatment of pensions ; (c) patronage ; (d) general expensiveness. As to the first point, the Public Accounts Committee in their third Report expressed the hope “That the authorities charged with the regulation of the offices of both Houses will consider the question how far they can be assimilated to other Public Departments by the adoption of the principle of compulsory retirement as laid down by the 17th clause of the Order in Council of the 15th August, 1890.”

This paragraph would be communicated officially by the Treasury to the authorities of the House, and it was to be hoped that those authorities would see their way to adopt the recommendations so temperately, but distinctly, expressed by the Committee. It was only fair to give the House of Lords an opportunity of dealing with the matter themselves before the House of Commons moved in regard to it. There was no immediate hurry, as it appeared that there was no member of the House of Lords staff not holding a Patent Office to which the rule would apply. It was, doubtless, an anomaly that the Lords' pensions should not only be fixed by the Lords, but paid out of a fund not voted by Parliament. In the former respect they were like the Commons, but the Commons' pensions were paid from the Superannuation Vote in the usual manner. The only practical difference between the two cases was that the particulars of the Lords' pensions were not published, except that a list of names and amounts was given in the account of the Lords' Fee Fund annually laid before the House of Commons. The Clerk of Parliaments stated that all the pensions had been granted under the terms, and on the scale, of the Superannuation Act of 1859, except one, of whom the service extended over 49 years, and the case was treated as under an earlier Act. The Lords might agree, without derogation of their position, to put their pensions on the Superannuation Vote. Again, the principal officers of the Lords were appointed, like the permanent officers of Public Departments and those of the House of Commons, by nomination of the Crown or of Ministers. The Lords' officers, however, held office in several cases by Patent—again like the permanent officers of the House of Commons. It might be fairly questioned whether they should not in the future hold office, like ordinary Civil servants, during pleasure, but this change could only be introduced as changes arose, and would probably require legislation. As regarded the clerical establishment, it was true that, as in the Commons, these officers were in form nominated by the Clerk of the Parliaments, on whom this disagreeable duty was imposed by Statute or by his Patent. But successive Clerks of Parliament had minimised this responsibility by arranging for a limited competition for each vacancy, the number nominated on each occasion being at present six—sufficient to secure effective competition. Whether open competition would be an improvement on this plan was a matter for consideration. All the staff of the House of Lords, with the usual exception of those in Patent Offices, held Civil Service certificates. On the last point, that of salaries, he had already replied. He thought the questions raised should be considered in a fair and reasonable spirit, and that the House should not adopt in haste the view taken by the hon. Member.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he need not follow the hon. Member for Preston at any length, but he would gladly support the hon. Member's Amendment. He (Mr.

Morton) had on several occasions raised this question. His opinion was that the Committee should have the courage to reduce the Vote in order to impress upon the House of Lords the fact that the money voted belonged to the rate-payers of the country, and ought, consequently, to be economically expended. He objected to reducing the wages of labourers and servant maids (as was the custom of our Government) and refusing to reduce the salaries of the highly-paid officers who did the least work. If these extravagant salaries were to be paid to the officers of the other House, it would be necessary to reconsider the salaries of the officers of this House with a view to increasing them. His view was that the fees should not be dealt with as at present. A very large sum was spent in pensions. That was not fair. If these matters were to go on as at present, they would have to consider the position of the officers of the House of Commons, because they did ten times more work than those of the Lords and were not half as well treated. He hoped the reduction of the Vote would be carried.

MR. JACKSON said, he could not allow the Vote to pass without one remark. It seemed to be taken as surprising that the anxiety for economy should be confined to one side of the House; but before this discussion arose at all the idea of economy had been acted upon by others than those of the other side.

MR. A. C. MORTON: Do you mean the House?

MR. JACKSON said, the hon. Member was not listening to what he was saying. He believed that the Treasury officials always did their best to secure economy with efficiency.

MR. A. C. MORTON: No!

MR. JACKSON said, he regretted that the hon. Member should not think so. He believed that these matters should be managed as they were in ordinary private firms, so that injustice should not be done to the men themselves.

MR. A. C. MORTON: Subject to a quarter's notice.

MR. JACKSON said, that would be a part of the contract, and, therefore, their part would be no injustice. But if a man was engaged otherwise, he believed his right ought to be respected. He ventured to say that if these salaries were compared by any impartial person with the salaries paid in the House of Commons, it would be found that they were very reasonable salaries for the amount of work done, and they had had the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury that as vacancies arose every one of the economies recommended by the Committee would be brought into operation. Members of the Government who were brought into contact with those officers must bear testimony to their willingness at all times to combine efficiency with economy. While he was at the Treasury he never had the slightest difficulty with those officers. He had always met with, on their part, the greatest readiness to do everything possible to bring the appointments in the House of Lords into line with the appointments of the House of Commons, and effect economy in every possible way.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) said, the hon. Member for Preston had stated that 12 clerks in the House of Lords had a gross salary of £200 or £300 more than 23 clerks in the House of Commons. He would like to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what comparison these salaries would have to each other when the proposed economies were effected?

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it was refreshing to hear speeches in favour of economy from the other side of the House. He had always believed that it was possible to find a few honest Radicals who were in favour of economy, and he was glad to find proof on this occasion that he was right. Everybody had admitted that the salaries of the House of Lords were considerably greater than those of corresponding offices in the House of Commons, and nobody had disputed the fact—not even the Olympians of the Front Benches—that these salaries were greater than they ought to be. The only answer that had been given by the Government was that a Committee appointed in 1889 had recommended certain reductions, and that in course of time those reductions would be effected. But these reductions were always postponed, and he would remind the Government in the words of the poet that “reduction deferred maketh the heart sick.” It was to be hoped that the reductions would not be long deferred. He suggested that the Secretary to the Treasury should, with that severe air which he could so well command, inform the proper authorities that the House of Commons would not be trifled with any longer; that it would insist on the clerkships of the House of Lords being reduced to a proper level; that it wished for some immediate result, instead of being told that if they waited for a few years the reductions would come. But, above all, let the Secretary to the Treasury assume his very severest air and tell the authorities that they had no right whatever to presume to withdraw these clerks from the ordinary rules governing the ordinary Civil servants; to claim that they were something above and beyond ordinary Civil servants, that they could retire then at any time, and confer upon them any pension they pleased. If the Committee did not get some assurance that these things were not stopped there would be trouble on the Estimates next year. The Committee had also been told that a large number of these gentlemen in the House of Lords had official residences. If a decayed officer, or the reduced widow of a decayed officer, were accommodated with apartments in any of the Royal Palaces of this country, they were made to pay rates on the rooms they occupied. The gentlemen who lived in the Royal Palace of Westminster were not decayed; they were not even widows; they were persons in the enjoyment of robust health and large salaries, and they ought, therefore, to be made to pay rates.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I do not think they pay rates.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Why not?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I cannot tell.

MR. WHITTAKER (York, W.R., Spen Valley) said, it seemed to him that these positions and salaries were a scandal. The continuance of them was a scandal, and could not be justified. The Secretary to the Treasury could not say that it was a matter of honour to continue a scandal. If they desired to have economy in the administration of State affairs they must commence in this very building, and so set an example for the rest of the Kingdom to follow. He hoped the Government, as representing the Radical Party, would take the matter in hand. It was most disgraceful to find officers of Parliament drawing salaries for doing nothing. The Radicals through the country would never stand the continuance of such a system, and the sooner it was brought to an end the better.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, he thought every Radical in the House had reason to be thankful to the hon. Member who had raised this question; and though he thought the Secretary to the Treasury the most courteous and able of officers, those who were in favour of a policy of economy had reason to be dissatisfied with the answer he had given to the hon. Member for Preston. He himself was in favour of the general principle of treating public servants with as much consideration as possible. He was in favour of economy, but he was also in favour of the kind and fair treatment of all servants of the Public Departments. What he thought would strike everyone as curious was that whilst they had been discussing recently the question of the dismissal of dockyard servants, the Secretary to the Treasury did not get up and make the statement that a man once employed in the dockyards was entitled to be employed there for the rest of his days. He admitted the general principle that a considerable amount of consideration should be shown to the employés of the Government; but he was unable to see the reason for the radical difference between the treatment given to the higher officers and the treatment given to the poorer officers.

MR. JACKSON: There is no difference according to contract.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he did not see the meaning of that interruption. There was no exposed contract that these high officers should be employed for life, though that might be implied, and there was no exposed contract that men employed in the dockyards should be employed for life, and that being so he could not see how the authorities were entitled to drive away, without a week's or even a day's notice, a dockyard employé who had perhaps a wife and seven or eight children dependent upon him, while these high officials were retained for life at salaries which were double what they were fairly entitled to. This question of the high salaries of the officials of the House of Lords had been before the Commons for years. He had raised it himself nine or ten years ago. It was a question that should be raised year after year until the remedy was obtained, and he thought it was a reproach to the Radicals that on this occasion the initiative should have been left to a Conservative Member. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Leeds had told them the Clerk of Parliaments got £2,500 a year. As he understood it, the Clerk of Parliaments in another place occupied the same position as the Chief Clerk in the House of Commons; but to compare, as the right hon. Gentleman had done, the duties of the Clerk of the Upper House, which sat on an average one hour each day a certain portion of the year, with the onerous and laborious duties of the Chief Clerk of this House, which sat each day from 3 o'clock till 12 o'clock, and sometimes till 3 o'clock in the morning, was grotesque and absurd. The right hon. Gentleman was one of the most successful business men in York, but if he had conducted his business on the principle which he applied to public servants it would not be long before he was in the Bankruptcy Court.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood what I said. He is in error in saying that I said that what the House of Lords are at present paying is earned by these clerks. What I said was that if the salaries suggested by the Committee, and which are to be put into operation according as vacancies arise, were impartially considered they would be deemed fair for the work to be done.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had deviated somewhat from his original statement. It was quite true that the right hon. Gentleman had said what he repeated now, but it was also true that the right hon. Gentleman had said that the gentlemen who filled these offices did not get more than they were entitled to. But he would not enter into a discussion on that point. This question came home to the House of Commons in another way. There was a complaint made against this Assembly which was unknown in reference to any other Assembly of the kind in the world, that it was absolutely without adequate accommodation for its Members. Members had not sufficient seats on the floor of the House. At certain periods during the Session it was as much as a man's life was worth to fight his way into the House. The explanation was that there were no less than five officers of the House of Lords accommodated with residences in the Palace, thereby occupying the space that should be devoted to the uses of Members of the House of Commons. Then, again, 12 clerks of the House of Lords, with much less work, received larger salaries than 23 clerks of the House of Commons. That was a most scandalous state of affairs; it was high time for the House to deal with it; and he certainly would support the hon. Member for Preston in the Division Lobby.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, that on several occasions in recent years, he, in common with others, when he sat in Opposition, felt it incumbent on him to criticise these salaries and to vote against them. He did not think that one's attitude on this question was altered by the fact that he sat on a different side of the House, and he therefore felt bound to support the Motion. He did not agree with the theory suggested by the Secretary to the Treasury that they were to wait until the deaths of the various incumbents of these various offices before they made the alterations which were admitted to be reasonable and proper. If it so happened that by some reason or other some years ago these people came into the possession of offices to which they were not entitled, they ought to thank God that they had been left to the enjoyment of them so long, and give them up now. It was most unreasonable that the House should go on paying these men salaries which they believed to be wrong. It was not business; it was not common sense. If a gentleman retired from a high position, having, as in the case of the gentleman who filled the office of Black Rod, earned the respect and esteem of those best calculated to judge of his character, it did not follow that he should be paid a big salary for doing in Parliament, not figuratively but absolutely, nothing at all. If Members met that gentleman in the Lobby they would not know him. He was away from the place, and he got his duties discharged by somebody for £300 a year.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

THE CHAIRMAN : Order, Order ! That salary does not come under this sub-head.

MR. WADDY said, he would conclude by saying that he would vote for the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. HANBURY said, he thought his right hon. Friend the Member for North Leeds (Mr Jackson) was under some misapprehension as to the terms under which the Clerks of the House of Lords served. The Public Accounts Committee which sat last year had the Clerks of Parliament before them, and in their Report they said—

“ The Clerk of Parliaments was appointed by the Crown, and is removable by an Address from the House of Lords. The Clerks at the Table were appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and are only removable by Order of the House. All the other Clerks attached to the Office of the Clerk of Parliaments are appointed by that officer, and are removable at pleasure by him.”

The Clerk of Parliaments himself in his evidence said—

“ My own appointment is for life ; the other two clerks are for life, but all the other clerks are removable at pleasure.”

Therefore, these clerks were under a totally different position from the clerks in the Civil Service.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH (Bristol, W.): The Committee has just had a very remarkable Division, and before we part with this Vote we might ask the Government what course they intend to take. It is all very well for a Committee of the House of Commons by a Vote to reduce this Estimate by £500. No doubt we have the power to say what money should be granted for the salaries of the officials of the House of Lords, but it is quite another thing whether the Vote will have any practical effect. The Committee ought to remember that the House of Commons is not omnipotent in this matter. The House of Lords are in receipt of their fees, which amount to a very large annual sum, just as this House is in receipt of its fees. All these fees are now paid into the Exchequer, not by statute, but simply by arrangement, and I venture to say that if sufficient provision should not, in the estimation of the House of Lords, be made for the salaries of its officers it would be legally in the power of that House to do as it likes with its own fees. [Cries of “ Oh ! ”] I am not suggesting that course, but I am merely stating what I believe to be the law of the case, and I would point out that the matter is one of considerable delicacy as between the two Houses, and that any incautious action would lead to difficulties between them, which I do not think any thoughtful person would wish to see raised upon such a question as this. It is one thing to hold that the House of Lords ought to be put an end to. [Loud Ministerial cheers.] Hon. Members may cheer that sentiment, but I think they will find it extremely difficult to give practical effect to it. [Opposition cheers and a voice, “ We will see ! ”] That is not the question at issue. The question at issue is this. The House of Lords exists as part of the Constitution ; it must have officers, and they must be paid. [A VOICE : Reasonably.] Yes, reasonably. Under these circumstances, I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what course he suggests? It may be very desirable to further consider the salaries of the officers of the House of Lords, but that question could be considered by a Joint Committee of both Houses and an amicable conclusion arrived at. It seems to me, however, that this matter cannot be allowed to rest upon a mere snap vote of the House of Commons, and I hope we shall have some statement from the Government.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I really thought when the right hon. Gentleman arose and addressed the Government in so alarming and serious a tone he was going to ask whether they considered that the vote imperilled their existence. The real truth is that votes in reference to the House of Lords are not fatal to the existence of the Government. It certainly is a matter which requires a good deal of consideration as to how far effect should be given to a vote of this character. I agree that it ought to be a question of amicable discussion and arrangement between the authorities of the two Houses, but I am not in a position at this instant to make any statement on the subject. I hope, however, that when the Vote comes up upon Report the Government will be able to state what is to be done.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take into account the fact that two leading Conservatives, supported by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and by the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Sir J. Gorst), had gone into the Lobby against the Government, and that he would inform the Members of the other House that the feeling against them was so strong that the Amendment was supported from all parts of the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has raised a question of some Constitutional importance—namely, that the votes in reference to the House of Lords are not fatal to the existence of the Government. That statement implies that the right hon. Gentleman is of opinion that the Government may pick and choose between their own Estimates, and that in some instances they would be rather pleased than otherwise if the Committee of that House reject them. This is certainly an entirely new doctrine. Up to now it has always been understood that when the Government lay their Estimates before the House of Commons they do so with a considerable sense of responsibility, and it has been supposed that no Government would lay Estimates before the House which they did not believe were necessary for carrying on the business of the country. I now understand from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Government has deliberately put before the House Estimates which they do not feel themselves conscientiously called upon to support. I cannot help thinking that my right hon. Friend has been led a little astray as to the meaning of the vote which has been given. I undoubtedly sympathise with the idea that the officials of the House of Lords ought not to be paid on a higher scale than those of the House of Commons. But I go beyond that. My opinion is that the Government occupy a very doubtful position, and I do not be-live that they any longer enjoy the confidence of the country, and that it is desirable they should be compelled at the earliest possible opportunity to ascertain the feeling of the country on the subject. In these circumstances it is the Constitutional right of the House of Commons to refuse them Supplies, and I gave my vote quite as much upon that ground as upon the merits of the particular Vote. I may say once for all that I cannot feel inclined to place any more money than I can possibly help at the disposal of Her Majesty's Government.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he took a different view from that held by the right hon. Gentleman, and thought that instead of the Government resigning the House of Lords ought to resign.

Original Question, as amended, "That £22,595 be granted for the said Service," put, and agreed to.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £33,223, be granted to Her Majesty, to compete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894, for the Salaries and Expenses in the Offices of the House of Commons."

MR. A. C. MORTON said, there was a feeling among the officials of the House of Commons that they were not paid as they ought to be, and he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether or not a Committee might be appointed to consider the subject?

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say that he had heard no complaints.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES disclaimed any desire to make an attack upon the Clerks of the House, but he must move to reduce the Vote by £500. The Chief Clerk had a residence and £2,000 a year. He wished to take his house from him, and if he would not give it up he wanted an equivalent part of his salary, £500 a year.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled the hon. Member's remarks out of Order.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES urged that it was undesirable the Clerk should have an official residence at all. It was not, he contended, an actual necessity that the Clerk or the Clerk Assistants should be provided with an official residence at the House. It was a bad thing to live over the shop, to reside with their work, and it would be much more advantageous to health, and conducive to longevity, if the Clerk lived away from the House. He moved to reduce the Vote by £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item B be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

MR. A. C. MORTON did not wish to say anything on this reduction, which he did not understand, but he should take the opportunity of bringing the cases of some of the lower paid officers before the right hon. Gentleman.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) asked the hon. Gentleman opposite not to press this Motion, which was decidedly against the feeling of the House. He was sure they did not consider the Clerks at the Table, who had a great deal of work to do, were overpaid, and any question of official residences ought to be settled on entirely different principles; moreover, what applied to one should apply to all. He, therefore, begged his hon. Friend not to press this matter.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I also join in the appeal which has just been made by my hon. Friend behind me. I am quite sure that putting a vote of this kind to the House would be extremely distasteful to all sides of the House, who have so much reason to be grateful to the Clerks at the Table for their services and the kindness they exhibit towards us, and especially in a Session where there has been a special strain put upon them—it would be a most ungrateful thing that such a question as this should be put to a vote. I hope, therefore, that the hon. Member will withdraw it.

MR. HANBURY said, when he was speaking on the subject of the appointments in the House of Lords, one argument he adduced against the existing system was that the salaries were too large, and the other was the irregular system on which the abodes of the clerks in that House were arranged. He thought if they were going to set an example to the Civil Service it ought to be set by the House of Commons, and however well the work might be done by the clerks in that House the system upon which they worked was essentially a bad one. Like the clerks in the House of Lords they were exempt from the ordinary Rules of the Civil Service, and the Order in Council recently framed by the Treasury was ignored by them on the ground that they were on a different footing from all the rest of the clerks in the Civil Service. He complained that the Civil Service Commissioners had absolutely nothing whatever to do with the clerks of this House, and all his remarks relative to the system of appointment of clerks in the House of Lords applied to the House of Commons with the exception of salaries, which were much less in this than in the other House. He was aware there was a Commission consisting of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Speaker, and others to regulate the salaries, &c., of the clerks, but practically the whole of the appointments were in the gift of the Principal Clerk at the Table, and he believed every clerk under him held office at his pleasure. The Public Accounts Committee, although they did not express any opinion of what ought to be done in this matter as being outside their functions, indicated that in their opinion the existing arrangements were not to the advantage of the Public Service. Undoubtedly the whole staff of clerks being appointed under a special Act of Parliament had no recognised head; they were subjected to no limit of age for entering and retiring from the service, and were not under the regulation which applied to other branches of the Civil Service. It was ridiculous in these days to have these salaries regulated by a large Commission, who acted ex officio, and had practically no responsibility in the matter. The whole responsibility rested in the House of Commons and with the Speaker of the House, and having condemned the House of Lords staff it was necessary they should look into the organisation of the House of Commons staff.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the hon. Member said that Clerks of the House of Commons were entirely appointed by the Principal Clerk at the Table, without any examination.

MR. HANBURY : I said he had the right to so appoint them.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he had the right, but he really appointed by nomination. He selected six persons to be examined by the Civil Service Commissioners, and he took their recommendation. Therefore, although it was a matter of grace, the principal Clerk did carry out that principle, and although he was not compelled by Act of Parliament to do it, it was but fair to him to say he had acted upon that principle for years. It was not correct to say that the Clerks of the House were entirely free from all the requirements of the Superannuation Act. All the clerks were placed under the Act and were subject to its conditions. With respect to the Order in Council as to retirement at 65, he must say they were not under that Order. The House of Commons declined to place itself under the Order. He was told, however, by the Speaker of the House of Commons, only a few days ago, that the spirit of the Order was carried out. He might say that this was a matter entirely for the Commission for the management of the House of Commons, which included the Speaker, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Home Secretary, and the First Lord of the Treasury, together with two of Her Majesty's Judges. If any change were made in the direction suggested by his hon. Friend, it would have to be carried out by legislation, and unless they saw that the spirit of the Rules regulating the other Departments were not carried out, he, for one, did not feel inclined to take any strong action, but to leave it to the Commission, who, he believed, were acting on the principle his hon. Friend desired to see carried out.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, he did not know how the Commission was appointed, what were its duties, how often it met, or whether it had more than an ornamental existence, but he thought it was very peculiar that clerical appointments should be made at the discretion of any individual, even of a gentleman so accomplished as the Clerk of the House, under the supervision of the Speaker, and he intended at the earliest opportunity to move and to press upon the House the duty of appointing a Committee to bring the department of the Clerk of the House into conformity with the ordinary rule of the Public Service. Economy was always desirable, but if economy was to be entered upon it ought not to commence in the House of Commons but in the House of Lords. The officers of the House of Lords had lighter duties and higher pay than those of the House of Commons, and until there was some reduction in the salaries of the officers of the House of Lords it would be ridiculous to attack the officers of the House of Commons, whose duties were onerous, delicate, and exacting. He wished to put a question which might have an important bearing upon some future action of his connected with the personal experience he recently had in the House. He wished to ask whether the Clerk or the Clerk's Assistant had any duty cast upon him, or whether he had any right, when the Chairman of Ways and Means was in the Chair, to volunteer advice when the question of the punitive treatment of a Member was under consideration? Was the Clerk under such circumstances entitled to interfere, and suggest and press a course upon the Chairman, or was he, as in the case of the Speaker, only to give advice when he was asked for it? He thought it was extremely desirable that this question should be made clear, because, unless he received an assurance that it was not within the scope of the duty of the Clerk or Assistant Clerk to suggest punitive action, such as the expulsion of a Member by the Chairman, it would be his duty to take the earliest opportunity he could find for testing the opinion of Members upon the circumstances of his expulsion on a recent occasion when the Standing Order was put in force in a manner in which it was never intended to be applied. He had put the question solely in the hope that someone might be able to answer it, and that it might be made clear that no Member in future was likely to be placed in danger of censure or expulsion, because of the unasked and unauthorised intrusion of any Official of the House. Unless it was made clear it was not within the purview and right of the Officials of Parliament, he feared it would be necessary to take some future action?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member has asked a question, and I will endeavour to answer it. I believe the Clerks at the Table are the advisers, and the only advisers to whom the Speaker, if necessary, and the Chairman of Committees can have recourse. I do not believe that any such circumstances really occurred as those the hon. Gentleman has suggested. I am sure that the Clerks faithfully perform their duties, giving such advice as is required either by the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees. I hope, under those circumstances, the hon. Member will be satisfied with the assurance and declaration, and will not think it necessary to proceed farther in the matter.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that in moving this reduction he wished to disclaim any desire to reduce the salaries of the Clerks of the House, to whom he, like all other Members, had been greatly indebted for their courtesy and assistance, and his reason for moving the reduction was to raise a question which had been ruled out of Order. Every one of his reductions were moved for a set purpose; he had not put down reductions at large, but for a specific and definite purpose. He should have asked leave to withdraw the Motion before had not a discussion sprung up upon a matter of importance, and he would now ask leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, that before parting from the question, as the Secretary to the Treasury did not appear to be aware of the constitution of this particular Commission, who would state the Members of whom it consisted, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would agree with him that if any other Department were regulated by any such Commission the House of Commons would be the very first to question it and to put an end to its existence. The Commission that regulated the salaries, emoluments, and retiring allowances of the officials of the House consisted of the Speaker, the Secretaries of State, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Master of the Rolls, the Attorney General, and the Solicitor General for the time being. It was a perfectly ridiculous Commission, and another year he should certainly press the Government of the day to put an end to so absurd a system, and to adopt a system by which they would have the Business of the House of Commons regulated in a manner more akin to that which regulated other Departments.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that if the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) moved for a Committee he would ask him to include in it the officers who were appointed by others than the Chief Clerk, because there were a number of officers of the House who were appointed by others, and he thought the inquiry should be general. But he wished to ask a question in regard to the chaplain of the House. The chaplain received £400 a year. He did not wish to interfere with that; but he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would use his influence to get a Nonconformist chaplain appointed to act alternately. He belonged to the Church himself, but he wished to act fairly to his Nonconformist brethren. There were about half and half in the House, and he thought the Nonconformists were entitled to have a chaplain of their own way of thinking at least three days a week. [An hon. MEMBER: And a Roman Catholic.] By all means, if they liked. As the salary of the chaplain was paid for out of the taxes of the country, half of which were paid by Nonconformists, they were entitled to share in the benefits. He did not wish to move a reduction; but he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the event of a vacancy occurring, to use his influence with the Speaker to get a Nonconformist appointed to act alternately with the Episcopal chaplain.

SIR W. HARCOURT: One of the difficulties of the House is the large number of questions with which we have to deal, and, to add to those questions, a theological competition with reference to the chaplain would be to increase the difficulties already sufficiently burdensome.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN wished to ask a question about one item in this Vote coming under Sub-head E, as to the delivery of Parliamentary Papers. Formerly every Paper that was issued by Order of the House was delivered the next day to every Member of Parliament. He did not say that was an economical system; and it was found that some Members, instead of reading them, indulged in the reprehensible practice of selling them for waste paper, and on that account it was recommended that the number should be greatly reduced, and certain Papers were only sent to Members who applied. He did not object to that, but he wanted to point out that the new principle had been carried to excess. In the early part of the Session certain Papers were issued with regard to finance, and were published by the Government in explanation of the Home Rule Bill. These Papers only consisted of one or two pages, and the total value, if delivered to every Member, could not have amounted to £1 sterling. These Papers were withheld unless special application was made for them. In reply to a question from him, his right hon. Friend undertook to see that they were delivered, and afterwards those Papers were delivered. What he wished to ask was on what principle the delivery of Papers proceeded? In a recent Paper he received he found a notice of a very important Paper which was published annually, which gave very important particulars as to Revenue and Expenditure. That was a short Paper, and would not cost more than a halfpenny to print, and he could not conceive why that should not be forwarded. He understood that many Papers that were of interest were delayed, whilst many that were of no interest to the general body of Members were despatched at the earliest moment. He would be perfectly satisfied if the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. T. Hibbert) would give him an assurance that he would look into the matter, and that he himself would undertake to have some responsibility in the matter. It was not desirable that the present inconvenience should be stereotyped, and if the right hon. Gentleman gave him an assurance on this point he would not press the matter further.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) said, he agreed with the right hon. Member for West

Birmingham. The officials of the House were very courteous and obliging, but he thought better arrangements might be made for the distribution of Papers. From his experience he would say that it would be quite easy to alter the arrangements so as to meet the convenience of Members.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he was also agreed as to the desirability of meeting the views of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham in this matter. There were certain Papers that they did not get until late in the day, and he did not think that should be the case, as it caused serious inconvenience to Members. The service of Papers might certainly be better than it was at present.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he only had one complaint to make, and that was that he got a whole pile of Papers which he did not want without asking for them; but, as regards Irish Papers, which he did want, he found that he could not get them without application. Surely there was some remedy for this?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, there was justification for calling attention to this matter; but he would point out that the Rules for the distribution of Parliamentary Papers were laid down by a Committee appointed in 1889. All Votes, Proceedings, and Bills were distributed in the ordinary course, and so were Papers of special interest. He was sure if the hon. Member (Mr. T. W. Russell) intimated the class of Papers that would be of interest to him they would be forwarded. Orders had been given that all financial Papers relating to the Home Rule Bill should be distributed generally.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, all the Government Papers—all Papers presented by the Government—should be despatched as a matter of course.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: All Papers of general interest.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he would mention the Return issued the other day as to the pay of Honorary Colonels. Such Returns as that should be placed in the same category with others. [Cries of "Oh"!] Yes ; it was a matter he considered of general interest, and should be placed on a like footing or position.

An hon. MEMBER : In what position?

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, for his part, he thought such Papers were of general interest. He had sent them to the Public Library at Peterborough, and expected them to be filed, so that he could have the use of them for years.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said, there was a matter to which he would draw attention, upon which, he thought, hon. Members of all Parties would agree. Few of them would dispute that the expenditure on the Refreshment Department of the House of Commons was inadequate, and that the waiting arrangements were inefficient. He thought in this matter a mistake had been made in the past. A grant of £1,000 was inadequate to provide for the needs of 670 Members. The deficiency arose from the fact that the Kitchen Committee had to deal with a sum which was inadequate to the needs of the House. There were three great necessities. The first was better dining accommodation. The kitchen was wholly inadequate, and a better service room was required, so that the waiters could have a proper place in which to meet the demands made upon them. He did not complain of the refreshment contractor, Mr. Saunders. On the contrary, he said nothing could be more admirable than the manner in which that gentleman met the demands. He did not believe it would be possible to find a man who would attend to matters better than he did—certainly they would not get a man who would do it better at the same salary. But he had serious difficulties to contend with—waiting for the changes in the House and other matters, and he (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett) said that under such conditions it was impossible for them to have a proper service. Members of the House were aware that a large number of persons waited in the vicinity of Westminster about 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon in expectation of engagement for their service as waiters. The result was, because of the uncertainty and the risks the contractor had to encounter, that the attendance was very unsatisfactory, and Members did not know in what direction to turn. There should be, at least, a permanent staff of 20 or 30 head waiters—men who would know their duties, who would understand the ways of the House and the habits of Members who were accustomed to dine here. He repeated that the difficulties were not to be blamed upon the contractor or upon the waiters. It was the system that was at fault. Another thing was as to the necessity for increased accommodation. He hoped the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would consider this very important question. He believed that in foreign Houses of Legislature the accommodation was 10, and, in some cases, even 20 times as great as here. They did not ask for much. £2,000 or £3,000 would not be a large subsidy when they remembered that Members had to be in attendance very often for 8 or 10 hours. He trusted the Government would give attention to this question.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he thought the Kitchen Department was extremely well conducted, considering that it was a ready-money transaction. He rose, however, to deal with the question of the distribution of Papers, which had been previously referred to, and he hoped the Government would consider that matter with a view to the improvement of the existing system.

*MR. A. C. MORTON : The Kitchen Committee should furnish a balance-sheet. They were entitled to have some statement of gain and loss. A promise was given on the point two years ago, and he would like to know if it were to be fulfilled?

MR. S. HERBERT (Croydon) said, it had been considered by successive Kitchen Committees that it would not be expedient to place before the House a full balance-sheet, which would give rise to discussions upon items. The Members of the Committee ought to be trusted. If the hon. Member (Mr. A. C. Morton) considered it necessary, perhaps there might be a statement made of the turnover.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: Showing losses by bad debts or otherwise?

*MR. S. HERBERT said, that it would be exceedingly difficult to show the actual losses. The Committee considered that the present method of dealing with the matter was more economic and satisfactory than the former one. He agreed as to the difficulties which had been mentioned. The communication in the Dining Room was absolutely inadequate for the demands that were made upon it when there was a full attendance of the House. The Kitchen was a mere passage, unsuited for providing those who dined at the present time—sometimes 300. They had also an inadequate dining room; and the only communication between the Dining Room and the kitchen was a lift of some three feet by two. He feared that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have some difficulty in meeting their demands; but he certainly hoped that the First Commissioner (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would consult with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that they would do their best to meet the difficulties that existed. His experience showed him that it was impossible to have the matter dealt with properly until structural alterations were made. They got at present £1,000. They had to make a profit of £2,000—for the average amount they paid was about £3,000—before they could pay their way. They sometimes had the greatest difficulty; and it was evident that they must have the structural alterations in order to meet the necessities of the case. As to the wages, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could see his way to grant an additional £1,000 or £1,500, he thought the Kitchen Committee could do a good deal to improve the service. They might have a larger permanent staff—better hands than they had under the present system. The Committee would see that it would be inadvisable to have a full working staff to dine 300 Members, when they might often only have 150 Members to attend to. He thought that if they could get an increased grant from the Chancellor of the Exchequer—an increase, say, of £1,000 or £1,500 a year—the Kitchen Committee would be able to do a great deal in the way of improving the service.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am sure we are all exceedingly obliged to the hon. Member and his colleagues for taking so much trouble for the comfort and convenience of the House. So far as I am concerned, I can assure him that, in concert with him, I shall be glad to consider anything that can tend to the comfort and convenience of the House. We have been compelled this Session to dine in the House more frequently and in larger numbers than at any previous period during my Parliamentary life. The accommodation here is the result of the British Constitution. Every public building in this country is unfit for the purpose for which it was intended; and if that is true of all the Public Offices outside we can hardly expect this House, the principal Office of all, to be an exception to the rule. Certainly there are difficulties with which we have to struggle. Everybody knows the great uncertainty there always is in the attendance—much greater than befalls any club—and we ought to make every allowance for those difficulties. I hope the Committee will accept the assurance on the part of the Government that they will do what they can, in concert with the Kitchen Committee, to improve the arrangements. I would now appeal to the Committee to allow this Vote to be taken. I should hope that the Treasury Vote might be disposed of to-night, and the Motion to destroy altogether the salary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrew's, &c.) said, he was glad the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, on behalf of the Government—and he thought he might say on behalf of the whole House—recognised the admirable work of the Chairman of the Kitchen Committee. It was to be hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would favourably consider the making of an increased grant to the Committee as well as the granting of increased accommodation. He gathered from the right hon. Gentleman's last sentence that he would be willing to confer with the Kitchen Committee in regard to increasing the accommodation.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Increased accommodation is impossible.

MR. ANSTRUTHER: Increased accommodation in the money-lenders' sense.

Question put, and agreed to.

5. £52,458, to complete the sum for Treasury and Subordinate Departments.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he had put a notice of Amendment on the Paper to in certain contingencies prevent foreigners landing on our shores, and so infecting the country with cholera, but cholera had come now——

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) rose to Order. He wished to know whether, if the right hon. Gentleman was allowed to continue, it would prevent the moving of the Amendment sixth down the list, referring to an item which came before the salary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

MR. HENEAGE said, he only wished to say that he did not propose to proceed with his Motion. The reason he was going to give was that he thought it exceedingly desirable that there should be entire harmony between the Government and everyone in the measures taken to get rid of the cholera now that it had come. He was anxious not only as Member for Great Grimsby, but as a Member of the Corporation of that town, to co-operate in every way with the Local Government Board. They could thresh out any point in which they disagreed afterwards.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he took some interest in the subject of cholera.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Treasury had nothing to do with the question.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, the subject came within the Department of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for certain difficulties in the way of Port Sanitary Authorities had been removed by the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Morton) rose to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his action in that matter.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that before he proceeded with the Motion he wished to make, he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was in charge of the Business of the House, whether he would consent to report Progress? ["No, no!"] He asked because he thought that the discussion of his Motion and of the next item would occupy some time.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope the Committee will proceed with this Vote. We have been getting on very satisfactorily, and I hope we shall continue in that course.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he was quite ready to proceed. He had given notice of an Amendment to reduce the Vote for the First Lord of the Treasury, but he did not propose to move it. He wished, however, to call attention to certain phases of the policy of the Prime Minister. ["Oh!"] He did not wish to move the reduction of the right hon. Gentleman's salary, but he wished to direct attention to the fact that since the Prime Minister occupied his present position—since July or August last year—there had been throughout the country and the Empire and in our relations to Foreign Powers a general want of confidence. ["Oh, oh!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: It is out of Order to discuss the policy of the Government on this Vote.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he did not propose to go into it at length, and he only gave that as the general basis of the particular subject to which he proposed to call the attention of the Committee. He did not intend to refer to the Irish policy of the Prime Minister. He wished to call attention to the fact that certain words used by the right hon. Gentleman some two years ago at Newcastle with regard to the evacuation of Egypt had led to very serious results. [Cries of "Order!" and "Name!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman cannot on this Vote bring forward matters of policy. If he wishes to attack the Prime Minister he must do so in connection with some administrative act.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT [Cries of "Order!"]: Then I appeal to the Chairman of Committees to be good enough to inform me—[Cries of

"Name!"]—I am speaking with all respect to the Chairman of Committees, and I ask him to inform the Committee on what subject I can possibly impeach the Prime Minister in connection with this Vote? In dealing with the salary of the Foreign Secretary we are distinctly allowed to impeach his policy. I ask whether I am not at liberty to refer to certain declarations of the Prime Minister which I hold—rightly or wrongly—to have produced certain results?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would ask, as a point of Order, whether an attack can be made on the Prime Minister on this Vote for a speech made by the right hon. Gentleman before he took Office?

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no doubt about the Rule. The only thing for which the Prime Minister is answerable is some administrative act done by him as First Lord of the Treasury. Any general impeachment of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman must take place in the House of Commons, and not in Committee of Supply. The case of the Foreign Secretary is different. He can be attacked in Committee for the policy of his Department.

*MR. J. W. SIDEBOTHAM (Cheshire, Hyde) asked that consideration should be given to the case of the Assistant Inspectors of Mines. He would not go at length into the matter if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would assure him that the matter was not entirely closed, but could be re-opened, and that the Government would investigate the matter and attempt to put a stop to the great injustice these men suffered under.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he had great sympathy with this class of public servants. For many years he had been at the Home Office, and had had intimate personal relations with the Inspectors. These gentlemen were governed by regular rules which it was difficult to depart from; but he could assure the hon. Member that, if he or anyone else would bring the circumstances under his notice, he would give them the most favourable consideration.

*MR. J. W. SIDEBOTHAM: If I ask for an interview, will the right hon. Gentleman give it?

Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes; I shall be quite ready to speak to the hon. Member in private on the matter.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, these gentlemen were appointed under circumstances which led them to believe that they would receive a certain amount of superannuation so far as the Home Office was concerned. They were appointed at a time when there were no such Inspectors in the Public Service, so that there was no precedent to follow except in other branches of the Public Service.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, he desired to move to reduce the salary of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in order to call attention to the action of the Treasury in regard to the Irish Church tenants who were known as the glebe purchasers. Some time ago he had obtained the first place for a Motion dealing with this question. The Chief Secretary for Ireland appeared to be in favour of the object he had in view, but the Secretary to the Treasury had come down on him, and had refused to give him a Committee. Therefore, in the interests of these tenants he had felt bound to bring the question forward in a few words to-night. These tenants were subject to Treasury Rules—Rules which had been laid down in a most austere and mean manner. The case of these suffering men had been brought before them, but the Treasury never moved one fraction beyond what it was obliged to do. It was shown in the discussion in 1891 that, although an extension of time had been given to a number of the Irish Church tenants, yet there were some to whom that consideration had not been extended. The right hon. Gentleman had asked him if he could suggest any other way in which the Treasury could relieve the Irish Church purchasers, and he had made a suggestion. He proposed that some arrangement should be made by which these tenants could borrow the one-third or one-fourth from the Land Commission in order to pay off the usurers from whom they had borrowed it. These unfortunate people had bought at 26, 27, and 28 years' purchase. They had had to find one-third or one-fourth of the purchase money, and this they had to borrow at exorbitant rates of interest—so exorbitant that they were unable to pay off the instalments. He would ask the Secretary to the Treasury to appoint a Committee of Inquiry. It would be found that a great proportion of these tenants had been sold up through the high price they had had to pay for their holdings—the purchase having been, in a sense, compulsory. He considered that the proposal he had made under which the tenants would be able to borrow from the Land Commission at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. would, in the long run, benefit the Treasury. These were a highly honourable and deserving class of men. They existed throughout the whole length and breadth of Ireland, and they felt the pinch of the times enormously. The only argument adduced in opposition to his proposal by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that if they did this thing the money would have to come from somewhere, and the only available source was the £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 allocated under the Land Purchase Act, which fund the Government were anxious not to diminish unnecessarily. But this fund had not been got into working order to any great extent yet, and he did not see why the money he asked for should not be advanced in this way. If the Secretary to the Treasury could give this relief let him do so; if not, let him give the Committee of Inquiry. He (Sir T. Lea) begged to move the reduction of the right hon. Gentleman's salary by the sum of £1,000.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not necessary to move a reduction of the Financial Secretary's salary in order to draw attention to this subject.

SIR T. LEA: After his hard work to-night I should be glad to spare him. I will not move.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he would give the hon. Baronet the best reply he could under the circumstances. There would be very great difficulty in carrying out the suggestion of the hon. Member, because he sought to re-open the question of the number of years' purchase which had been paid by these tenants. He (Sir J. T. Hibbert) would not say that the Committee for which the hon. Member asked would not be desirable. He would like to discuss the matter with the hon. Member, and try and come to some conclusion. Therefore, he would suggest that the hon. Member should furnish the Treasury with a statement giving all the facts of the case.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrona, S.) said, it was not necessary to draw up a statement. It was admitted that these purchasers had purchased under especially hard conditions. It was, in fact, almost compulsory purchase. These persons had to borrow one-fourth of their purchase-money, while purchasers under the Land Purchase Act had the money advanced to them by the Government. All that was wanted was that, in order to prevent these men being ruined by usurious interest paid to the money-lenders and gombreen men, some arrangement should be made by the Land Commission to advance money to them in order to enable them to pay off this one-fourth. He admitted the difficulty of the case, for it would be said—"You are asking for British money to pay off Irish debts." But that was all the more reason why the Committee should consider whether these purchasers could not be placed in the same position as purchasers under the Acts of 1885 and 1891.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I shall be happy to discuss the matter with hon. Gentlemen.

SIR T. LEA said, that all he wanted was that the Irish Church purchasers under the Act of 1870 should have the same privileges as were given to the Ashbourne Act purchasers. There were one or two other things that a Committee might well investigate.

MR. TOMLINSON wished to know what was the meaning of an asterisk being put against the salaries of the Directors of the Suez Canal. What were to be the salaries paid in the future?

MR. HANBURY asked whether the Committee were to understand that after this Vote the Government would move to report Progress?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Yes. The information the hon. Member for Preston asks for can be given on Report.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, 6th September 1893.

Several Lords—Took the Oath.

PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) ACT, 1891, AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 260.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD MONKS WELL said, this was a well-intentioned Bill, the object of which was merely to restore the powers of the Metropolitan District Boards to borrow money, powers of which they have been unintentionally deprived by the effect of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Monks well.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.
(No. 265.)SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED

[SECOND NIGHT.]

Order of the Day for resuming the Debate on the Amendment to the Motion for the Second Reading, read.

Debate resumed accordingly.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, we have been told by the only man who, I will not say represents, but is, the Government on this question, that the passage of this Bill through the House of Commons and its arrival in your Lordships' House constitutes a cardinal fact in the political history of this country. I am not prepared to traverse that statement; on the contrary, I accept it to the full. It is a cardinal fact, and I believe also that it will be connected in future times with the strengthening and the revival of some cardinal convictions: and first and foremost among these will be the conviction which is forced upon the minds of all men that an inestimable value is to be attached to those functions which the ancient Constitution of our country places in your Lordships' hands, because this cardinal fact of the passage of this Bill through the House of Commons and its arrival here is not one fact, but contains a dozen other facts within itself. I will mention some of them. The first cardinal fact is that the Bill which does so come is a Bill for effecting revolutionary changes in the Constitution of this country. The second cardinal fact is that it has come to this House by the employment of revolutionary means. The third cardinal fact is that it has been sent to this House by a majority of only 5 per cent. of the whole House of Commons; and the fourth cardinal fact is that in every important case there has been a large British majority against its provisions; and the fifth cardinal fact is that this Bill has never been before the people of this country. My Lords, in these circumstances the people look to your Lordships' House, to say the least, to give them time to think. We are not only free to reject it; it is expected and it is demanded of us. I have sometimes speculated within the last week what would happen if a majority of this House, by some terrible act of weakness, by some such act of betrayal of their former convictions as we heard confessed by my noble Friend (Lord Spencer) last night, were to allow this Bill to pass. What would be the feelings of the country next morning? Over a great part of Ireland it would be a feeling of absolute dismay, and I believe that with the great majority of Great Britain there would be feelings of indignation and of shame. It may be said that some of my facts, such as those I have mentioned just now, are not matters of fact, but matters of opinion. It may be denied that this is a measure of revolutionary change. I venture to say that when this Bill passes, if it ever passes, nothing in our Constitution will stand as it stood before. Certainly not the unity of the Kingdom, for I agree with the Duke of Devonshire in drawing a great distinction between that utterly vague and meaningless phrase about the unity of the Empire and the unity of the Kingdom. Certainly not the unity of the Kingdom; certainly not the dignity of the Crown; certainly not the authority of Parliament; certainly not the responsibility of our Ministerial system; certainly not, by the confession of my noble Friend opposite, the purity of public life; and last, not least, certainly not the liberties of the people. Every one of these great interests would be profoundly affected, and profoundly affected for the worse. My Lords, are we all agreed upon this point of the immense importance of this Bill? My noble Friend (Lord Spencer) said last night, in that speech which was so full of that charm which belongs to his personal character, his moderation, courtesy, and good feeling, that at least we are all agreed upon the importance of the subject. Alas! my Lords, I do not think that we are agreed. Nothing in my noble Friend's speech gave us the least hint of the enormous effect which such a measure as this must have on the practical working of our Constitution—nothing in his speech. As I said before, that speech was full of kindness and of courtesy to us all; there was not one bitter word, not one word of recrimination in his speech. But we cannot deal with this question with rose water. It cuts too deep; it is too serious. I could not help being reminded when I heard my noble Friend's speech of two celebrated lines referring to his illustrious namesake—the poet Spenser—who wrote much about Ireland in the days of Queen Elizabeth. Courtesy towards opponents and moderation of tone are not the weapons with which this battle has been fought outside the walls of this House. My noble Friend may delight in them, and it is always very pleasing to hear him. I could not help being reminded of what Wordsworth has said of Spenser—

Called from Faëryland to struggle through dark ways.”

—and most dark were the ways through which my noble Friend has been called upon to struggle. When we heard the excuses which he made last night for the abandonment of the convictions which only a few years ago he expressed on the subject of the land in Ireland and of the retention of Irish Members at Westminster, we had a measure of the “dark ways” through which the mild Spenser of our own day has been called upon to struggle. We are not agreed, therefore, upon the importance of this subject. Did your Lordships hear the Duke of Devonshire last night re-affirm the pleas which Mr. Gladstone lately denounced? The noble Duke quoted them one by one

The Duke of Argyll

—I think they were seven in number. He said Mr. Gladstone had caricatured them all more or less, but substantially he adhered to them. What did Mr. Gladstone say of these pleas of the Unionist Party? The Duke of Devonshire did not refer to that; but so far from admitting those pleas, which are the pleas which assert the importance of this measure, Mr. Gladstone said that those pleas were all of them “enormous, hideous, and monstrous falsehoods”! I hope none of us will be accused of using strong language after that illustrious example, because, after it, we can use any language we like. I rejoice in it myself, because I do not in the least object to this language on the part of Mr. Gladstone. I know it to be perfectly sincere; he is absolutely sincere, and I am not quite sure whether he is not the only Member of the Government who is sincere. I look upon my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government as I look upon the Mahdi, or any of the dervishes in the Valley of the Nile, as a pure fanatic. He cannot look on this subject with moderation, or even with common temper. That is why I like this language, because it proves to us the inflamed state of mind of that man in whose hands the destinies of this country would be if your Lordships do not perform your duty to the people. It is perfectly clear that Mr. Gladstone does not admit the enormous importance of this measure. He treats it, and has all along treated it, as a comparatively light thing—that is to say, as if it were simply the setting up of a new municipality in the country—local government, self-government. Now, my Lords, I wish to address myself to another cardinal fact which I have not yet mentioned. There is a sixth fact of equal importance to those five which I have already enumerated. I maintain that this contest has been carried on in the country by systematic concealment and deception of the people. Not only do I say that this Bill has never been before the people, but I say that the whole of this subject has never been placed by the Gladstonian Party in the light of common fairness before the people. By ambiguities of expression, by dexterous management of words, by simple tricks of tactics, the people have been misled and confused systematically and of set purpose as to the great issues which are before them. I have said this on many platforms in the country, and I should be ashamed if I declined to justify that statement now in the presence of my noble Friends, who can answer for themselves. I say, in the first place, that the Prime Minister is the main conductor of this campaign. I do not say anything of my noble Friends opposite, as I have not seen one speech of theirs which answers to that description. The Prime Minister on this subject is the Government, and he alone. My noble Friends opposite are not the Government; we know that very well. "Our whole heart and soul," the Prime Minister said lately, "are set on this Bill." I did not hear much heart or much soul in the speeches of the noble Lords opposite delivered last night. No; we have to deal with Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Gladstone alone, as regards his power, as regards his influence in the country, and as regards the methods adopted in the prosecution of this question. I say here, as I have said elsewhere, that the advocacy of this measure has been pursued by passionate misrepresentation of history. I have endeavoured to show that in another form; and I am not going to trouble the House to-night with a single word on the subject: but it has been pursued by passionate misrepresentation of contemporary events and of recent history, and especially it has been treated with the utmost deception, I think, as regards the relation between this Bill and the Union between us and Ireland, and the Repeal of that Union. We know exactly the date of the conversion of the Government by the date of the conversion of the Prime Minister—

"When I began last autumn to weigh deeply this question."

Such are the words in which Mr. Gladstone explained, not in a speech, but in a published article, "The History of an Idea"—

"When I began last autumn to weigh deeply this question."

That is, the autumn of 1885. My Lords, just think of the confession these words imply—

"I began last autumn to weigh deeply this Irish Question."

Let me remind the House of the stages which have passed since the Union.

From 1800 to 1829, 29 years elapsed. During the whole or the greater part of that time, Ireland came before us upon the Catholic question. As you know, it was carried to a triumphant issue by the Catholics in Ireland on behalf of the Catholics of the whole country. From 1829 to 1842, 13 years elapsed. We had Ireland before us again in the form of the Daniel O'Connell agitation for Repeal. The moment he got Catholic Emancipation he set to work to start the agitation for Repeal. When that was suppressed by Sir R. Peel in 1842, then, from 1842 to 1870, a period of 28 years, we had Fenianism and many of those local disturbances which kept Ireland again perpetually before us. From 1870 to 1885, the date of Mr. Gladstone's Hegira, or conversion, 15 years, we had the Home Rule agitation under Mr. Butt and Mr. Parnell. There are 15 years between the initiation of the Home Rule policy of Mr. Butt and the new convictions of Mr. Gladstone, until he had "begun to weigh this Irish Question." Now, my Lords, I have sometimes wondered whether it is possible to argue at all with my noble Friends opposite. No argument can be conducted without some common ground of agreement. We are not agreed, I am afraid, as to what is the Constitution of the country; we are not agreed as to what are the liberties of the people; we are not agreed, I much fear, as to what constitutes the honour of public men in public questions. But, in searching diligently whether I could find any words of common agreement between me and my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, I find one striking passage. It is not in a speech; it is taken from a deliberate writing; and there I find these two propositions laid down—they are all that I desire:—

"This question," he says, "goes down to the very roots of our whole civil and political Constitution."

Nothing could be stronger than that. This is no Bill to give local liberties; it is no Bill to set up a new municipality; it is no Bill for the mere extension of what we know very well as connected with domestic government. It is a Bill, he says, "which goes down to the very roots of our whole civil and political Constitution." The second proposition is that this is a subject with which up to that time the British mind was absolutely unprepared to deal—"as ignorant of it," are his words, "as of the differential calculus." On these two facts and admissions by Mr. Gladstone I base my argument to-night; and I venture to lay down this principle as one which should gain the assent of both sides of this House—that if a great measure which goes to the "roots of our civil and political Constitution" is brought forward at a time when the British mind—not one class only, but the whole British mind—was "as ignorant" on the subject "as they are on the differential calculus," it is the absolute duty of those who attempt to devise a new British Constitution to exercise the duty of perfect candour towards the people of this country. Anything like shiftiness, concealment, deceit, is a great crime against the people of this country, and the more so when we remember that the task of drawing up a new Constitution "going to the very roots of our whole civil and political Constitution" is an absolute novelty in the whole history of England. Not one of our revolutions has been made in any other name than the name of pre-existing laws. No group of 12 or 13 men, whatever their qualifications in their own minds may be, have ever sat round a green table and deliberately determined to frame a Constitution "going to the whole roots of our civil and political Constitution"; it is an absolute novelty in the history of England. Now, my Lords, has this been the conduct of the Government? What is the explanation we are to give of the sudden conversion of the Prime Minister and certain of his Colleagues? It is all very well to say it was in the autumn of 1885; do we not all remember what happened in the autumn of 1885? Was not that the date when a certain large contingent of Irish Members was added to the Irish brigade in the House of Commons? I would like to read to your Lordships what was the plan of campaign under which and before which Mr. Gladstone struck his colours. Here is a description of the policy of Mr. Parnell—

"Why not start in the House of Commons an Irish National Party, which should express by its very action in Parliament the distrust and hatred felt by so many of the Irish people to any and every English Parliament? Would not the vast majority of the Irish people soon begin to put faith in the Party which employed its position in the House of Commons to worry and obstruct the House of Commons and make it ridiculous in the eyes of foreign nations? What ardent Irish Nationalist could refuse to give his support and approval to a Party like this?"

There is the explanation of the sudden conversion—and whose words are these? They are the words of your nominal Irish Leader—the mild M'Carthy. It was to this conspiracy, and nothing else, that Mr. Gladstone struck his colours; contemporary events prove it. It was because you were overmastered in Parliament, and because you saw a chance of making a dishonourable alliance with the Irish Party. That is my explanation of the Hegira in policy of a portion of the Liberal Party. This policy, these tactics, this policy of dealing with this tremendous question—cutting to the roots of our whole civil and political Constitution by tricks of tactics—is not my accusation; it is the avowal of the Prime Minister himself. Do we not remember the speech he made on January 8, 1886, on the Address to the Crown? I have read that speech over and over again with ever-increasing astonishment. He began by professing a desire to separate this question from every Party interest; he said it would be a great crime to make it a Party question; he could not use language strong enough; nothing he did should tend, so far as he could help it, to mix it up with politics. He said—

"I hope some Member of the Government opposite will take up that view of satisfying the demands of Ireland."

Then came the contradiction. Addressing the younger Members of the House of Commons, his language was to this effect—"There are many young Members in this House. Perhaps I may be allowed to give the advice of an old man, an old Parliamentary hand. Hold your tongues; keep your counsel. I mean to keep my counsel; I advise you to keep yours. I am the great Paujandrum; I am the great necromancer, the old Parliamentary hand; watch me, follow me, and I will show you how to win the trick."

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): Is that a quotation?

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL : No. Quotations, my Lords, are quite fair in two forms—when they are avowedly given verbatim, and when they are avowedly given as the meaning of the words used. I have the precise words of Mr. Gladstone here. He said—

“Addressing those who have taken their seats for the first time, I may avail myself of the privilege of old age to offer a recommendation. I will tell them of my own intention to keep myself and to reserve my own freedom until I see the moment and the occasion when there may be a prospect of public benefit in endeavouring to make a movement forward.”

And these are the last words—

“And I shall venture to recommend them, as an old Parliamentary hand, to do the same”

This is the Leader who deprecated above all things mixing up this Irish question with Party tactics—an open avowal that he was going to treat it in the spirit of an old Parliamentary hand. And well he has fulfilled his part. His one object throughout this campaign and that of all his followers—and they have followed him with abject slavery—was to arouse passion, to conceal his cards, and to take advantage of that universal ignorance which he declared to exist in the British mind. How did the campaign begin? It began by a ferocious attack on the Act of Union and on its great author. I suppose we all remember the expression which slipped out with regard to the action of the most illustrious figure who has ever appeared on the political horizon of this country—the “blackguardism” of the Union and of Mr. Pitt. It was in a private letter, I am bound to say a letter which I do not think was ever intended to be published, and I quote it merely as showing the temper of mind in which the Prime Minister of the country addressed himself to this great topic—“the blackguardism of the Union.” And this was followed by an attempt to connect the opposition to the Union with the Liberal Party and with Liberal politics. Now, I hold this to be a fundamental part of the historical question, and on this subject I rely on an authority which will be acceptable, I think, to noble Lords opposite. On this subject I place myself almost entirely in the hands of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary. Many of your Lordships may have read the admirable little book which Lord Rosebery has published on the life of Pitt. It is a very brilliant performance, and, what is better than brilliant, it is a solid contribution to the political literature of this country. There are some passages in it which I venture to think are purely conventional. The noble Earl obviously did not wish to accentuate too much the broad divergence between the view which he takes of his illustrious ancestral kinsman—for I believe he was such—and that which is common to the Liberal Party of the day. A few sentences are dexterously added, with the diplomatic skill of the noble Earl, just to take off the edge of the contrast; but, with the exception of those passages, the book represents the exact view of the Union and of Mr. Pitt’s conduct on that great question which I am disposed to take. I agree with Lord Rosebery on these three great questions—(1) On the conduct of the Whig Party at that time—that is to say, the Foxite Liberals; (2) the conduct of Mr. Pitt; and (3), which is more relevant to this controversy, the true character of the Act of Union. As regards the Whig Party, I cannot forget that I myself belong to a Whig family. I have never held Office in connection with the modern Conservative Party, but I am bound to say that, although I think some of the expressions of the noble Earl with regard to the Foxite Whigs are somewhat over-severe, and almost spiteful, yet in the main I agree with him. They had but one motive in the world, and that was to oppose everything that was proposed by Mr. Pitt. Their conduct at that time was, in my opinion, eminently unpatriotic. I never had the smallest sympathy with them, and I subscribe altogether to the language in which the noble Earl has condemned them. But the noble Earl must remember that the Whig Party and the Liberal Party have long repented of their failure upon that celebrated occasion; and the repentance was not alone with them, but it was with others who were still more deeply engaged in the resistance to Mr. Pitt. Grattan himself, who came across to this country, and was for a short time a Member of the House of Commons, in 1820, upon his death-bed, spent his last breath on earth in expressing his earnest hope that the Union which he had so long resisted should never be repealed. We have that on the authority of two of the most illustrious men who have ever sat in the British House of Commons—the authority of William Wilberforce and of Sir James Mackintosh. Then, as regards the attempt to connect modern Liberalism with that of 1800, do we not remember that Lord Grey in 1834 was the Minister who put into the mouth of the Sovereign—the King's Speech at the time—the opinion, in language which I declare even now I think was exaggerated, that the highest interests and salvation of the Empire depended on the maintenance of the Union? How dare you quote the Liberalism of 1800 when you have these facts staring you in the face? Do you not know that so late as this Session it has been stated—and I believe with perfect truth—that a son of Daniel O'Connell has signed a Petition to Parliament against the Home Rule Bill? I agree with the noble Earl when he says in his volume that the Union was passed with a rare unanimity, and I believe Mr. Pitt was right when he said it was supported by all who were not secret enemies of the British Empire. I pass to the question of the corruption of Mr. Pitt—the corruption by which the Union was effected. There has been no weapon used more prominently by Mr. Gladstone than this old story. On that subject, also, I put myself in the hands of the Foreign Secretary. I admire his account of it, and believe it to be true. He says that in Ireland at that time nothing could be done without corruption. The enfranchisement of the Roman Catholic voters was obtained by corruption. Lord Rosebery is right when he says that Mr. Pitt's conduct can be defended on this broad ground—that it was his object to buy out corruption and close its annals for ever as regards the relations of the two countries, and he did it. The Union did put an end to corruption in that gross form. That is the true explanation, and, my Lords, he did put an end to corruption. There is only one observation of the noble Earl's in that book, and in reference to this subject, to which, alas! I cannot subscribe. It is part of the conventional form of treating these former times to say that we must not judge them by the standard of morals of our own time, and the noble Earl implies that as to any corruption in our day, the thing is so entirely out of the question that it is hardly fair to judge of Mr. Pitt by the magnificent standard of our own time. Alas! my Lords, this may have been the case within recent times, but it is no longer the case since the formation of the present Government. I know no Government in the history of the Kingdom which has been so corrupt as this Government. There is nothing that has not been put up to auction—the auction of a few votes. “Marching through plunder to disintegration” was Mr. Gladstone's own description of the Irish Party; to give them the means and the opportunities of plunder has been his great object in order to secure their votes. My Lords, it is not merely in the sale of principles, in the sale of opinions, but it is actually in money's worth—in money. The dangerous principle that the State can regulate values and determine prices is eating deeply, by moral and pecuniary corruption, into the constitution of society in this country. When candidates address themselves now to the Irish people they say—“We will form a Government that will reduce your rents to prairie value.” That is worse than any money corruption ever invented by Pitt. Pitt's corruption was temporary and for temporary purposes; this is a permanent fountain of corruption planted in the hearts of the people and the customs of the country. All I can say is that if this is to be your principle of government I am sorry for the coming democracy. My own belief is, and has always been, that, however you may define it, what people call democracy is absolutely inevitable. But a democracy may be a virtuous democracy or a corrupt democracy, and it depends much on the conduct and character of public men in such controversies as that in which we are now engaged whether the democracy of the future is to be an honest one or not. As regards this form of corruption, something like the words of Shakespeare often occur to my mind—

“Who bribes with money bribes with trash,
But he that bribes with our good laws
Sells that which naught enriches him,
And makes us poor indeed.”

There is another phase of this controversy in which I agree with Lord Rosebery, and that is the character of Irish independence as given in 1782. Mr. Gladstone always praises excessively the Act of 1782, which set up Grattan's Parliament. He treats it as the concession of an ancient right which Ireland had always possessed. The view he thus takes of it is historically, entirely untrue, but I pass over that. Indeed, I have not found one historical statement of Mr. Gladstone that will bear investigation. I do not mean to say that the individual facts are wrong; but, as we all know, "truths half told are ever the blackest of lies." If you tell half the truth and not the other half you may prove anything. Mr. Gladstone's speeches are full of truths stated in carefully-selected language—one-half the facts is given, but the other half is carefully suppressed, so that the whole representation is false. Lord Rosebery does not praise this scheme of Irish independence; but, on the contrary, says that it was "an act of cowardice," and I entirely agree with him. It was the sheer shame of impotence. He says—"In the sheer shame of impotence this Parliament of Grattan's was set up." And how was it so set up? It was set up by repealing a Declaratory Act. This shows you the value of Declaratory Acts, how strong they are, and how worth your while it is to rely upon Declaratory Acts, Declaratory Clauses, and declaratory words. But the shame of that transaction was this: that Grattan's Parliament was set up without a single attempt to define the future Constitution or relations of the two countries. I come now to the question of Home Rule, and on this matter, again, we have had the most dexterous management on the part of the Government of the day—that is to say, on the part of its head. I really cannot blame any of my noble Friends opposite for any of the misstatements to which I shall have to call attention. Now, with regard to the relation between Repeal and this Bill of Home Rule. My noble Friend (Lord Spencer), in the course of his electoral campaign, came down to the West of Scotland and made an interesting speech in the County of Dumbarton, in which he said that other people had indeed set up the notion of Home Rule as distinguished from Repeal. For, though Mr. Gladstone did all he could to damage the Union, he knew well enough that the words, Repeal of the Union, had been so long familiar to the people of this country that it would never do to say that he went in for Repeal of the Union, so he adopted the minor phrase of Home Rule.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Earl SPENCER): Is my noble Friend quoting my words here?

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: No; I am coming to them, if my noble Friend will have a little patience; but really the quotation I am going to give has nothing to do with special words. It is his representation at Dumbarton that nobody knew what Home Rule meant before Mr. Gladstone defined it. That is not the fact. The noble Earl ought to have known that early in 1870 the policy of Home Rule had been formulated by Mr. Butt much more distinctly than it was formulated by Mr. Gladstone before he introduced his Bill of 1886. I have recently found the original resolution drawn up by Mr. Butt, and used by him at a meeting held in Dublin in 1870, and I was very much surprised to find that all the formulas used by Mr. Gladstone in this campaign were bodily stolen from Mr. Butt. The very words and expressions of Mr. Butt's resolution were copied by Mr. Gladstone, repeated all over the country, and constituted his battle-horse with the constituencies. Mr. Butt said he wanted Home Rule for Ireland for exclusively Irish and domestic affairs. Yet how did Mr. Gladstone treat that for 15 long years? What was the relation he recognised between Home Rule and Repeal of the Union? Did he begin by saying—"I see what you are at. You call it Home Rule, you mean Repeal of the Union?" Yes, that is what he did say. He called it a "new formula," and that was exactly what it was. It was a new formula for Repeal. For 15 years, up to the age of 75, when most men have sown their wild oats pretty successfully, he resisted Home Rule admirably, defined though it had been by Mr. Butt. And on what grounds? He said in the first place it is a new formula, and then more specifically—"Until you tell me what you mean by Irish domestic affairs one by one we cannot even judge of your proposal." Well! That is exactly what we Unionists have been saying for the last seven years. And yet this is the formula which he carefully repeated after his conversion, knowing that it was an unintelligible, because ambiguous, formula admirably adapted for deceiving an ignorant electorate. He also said—"I see what you mean. You mean to have a separate Parliament of your own, and also Irish Members here to control us." On which poor Mr. Butt got up and mumbled something to the House of Commons, as much as to say that he did not mean that, and then Mr. Gladstone pounced on him and said—"It is all very well for the hon. Member to say that when the blot has been hit." That is the "blot" which he now presents to the British Parliament, and asks the British House of Commons and the British House of Lords to swallow to the very dregs—to give Ireland a separate Parliament, and to have an Irish contingent here also to overrule us in our home affairs. Well, then, my Lords, is this one of our monstrous falsehoods? Yes, it is. This very doctrine, which for 15 long years Mr. Gladstone insisted upon on every platform of the country, is the very doctrine that he now condemns as one of our "monstrous and hideous falsehoods." How can you trust a public man whose mind is permanently in such a state of instability that he constantly discards one day what he had said the previous day. That is the question here. Now, I want to show your Lordships a few more of the points on which Mr. Gladstone has dealt disingenuously with the people of this country. Comparing Home Rule with Repeal of the Union, which is the stronger measure of the two? He knows that it is not safe to take up the old dishonoured and discredited cry of Repeal. He says—"I only want you to grant Home Rule. These blessed Irishmen are willing to take only a little part of what they once had. They had entire independence under Grattan's Parliament, but they ask you now for some scraps of the great powers they enjoyed then." That was the tone of Mr. Gladstone during several years. It is the tone of many of his speeches up to the latest date. I need not tell you that this is absolutely deceptive unless it be true that the measure of Home Rule would give less than the restoration of Grattan's Parliament. Well, I turn to the language of himself and his Colleagues the other day, and I find that they use these two opposite arguments exactly as it suits them. "Repeal is much more than Home Rule; Repeal is much less than Home Rule." There is no continuity of argument. My noble Friend said the other day he was converted because there was no continuity of policy. Has there been any continuity of policy in his arguments, and in those of his Colleagues? Here is what Mr. Gladstone said about the independence of Grattan's Parliament—

"What was the condition of Ireland before the Union?"

This was in May, 1892.

"It was that of a country governed by a Parliament as entirely independent as is the Parliament sitting within these walls at the present day."

That is when he wanted to exaggerate the power of Grattan's Parliament, and to prove how reasonable and moderate were the demands of his Irish friends. Let us compare that with a sentence of Mr. J. Morley, who did not find it convenient to take that view of the matter. In this very year Mr. Morley said—

"Then there was Grattan's Parliament; but would anybody contend that Grattan's Parliament gave the Irish people such control over their own laws and destinies as this Bill would give them."

Exactly; this Bill is not less but greater than Grattan's Parliament. If you had repealed the Union before, and restored Grattan's Parliament, you would have had complete control over legislation in Ireland; but under this Bill you will have practically none. It is on this great question of the relation between this Bill and the old demand for Repeal that there has been systematic deception of the people. Then, my Lords, I pass to another point of cardinal importance, upon which I think the people have been equally deceived, and that is the power and value of Declaratory Acts. The Government say—"We have satisfied our supporters by putting in a declaration of the supremacy of Parliament." I believe there has never been such a case of political imposture as this. Have we had no experience of Declaratory Acts? What do we know about the Declaratory Act for America in 1766? It was immediately answered by the Declaration of American Independence. That Act was passed by Lord North and the other Tories of that time, and that is the policy of the Liberal Government now—to resort to Declaratory Acts or Declaratory Clauses. Then what is your other experience of Declaratory Acts? There was the Declaratory Act of 1719, which asserted the supremacy of the English Parliament over Ireland. What became of that? When there was great pressure upon us, when we were in low water with the Continental Powers, and had hardly a regiment to send to Ireland, that Declaratory Act was immediately repealed. Are you really trying to deceive the people of this country by giving them to understand that a few words in the Preamble of an Act of Parliament are better than a whole Declaratory Act? Are you not resorting to the same kind of double dealing to which my noble Friend (the Duke of Devonshire) referred last night, when he spoke of the play between the words the "unity of the Empire" and the "unity of the Kingdom?" In this Bill there is a declaration, not of any supreme power of control over Ireland specially, but only over all the "dominions of the Queen." We know that already it is a doctrine of Constitutional Law. It is a pious opinion, and nothing more. Try to put in force the doctrine of the supremacy of the Crown over New Zealand, South Australia, or in Melbourne, and you will find where you are. That effort will be followed immediately by another Declaration of Independence, and you would have to repeal the Declaratory Act. There is nothing in this declaration of supremacy which has the smallest practical effect, because you have no arms with which you can enforce it. I look upon this as a very dangerous deception of the people. People ignorant, as Mr. Gladstone says the electorate are, upon these great Constitutional questions are apt to be deceived by vague words such as these. Let us try if we can undeceive them by reference to our own history—alas! calamitous history—within comparatively recent times. Then take the reference to colonial independence. Can anything be more deceptive? Mr. Gladstone himself said in 1886 there could be nothing more dangerous than to give to Ireland so much of independence as to excite her national feeling, and not enough of independence to satisfy her desires. That is exactly what you are doing in this Bill. You are pretending that Ireland is a separate nationality; you are talking of our laws as "foreign" laws; you are talking of our Army as a "foreign" Army; you are talking of all our legislation, most falsely, as the origin of all Irish troubles; and you pretend to think that that modicum of liberty which you give under the Bill will satisfy the spirit of nationality in Ireland, to which you appeal. No, my Lords, that is impossible. I have a few other instances to give of the deception practised upon the people, and none greater than the constant repetition of the expression "Irish affairs." I have counted in one declaration of Mr. Gladstone's no fewer than 14 variations of the expression "Irish affairs," invented by Mr. Butt, and taken by Mr. Gladstone second-hand—"Irish affairs," "domestic affairs," "affairs exclusively their own," and so on, but no definition ever being given as to what was meant by "Irish affairs." Municipal Government was suggested. But what was really meant we now know was free scope given to the Irish Legislature to take action involving the complete sacrifice of the life, liberty, and property of the subjects of the Queen. Nothing has struck me more during the whole of this electoral contest than the utter absence in the speeches of my noble Friend opposite and of his Colleagues of the slightest reference to the personal liberty of the subject. They were great on the "unity of the Empire," which may mean anything or nothing. They were great on various other vague phrases, such as "Irish affairs"; but never once did they say that they meant to secure to Irishmen the personal liberty for which we have fought through so many centuries of English government. Never. And yet you pretend to be the only people who represent the Liberal Party. The vindication of personal liberty has been the one great object of the Liberal Party in this country from its earliest times. I should say it is the definition of their creed, and yet in the whole of this contest you have not even promised or held out the hope to the minority of the Irish people that their personal liberties will not be sacrificed. Then as to the consent of the Irish Members. The Duke of Devonshire told us last night that in 1886 Mr. Gladstone never consulted his Colleagues about his change of policy. Whom, then, did he consult? Did he consult Mr. Parnell? Was there any secret communication—any underground railway between Hawarden and Mr. Parnell? I never knew, and I do not know now; but I know that Mr. Gladstone took care to speak early in the Debate at the opening of the Session, and held out the flag of Home Rule. Mr. Parnell followed, and followed suit. He took care to use words which might be interpreted as meaning his acceptance of the offer vaguely made by Mr. Gladstone, and from that moment Mr. Gladstone declared that he had the assent of the Irish Members to his schemes. Now, my Lords, what turned out to be the fact? We have the revelation of Committee Room 15, where both Irish factions united in saying that a message was sent to them by Mr. Gladstone, or at least on his behalf, telling them that if they did not accept his offer he would retire from public life and they would get nothing. That is how the assent of the Irish Members was obtained. I was a Member of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet when the Coercion Act was passed. I agree with Mr. Gladstone that we made a mistake in that Act, not in enacting coercion, but in the particular form which that coercion took. Arbitrary arrest was a bad form, and Mr. Gladstone has revealed to a large extent the secrets of the Cabinet at that time in the article which he wrote on the life of Mr. Forster. I think Mr. Gladstone was quite right to back out of that Act as soon as he could, but Mr. Forster was also quite right when he said—"Do not back out of it until you have a substitute in some better and safer Act." Mr. Gladstone said—"Oh, no; we will back out of it at once. The one thing we have to ascertain"—and this is a wonderful instance of the credulity of Mr. Gladstone—"is the state of Mr. Parnell's mind at the time. The moment we have ascertained the state of the prisoner's mind, the moment we have reason to believe that he will be a good boy for the future—we will let him out without any precautions." And who was sent to ascertain Mr. Parnell's views? Who but Captain O'Shea! The idea of making a great question of State policy depend upon the "state of Mr. Parnell's mind" and of sending this unfortunate Captain O'Shea to ascertain what was the "state of his mind" was a perfect specimen of the credulity and folly which have characterised the Government in the whole management of this business. There is another matter in which the Government have treated the people of this country most unfairly. They have said—"Let us put confidence in the Irish people; let us trust to the union of hearts."

Yes; but what have they done in this Bill? What have they done to show confidence in the Irish people where their own money is concerned? When the lives, liberties, and property of your fellow-subjects are at stake you express perfect confidence in these men, but when your own money is at stake you make the harshest and severest stipulations in your own favour. Trust in the Irish Parliament! Was there ever such an imposture? Remember, my Lords, what you have done. You have advanced £8,000,000 or £9,000,000 to the peasantry of Ireland for the purpose of buying land. The money has been advanced by the British Treasury at considerable sacrifice. Could there be a debt of honour more absolutely due from the Irish Parliament than this? But do the Government trust to their honour? No. Look at Clause 13 of this Bill. Under that clause, if the interest on the money is not paid, the British Treasury, through the Lord Lieutenant, is empowered to arrest the whole Revenue of Ireland and to prevent the expenditure of a penny of it on Irish purposes until the debt is paid. In these circumstances, the pretence of trusting in the Irish people is a great political imposture—nothing but an imposture—by your own confession. Then there is the Tribute. If you had perfect confidence in the Irish Parliament you would not impose tribute at all. Why do not you trust to their voting supplies if there is a perfect union of hearts, if the honour of our Crown is the honour of their Crown; why, if the honour of our country is the honour of their country, cannot you trust the Irish Parliament? "Oh, no!" you say, "we must have a fixed sum in the form of Tribute." I will not discuss the amount of the tribute. I believe that it is £2,000,000 at least less than the Irish people ought to pay; but I will not higggle over the mess of pottage for which you are selling the liberties of your fellow-men, for that is the nature of the transaction as I regard it. There is another point which ought to be interesting to my noble Friend (Lord Playfair) who is, I believe, to follow me in this Debate—I refer to the question of Irish Protectionism. Does my noble Friend see what lies before us in the future? This Bill prevents the Irish Parliament from imposing Customs Duties or Excise for Revenue purposes ; it prevents them from adopting Protectionism ; it prevents them even imposing for Revenue purposes Customs Duties. Does my noble Friend think that that is a secure arrangement ? Is he aware that Mr. Gladstone has distinctly stated that he does not hold that fiscal unity is a necessary part of Imperial unity ? Does he know that Mr. Gladstone has declared that it is only with the consent of the Irish people that we can impose upon them Revenue restrictions ? How long do you think that the Irish people will remain contented with this scheme ? If you set up a separate Parliament and a separate Executive in Ireland, if you establish her people in the position of a separate nationality, sooner or later they will certainly demand to have the control over the whole of their Revenue. I wish now to say a few words on the question of ascendancy in Ireland. The accusation against the Ulster people is that they are seeking for a renewal of their old ascendancy. I say that that is a gross libel on the Ulster people. The Presbyterians of Ireland never had any share in the Protestant ascendancy. The golden age of Presbyterianism in Ulster, according to Mr. Gladstone, was when they were all Jacobins and wished to throw over the authority of England, and to bring Ireland under the government of Wolfe Tone, and under the government of the French Democracy. That was the golden age in Mr. Gladstone's opinion ; he is always appealing to it. But there was no ascendancy on the part of the Presbyterians of Ulster, and what they dread now is that you should give them over bound hand and foot as regards their personal liberties, their property, taxation and everything else, into the hands of men whom you yourselves have described as advancing through plunder to disintegration. The Presbyterians of Ulster have no desire for ascendancy, and do not possess it now. "Let us alone" is all they ask. Now, my Lords, there is another point to which I must allude, because I must say it appears to me to be another conspicuous instance of political imposture ; and that is the importation into this Bill of a few words taken from the American Constitution. No later than October last Mr. Gladstone wrote a paper in which he said that any quotation or any line adopted from the American Constitution could be nothing but "a frivolous amusement." Those were his words. When I heard that this Bill was brought into the House of Commons, and that it contained a clause copied from the American Constitution, I was quite sure what had happened ; the "old Parliamentary hand" had determined that the quotation from the American Constitution should be nothing but "a frivolous amusement." And so it turned out to be. It was copied from a part of the American Constitution which had reference to the Central Government, and not to the Local Government at all. It was copied from a part of the American Constitution which imposed restrictions on the Executive as well as on the Legislative power. But he applied it only to legislation, thus rendering it perfectly useless. The great difference is this—that in America the Central Power has Central Courts to administer its Supreme Law, bringing home the liberty of the subject, or of the citizen to every man's door, to every man's domestic hearth in every State of the Union. And whenever the Opposition brought forward any Amendment for the purpose of putting life into this quotation from the American Constitution they were met by the resistance of the Government, which acts under the dictation of the Irish Party. My Lords the people of Ulster have reason, and very good reason, to fear. I must traverse the assertion of Lord Spencer that the Ulster people have no right to refuse this Bill. I stand here to say, speaking to the people of the United Kingdom and to the people of America and of the Continent, that men have a right to refuse to agree to the transference of their allegiance from one authority to another. I repeat what I stated in this House upon a recent occasion—that the duty of allegiance and the extension of protection are correlatives in all civilised societies. If you give up protecting men, their lives, their liberties, and their property—if you delegate it to others, you have lost the right to their allegiance. I say that distinctly as a general principle. The Liberal Party ought to acquiesce in this doctrine. It is not for them to deny it. Absolute obedience to Kings or to majorities has never been a principle of the Liberal Party. I am myself the descendant of men who resisted authority and suffered death in defence of the liberty of the subject. I, therefore, cannot hold the doctrine of passive obedience in all circumstances. If you throw over the people of Ulster and commit them to the authority of men who you confess have done constantly what my noble Friend Lord Spencer calls discreditable acts—I say that if you treat the people of Ulster in that way, you will lose your right to their obedience; and they will have a right, as Lord Rosebery remarked last year, in his reference to a Cossack prisoner in the Crimea, to refuse to be taken captive by their new masters. I have but little more to say. I must, however, tax your Lordships' patience a little longer in order to refer to a favourite theme of the Prime Minister's, in which, I believe, we may detect the cause of much of the extraordinary conduct we have seen. The Prime Minister says we must submit to the inevitable. He says it is quite inevitable that this separation should come—that this breaking down of the Imperial Parliament is inevitable. I have a great respect, my Lords, for men who submit to the inevitable, for men who bow their heads to fate, cover their heads with the toga, and receive the stabs from the swords of their enemies; but I have no respect for men who make things inevitable, who make inevitable misfortunes which they could easily avoid by a little manliness and a little courage. I maintain that nothing like this Bill is inevitable. On the contrary. My Lords, do not let us think that to-night we are fighting for the last time in a losing battle. I believe we are winning in a great campaign. I believe that the future is on our side. Ours are not the times when great Empires are being broken up into petty Principalities. Ours is the era, ours is the century of union, of strength by union, and I believe that our strength will lie in the maintenance of this Union. Inevitable! Why, I have been spending the last few weeks in a part of Scotland whence we look down upon the hills of Antrim. We can see the colour of their fields, and in the sunset we can see the glancing of the light upon the windows of the cabins of the people. This is the country, I thought the other day when I looked on the scene—this is the country which the greatest English statesman tells us must be governed as we govern the Antipodes. Was there ever such folly? I agree with Thomas Carlyle when he said, in his own picturesque style, England, Scotland, and Ireland are one by the ground plan of the world. By geographical propinquity, by common brotherhood, by common blood, we are one. We want nothing but equality—equal laws on both sides of the Channel. My Lords, if there is a single grievance remaining in Ireland at the present moment, it is entirely due to the present Prime Minister. That grievance is this—that the Roman Catholics of Ireland have not been allowed any University system. Why was that? It was because Mr. Gladstone introduced an absurd Bill a few years ago, which my noble Friend opposite, Lord Playfair, took a leading part in defeating, having, no doubt, the guidance of the professional spirit. And since that day what has Mr. Gladstone done? Nothing.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: You were responsible for that Bill.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I know; and I am quite willing, if my noble Friend wishes it, to explain how that was. I thought it was an absurd Bill at the time, and that it must inevitably fail. And who defeated it? Nobody had a greater hand in defeating it than my noble Friend opposite, Lord Playfair. Mr. Gladstone declared that the Catholics of Ireland had a great grievance. What has he done since to remedy that grievance? Nothing. Not only that, but he has practically declared that because they resisted his measure, and defeated him, they would get nothing more out of him. I must say that, in my opinion, the Catholics of Ireland have a grievance, and it is Mr. Gladstone's fault that it has not been remedied. All I can say is that we wish, my Lords, for a union of hearts; we wish for a union of interests; we wish for nothing more and nothing less. We desire and are determined that this Union shall be maintained—not a nominal Union, not a Union under the Crown merely, but a Union of Parliaments, a Union of Executive, a Union of the Judiciary, a Union with one system of just and equal laws.

LORD PLAYFAIR : My Lords, it is a formidable task to speak after the noble Duke, whose stately eloquence has long been the admiration of your Lordships and of the public. Not one word of that speech would your Lordships have wished unsaid ; but I noticed that in a speech which occupied more than an hour and a half, he only gave about twenty minutes to the Bill before us. He gave an interesting history of how this has become a substantial question, and stated his arguments why Home Rule should not be given. I will traverse that part of his speech in due time, and show that the condition of things is such that Home Rule must be given. I hope, however, to be able to traverse his main arguments, which I take to be the tendency to separation, supremacy of Parliament, and the danger to the minority ; but before doing so I desire to lay before your Lordships some general considerations which, to my mind, render a Home Rule measure inevitable now, or in the near future. On June 10, 1886, the noble Duke delivered a remarkable speech in this House, in which, as he has now done, he offered to redress the grievances of Ireland. Upon that occasion he offered a large measure of Municipal Local Government to Ireland—a measure so wide and broad that he included in it some matters which we consider so Imperial that in this Bill we have prevented the Irish Government from dealing with them. The noble Duke said he was prepared to grant to his new Municipal Government the right to repeal Free Trade and establish Protection if they thought it desirable. Mr. Courtney, in another place, said the same thing, and divided the House upon that subject ; but the Duke of Devonshire yesterday was much more guarded. He did not say that that was a subject either of Municipal or Parliamentary right of the Irish people ; but he did say that his mode of redressing the grievances of Ireland would be to give Local Government in an enlarged form ; and he mentioned the fact that the last Government had introduced a measure for the introduction of County Councils. It is true that they did, but they smothered the measure with such restrictions and suspicions that it died on the day of its birth. Lord Clare, in 1801, argued that a system of Local Government in Ireland should be the corollary to the Union, and had such a measure been introduced the demand for Home Rule might not be so clamant as it now is ; and certainly the Irish would have been better prepared for a separate Parliament. In the latter half of this century frequent demands have been made for the reform of Municipalities and of County Government. But even when the House of Commons passed measures of this kind the House of Lords persistently refused their consent. Since 1836, 12 Bills for the better Local Government of Ireland have been rejected, and four others have been dropped. It is true that in 1840 Parliament passed an Act reducing the franchise for Irish Municipalities to a £10 rateable value ; but the same Act disfranchised 58 existing Municipalities. No wonder that it did not please or content the Irish people. They will no longer accept mere local government as a full answer to their demands. The words “too late” are often the last words of moderate reforms, though they are but the beginning of measures which many of your Lordships may deem to be revolutionary. It is understood that this Bill will be rejected by a large majority of your Lordships’ House. But I doubt whether there is a single person here who believes that our negation will extinguish the demand for Home Rule. Four-fifths of the Representatives of Ireland are sent to Parliament to make this demand, and must persistently continue to make it, with increasing force, unless you are prepared to deprive Ireland of the franchise. How can it be otherwise ? Even Englishmen must admit that they have not succeeded in governing that country to the content of the governed. I am not going to trouble your Lordships with many references to the past history of Ireland ; but I would ask your attention to one test of good government. The object of every Government is to make the country governed so prosperous, by the continuous development of its resources, that an increasing population can be maintained in increasing comfort and happiness. If you apply that test to England and Scotland the government of Great Britain has been efficient. Since the beginning of this century England has increased its population by 226 per cent. and Scotland by 150 per cent. ; while, at the same time, the increased populations are in every respect better in wages, in health, in education, and in lessened pauperism and crime. Let us apply that test to Ireland. The population now is even less than it was at the beginning of this century, and it is 40 per cent. less than it was 50 years ago at the Census of 1841. It is quite true that those who live in Ireland now have greater comforts than formerly, even though they have not yet reached the plane of civilisation of Great Britain. But that is no reply to the terrible depopulation of Ireland. If you expatriated half a million more of the people the residue would be richer among the working men, though the landlords would be poorer. That is not the way to look at the results of good government. This Parliament has undertaken to govern Ireland as an integral part of the United Kingdom, and our success must be judged by comparing the prosperity of Ireland as a country, and its population as a community, in relation to the United Kingdom. Is Ireland since the Union a richer or a poorer part of the United Kingdom? At the time of the Union we took over Ireland with a population which was one-half that of Great Britain and one-third that of the United Kingdom; now it has sunk to one-eighth. Its proportional gross income was then two-seventeenths that of the United Kingdom; it is certainly not one-seventeenth now. Its taxable resources when we took it over amounted to one-tenth; now they do not exceed one-fiftieth. In case of war Ireland, at the time of the Union, added largely to our strength in men and material; now, with its dwindled population and diminished production of food, it is of small account in national defence. The capital of Ireland, upon which her prosperity so much depends, amounts to about 400 millions, but is only one-twentyfourth that of the United Kingdom. Its total capital now scarcely exceeds one year's interest of the capital of Great Britain. The whole trade of Ireland is insignificant, and scarcely reaches £40,000,000, an amount much less than that of our trade with distant Australia, which is £55,000,000. It is very much less also than our trade in India. As a country for receiving the products of Great Britain, made by our own working men, the trade amounts to only two or three millions. In relation to Great Britain, Ireland, as part of the United Kingdom, as a country and as a community, has sunk wofully since the Union. It has remained stationary in some things, gone backward in others, and has not shared the progress of Great Britain. The English Government is responsible for the decline of prosperity and for the depopulation of Ireland. "When the herd degenerates the herdsman is to blame" is a true maxim, though it is as old as Socrates. The main purposes of a Government have never been achieved in Ireland by English administration. Neither in times of tranquillity nor in times of disorder has the English Government received the consent of the governed, or secured the progress and happiness of the people. Alison, the Tory historian, has summed up the result of our English government in these words—

"Conquest has failed in producing submission, severity in enforcing tranquillity, indulgence in awakening gratitude."

If Ireland could be governed as Great Britain is, 12,000 troops, the number in proportion to its population, ought to suffice; but we kept 25,000 to 30,000 in addition to an armed constabulary. It is under a conviction that the British government of Ireland has signally failed that this Home Rule Bill has been introduced. The Bill before us offers decentralisation of government and delegation of duties without disintegration, and it completes your former gift of full representation to the Irish people by its natural complement and sequel of a Representative Government by consent. Some of your Lordships outside this House have attacked the Bill with bitter words. My noble Friend opposite, who once was Chancellor of Ireland, described this Bill at a meeting in Leeds as "a Bill marked in every line and every provision of it both by madness and meanness," and a little further on in his speech, "by meanness, treachery, and infamy." I am glad that the discussion in this House has been carried on by your Lordships in a more sober spirit. The noble Duke has a perfect right to think that we are committing a grave error, and he is justified in asking us to prove three cardinal points—that the Bill preserves the supremacy of Parliament; that it will not lead to separation; and that it will protect the rights of the minority. I take up his challenge. I take the question of supremacy of the Imperial Parliament as the leading issue. You may think that we have failed, but you cannot deny that our purpose is to found a subordinate, not a co-ordinate, Parliament. To the Irish Legislature would be delegated domestic affairs ; but from it would be excluded, by express enactment in Clauses 3 and 4, all subjects of Imperial interest. We have ample foreign and colonial experience that local interests can be delegated to subordinate Parliaments, and that Imperial interests can be preserved by an Imperial Parliament. In the United States there is not one State, but 45 States, autonomous in domestic legislation and executive, yet acting as 45 pillars in upholding the strength of the Federal system. In our 15 self-governing Colonies their powers of self-government are more complete than are contained in this Bill ; but they do not endanger or conflict with Imperial unity. The Bill tries to surround the Imperial interests with many safeguards. In this Bill there is a provision which was absent from that of 1886. That Bill proposed to exclude Irish Members from the Imperial Parliament on the principle that has been applied to Colonial Legislatures. A good deal can be said in favour of this proposal, which, however, was then fiercely opposed by the Liberal Unionists as well as by the Conservatives. They argued with much force that the exclusion of Irish Members rendered our Parliament British and not Imperial. Mr. Chamberlain considered that the retention of Irish Members was the key of the position. In a letter to Mr. Bolton on May 7, 1886, he used these words—

“In the Bill the Government have proceeded on the lines of separation or colonial independence, whereas they should have adopted the principle of Federation. The key of the position is the maintenance of the full representation of Ireland in the Imperial Parliament, and her full responsibility for all Imperial affairs.”

On the 16th of April, Mr. Chamberlain, speaking in Parliament, said—

“The retention of the Irish Members is a matter of the first and cardinal importance ; it is a matter to which I have always attached the greatest possible weight, because if the Irish Members are retained at Westminster, the Imperial Parliament remains the Imperial Parliament, and its supremacy would then be an established fact.”

Undoubtedly the country agreed with this view during the General Election. At its conclusion Mr. Gladstone found himself with a mandate from the country to bring in a Home Rule Bill, but with a strong indication that he should retain Irish Members in Parliament to keep it Imperial. In yielding to this desire, Mr. Gladstone had a right to expect the support of every Conservative and Liberal Unionist. But when the Government proposed to reduce the Irish Members from 103 to 80, the Unionists voted for the higher number, and then, after a series of contradictory Amendments, they ultimately voted for excluding them altogether, thus recurring to the proposal of 1886, which they then deemed rank treason to Imperial supremacy. They boxed all round the compass in a manner incomprehensible to my logic and ethics, so I do not attempt to argue upon their rotatory conduct. As the Bill now stands, if it become law, Irish representation would be reduced from 103 to 80. The Bill does not put these 80 Members into Parliament ; that was done by the Act of Union, not by this Bill. Yet Sir Henry James at Sheffield describes these 80 Members “as an overwhelming and overshadowing power in the Imperial Parliament.” It is, at all events, 20 per cent. less of a power than was conferred by the Act of Union. Supposing that all the 80 Members were on one side and voted solidly against Imperial interests, the British Members would still be able to outnumber them by seven to one. Practically we know that the Protestant minority would have 20 seats, and if we could rely upon them for support, there would be nine Members to every Nationalist on a vote. Of course, I know that you fear a close balance of Parties and the weight of an outside Party being thrown into the scale. But it is an insult to British Members to think that they would not unite to protect the interests of the Empire. It is an equal insult to the Irish Members to believe that, when they had attained the object of their desire—an autonomous Government for Ireland—and had no longer need of continued isolation, that they would remain hostile to British and Imperial interests. On the contrary, their ambition and their interest would impel them to bring their quick intelligence to bear on Imperial questions, and to take that position in the counsels of Parliament which they could readily attain by their ability and perseverance. The fear of separation, which has been largely used as a bogey to scare timid people in the country, has scarcely preserved even its shadowy shape in the discussions in the other House or before your Lordships. In the long agitations by responsible Leaders, from the time of Daniel O'Connell to Parnell, separation has neither been advocated nor threatened. In 1799 O'Connell, speaking in Dublin, used these patriotic words—

“I know that the Catholics of Ireland still remember that they have a country, and that they will never accept any advantages as a sect which would debase and destroy them as a people.”

His successors—Butt, Shaw, Parnell, and Justin M'Carthy—have always held similar views. Though Grattan's Parliament of 1782 was an independent Parliament, in the words of Lecky—

“It was unfeignedly and heartily loyal to the British connection.”

That was due to the national spirit which permeated it, not to the fact that the Members were Protestant, for at that very time the Presbyterians of Ulster were showing a strong anti-English spirit. Grattan explained why the Irish Parliament ought to be true to Great Britain. He said—

“The Crown is one link, the Constitution another. You can get a King anywhere; but England is the only country with whom you can participate in a free Constitution.”

But there is even a stronger bond of union in the fact that all the material interests of Ireland depend upon Great Britain. We buy all the Irish exports, with trifling exceptions, and we furnish, either as merchants or producers, all their imports. Surely when Home Rule has been given these interests would be stronger for union than the mere memory of grievances, which we had redressed, would be for separation. The two noble Dukes are especially alarmed on the subject of the Protestant minority, and it is a subject worthy of the fullest consideration. The Duke of Argyll read to us the clause of the American Constitution, Clause 14, which has been found sufficient to protect personal liberty. The essential part of that clause is verbally adopted in Sub-section 8, Clause 4, of the present Bill, with words added to insure compensation for any private property taken. But, in addition to that important provision, there are eight other reservations in Clause 4 which fully cover all questions relating to education, religion, and corporate property. Beyond these clauses there are the Exchequer Courts in Ireland, and an Appeal Court in England, to determine Constitutional encroachments against the law, and any violation of private rights. There is also the power of veto, and, in the last resort, the undiminished power of the Imperial Parliament to prevent and restrain wrong-doing. The fears in the mind of the noble Duke are that the Protestant minority may be oppressed by a Parliament which will naturally have a large Catholic majority. He does not trust the historical fact that Irish Catholics have been singularly free from a spirit of religious intolerance. I know that in former times there have been wild insurrections, in which both Protestants and Catholics have committed very cruel and savage acts. These insurrections were retributions of a savage character for acts of long-continued oppression, some of which were attempts to suppress the Catholic religion. But in the short and only Catholic Parliament of 1689 a memorable Act was passed in these words—

“That it is a law of the land of Ireland that neither now nor ever again shall any man be persecuted for his religion.”

Mr. Lecky draws attention in his history to this peculiarity of the Irish character. He says—

“Amongst the Catholics, at least, religious intolerance has never been a prevailing vice; and those who have studied closely the history and character of the Irish people can hardly fail to be struck with the deep respect for sincere religion in every form which they have commonly evinced.”

In proof of this, I cite the remarkable fact that Ireland is the only European country which never had a Christian martyr, or where the Jews and the Quakers were never persecuted. Nearly 280,000 Protestants live in the Catholic Provinces of Ireland in a hopeless minority, yet they live in perfect peace and safety with their Catholic countrymen. In fact, the Southern Catholic Provinces show a remarkable religious toleration, for not only have they elected Protestants to municipal offices, but they send Protestant Members to Parliament, and have accepted as the Leaders of their National movement Butt, Shaw, and Parnell, who were Protestants. I wish that Ulster would show equal liberality. Nevertheless, I admit that the Protestants of Ulster are seriously alarmed at the prospect of Home Rule. It is the only Province of Ireland in which the Protestants have a majority, not a great one, but still there are 54 per cent. of Protestants to 46 per cent. of Catholics. Is it possible to conceive that an Irish Parliament, largely Catholic, would seek to injure a Province in which nearly one-half of the population consists of people of their own religious faith? In five out of the nine counties of Ulster the Roman Catholics are in a majority. Even the representation of Ulster is nearly evenly divided between Home Rulers and Unionists—at present the Unionists are 19 as against 14, but in the last Parliament the majority was the other way, and a change of only 600 votes would place them in a majority. Unquestionably the town of Belfast predominates Ulster from its size, activity, and prosperity. Belfast is a town nearly as large as Sheffield, and nearly as wealthy as Hull; but would your Lordships consider that a cry from either of these English towns against a great national movement in England ought to be sufficient to promote or defeat a policy desired by the great majority of the English people? It is right to attach weight to the views in Belfast, but it is wrong to say that it is the voice of Ireland, or even the voice of Ulster. I know that many of your Lordships attach the greatest importance to that voice, and that you attribute the prosperity of Ulster to its content with the Government of England. If I apply my former test of good government to Ulster—namely, the increase of population with increasing comforts—how does Ulster stand? Comparing the population of 1841 and 1891, Ulster has lost no less than 750,000 of its population in 50 years. This depopulation is not confined to the Catholic counties, for Protestant Down has decreased faster than Catholic Donegal. Even the rapid development of Belfast scarcely stays from decline the two counties in which it is situated, for their population has only increased by 1,137 persons in the last census. The voice of Ulster ought to be listened to in the controversy, and the remonstrances should be taken at their full value. Unfortunately, they rarely reach us in calm and well-considered words, but are usually wild words accompanied by wild threats. We must examine these words by the evidence of past experience. Our predecessors, and many of your Lordships, have heard equally wild words on previous occasions, when measures were introduced mitigating the effects of Protestant ascendancy. If you go back to the time of Catholic Emancipation the resolutions against it passed in Ulster were truly blood-curdling. I was in Parliament when we disestablished the Irish Church in 1869. I have a distinct recollection of the threats of Ulster that 200,000 Orangemen were to rise in rebellion, kick the Queen's Crown into the Boyne, and march upon London. The Protestant minority in other parts of Ireland were equally determined. Mr. Plunket, the Member for the University of Dublin, after an excited speech referring to the action of Protestants in past times, said—

“As they were willing to seal with their blood, in martyrdom and battle if need be, to protest against the oppression and slavery of a system which they could not and should not, and which their descendants never will submit to.”

The Ulsterian outpourings of wrath are now of the same character, and almost the same in expression, as they were in 1869. We have become accustomed to them, and do not even resent such names as a kind-hearted Bishop of my acquaintance called the Liberals at the Protestant Synod in Belfast, when he designated us as “political Saugrados who are willing to shed streams of blood—to flood all Ulster with blood.” For 60 or 70 years, on the occasion of every reform, we have become familiar with this style of oratory from Ulster, and we are not frightened. The recent utterances from Ulster are pitched in the same key. Perhaps if I were to guess at their source, I would recommend noble Lords to read the remarkable speech of Lord Stanley, afterwards Lord Derby, and well known for his fiery eloquence. The speech was delivered in 1837 against the proposal to give Home Rule to the Province of Quebec. That Province contained, as Ireland does now, two-thirds Roman Catholics to one-third Protestants. Lord Derby was certain that the minority would be trampled upon by the majority; that a religious war would take place, the Protestants being assisted by the great Protestant family of the United States; and that, after the shedding of much blood, the Lower Province of Canada would become a French Republic, and that in six months. The strange thing was that Sir Robert Peel agreed with him. Undismayed by this terrible prophecy, Home Rule was granted to the Canadian Province; and the present Lord Derby, who had just returned from the Government of Canada, could testify to your Lordships that its loyalty to the British Crown is as great as in any part of the Dominion. Looking, then, at past experience we may more safely prophesy—or, at least, we are justified in believing—that Ulster will neither fight actively, nor resist passively, Home Rule if it become law; but she will continue to take that distinguished position in the new Legislature, to which she is entitled by her industry, talent, and perseverance. I fear that it is a foregone conclusion that your Lordships will reject this Bill. Yet you must feel that the task of continuing to govern Ireland by means of coercive law, instead of by the consent of the people, is a hopeless failure. England has tried to govern Ireland in her own way, that is by English methods, twice as long as the Turks have held Constantinople and the Turkish Empire, and in both cases with about as little satisfaction to the conquered people. Ireland is a country that should be easy to govern. The soil of Ireland is naturally productive, and its climate is temperate. The Island is indented with noble harbours, and is intersected by great rivers. Had it been a State in America, its water power would have made it one of the most active industrial countries in the world. It is near the Welsh and Scotch coal-fields, and has the conditions for industrial prosperity far greater than Switzerland or Holland. You still insist on refusing to Ireland a form of Government desired by the people, and while you refuse the population dwindles. Three millions of the people depend on agriculture directly, and yet the agriculture of Ireland, its main industry, dwindles also. Its former chief crop—potatoes—

no longer produces on the average of years more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ tons per acre; while in Great Britain the average produce is nearly double. I hear a noble Lord say that is owing to the potato disease of 1846; but that disease struck Scotland with the same severity as in Ireland, yet the product of the former country is now double that of the latter. In root crops, for which the climate is favourable, the average crops have sunk 22 per cent. below those of Great Britain. So much arable land has gone into pasture that, even after a full allowance for the increase of live stock, the production of human food in Ireland would feed 1,500,000 fewer people than 20 years ago. A couple of bad harvests bring the peasants to the verge of starvation, and you are obliged to make them objects of charity. The mineral industries of Ireland are not very rich; but such as they are they have not been developed so much as they should have been. The fisheries, which would be prolific in other countries, are neglected in Ireland; and what is the cause of this decline? We have one cause and you another. You attribute all this inferiority as a nation to radical defects in the character of the Irish people. Our answer is that we consider that these defects are the melancholy outcome of governing a country against the consent of the people. When the Irish emigrate to other lands, especially to the United States and our Colonies, they become peaceful and productive citizens in the second generation. The industries of New England, in the large factories, are chiefly worked by Irish and by French Canadians, so even new emigrants quickly adapt themselves to trade. We expect no miracles from this measure, and it may be more than one generation before we get Irish of the character we desire. The fact of Local Government by the people for themselves has an admirable effect. I quote a short passage from a noble Lord opposite, and I think it is very well put—

“Men can manage the affairs which concern their own immediate life and which concern their localities far better than those at a distance could manage them, and if they did not manage them better they manage them in a manner more suitable to their own taste, and they submit to whatever inconveniences are necessary with much better grace.”

That is a capital description of the working of Local Government. I dare say the noble Marquess recognises he is the author of that speech, which was made by him on the 19th of June, 1887, at Leeds. I quote another passage from a speech of his at Newport, which my noble Friend (Earl Spencer) was unable to read last night—

“A Local Authority is more exposed to the temptation and has more of the facility for enabling a majority to be unjust to the minority than is the case when the Authority derives its sanction and extends its jurisdiction over a wide area. That is one of the weaknesses of Local Authorities. In a large Central Authority the wisdom of several parts of the country will correct the folly or mistakes of one. In a Local Authority that correction to a much greater extent is wanting; and it would be impossible to leave that out of sight in the extension of any such Local Authority to Ireland.”

I think that is admirable. In those two speeches one shows the advantage of Local Government, and the other that Local Government will not do alone, but must be supplemented by Central Government. I am content to leave the case as the noble Marquess has put it. There is one thing I should like to ask, Do you expect the democracy of the future to do better than the aristocracy have done, because if you expect the democracy to work on the same lines it is impossible. A democracy ceases to be a democracy when it governs against the consent of the people, and the democracy is now established in this country, and it is impossible for you to continue in the ancient path. I am a new Member of your House, and am not imbued with your traditions. But if I were a man of landed possessions, in the interests of my order and of my property, I would do everything within my power to make Ireland a contented country. A distracted and discontented Ireland is the fortress of advancing Radicalism, and even of Socialism. Since 1867 the conflicts in Ireland have been looked upon by the democracy of this country as battles between the rich and the poor, and those rights which have been given to Ireland have been observed by the British people here, and they will be demanded also. I think it will, before long, be a very formidable thing if we do not succeed in making Ireland contented. I shall make a very few more remarks on the question—“Has this country accepted Home Rule?” The Duke of Devonshire asks your Lordships to reject this Bill, and he gives this reason—

“Because we have no knowledge, and we can have no knowledge, that either the principles or the details of the measure command the consent of the people of this country.”

The noble Duke is strong on that point. What is there in this Delphic utterance? Is he going to ask you to adopt that most democratic of measures, a referendum ad hoc? That would be a much more fundamental interference with the Constitution than this Bill. If that is not the meaning, then the meaning is that the country does not know the details or principles of the Bill. Everyone knows that Members are returned to frame measures and arrange details. In regard to details, the people trust their Representatives in Parliament assembled. As to principles, what are the facts? At the last General Election the voters of this country, by a majority of 229,000, affirmed the principle of Home Rule. It does not lie with your Lordships, who are such strong supporters of a United Kingdom, to deny the force of this majority because it is chiefly from Ireland. That fact increases the strength and significance of the majority. Yet against all logic you have become Separatists and cut off Ireland from your considerations, arguing that you should be guided by the votes of Great Britain. But the majority of British votes was also on the side of Home Rule. Your newspapers sometimes deny this by cutting away the Labour votes from the Gladstonians, though every Labour candidate was a Home Ruler, and, therefore, it was unfair to cut them off. At all events, you will not deny that the Gladstonian majority in Scotland and Wales was very largely in favour of Home Rule. In England the majority of voters was greatly with the Unionists. Yet it was England that sent us back to power. We lost in Ireland, and on the balance, excluding England, we gained only two seats. It was the revulsion of feeling in England that brought Home Rulers into power. Your English representative majority against Home Rule was 214 in 1886; it dwindled to 71 in 1892—you lost two-thirds of your English majority—and that shows that the desire and feeling of the country had greatly increased in favour of Home Rule. The Duke of Devonshire did not know for what the Members were returned; some he knew were returned for labour, some for local option, and some for disestablishment. It is useless to deny that there has been a clearly expressed mandate of the people in favour of Home Rule. In the Division on the Second Reading in the other House every Liberal voted for the Bill and every Unionist against it, showing that each Party understood the conditions on which they were elected. You say that you are entitled to reject this Bill because the majority in favour of it in the other House was only 40. Yet the Unionist majority in Great Britain at the last Election of which you boast so much was only 17. Your Lordships cannot defend the rejection of the Bill on your ignorance of the wishes of the country. Do not let us delude ourselves by thinking that, now or hereafter, we can settle this question of Home Rule by a mere negation. I give full credit to the majority of your Lordships that in rejecting this Bill you act upon the deepest conviction that it is injurious to the highest interests of the United Kingdom if it is passed. We ask your Lordships to give to the minority who support the Bill equal credit for the sincerity of their convictions. We believe that it is calculated to bind Ireland more firmly to Great Britain, because it removes the sources of past discontent and distrust; because it confides to the Irish their own domestic government and makes them responsible for its efficiency; and because large experience has shown that organised government of a people through their own Parliament is the best safeguard against the excesses which follow from a disorganised and irresponsible democratic liberty.

LORD ASHBOURNE: My Lords, I have listened with interest to the very clear and able speech of the noble Lord who has just spoken, and I have listened closely to see what arguments he would adduce to show that this Bill was necessary, and safe, and just. It is obvious that these are three cardinal propositions which should be present to the mind of any honest man wishing to get a vote on the question. The noble Lord has dealt with, and I might say revelled, in statistics. I pass away, at the outset, from all the figures which have given such pleasure to my noble Friend who has just sat down with this remark—that the Bill comes up to your Lordships' House only by the votes of the Irish majority in the House of Commons, with a majority of 23 British Members against it, and a majority of 48 Members against it from England and Wales. Those are clear figures that cannot be gainsaid. Now, it is obvious that in substance and in reality this is a Bill for the Repeal of the Union. In order to prove that such a stupendous measure is necessary it should be shown that the Union has failed, and that a disruption is desired by the two nations that entered into that great conflict. This has been entirely left out of view by the noble Lord, as well as by Earl Spencer in his speech introducing the Bill. It is manifest from the figures I have given that Great Britain is in favour of the maintenance of the Union, while a great and growing minority in Ireland hold strongly to the same view. The views of the noble Lords on the other side go rather to indicate, not by bold and manly assertion, but by indirect and devious suggestion, that the Union has failed. I at once take issue upon that point. The Union has not failed. Contrasting the state of Great Britain and Ireland in 1800 with the state of the United Kingdom now the Union has distinctly succeeded. The noble Lord who spoke yesterday (Lord Ribblesdale) dealt shortly with the history of Ireland since the Union. I do not think he went into it fully; I do not think he went into it in such a way as would be satisfactory to this House. The great difference between the manner in which the Union was entered into and the disruption of the Union is that the Union was a deliberate Act by some of the greatest statesmen that England ever had, headed by the great name of William Pitt, not in a moment, not in a month, but after years and years of study and contemplation, before arriving at the conclusion that the Union was the safest course that could be taken in the interests of the Empire and Great Britain, and, not least, in the interest of Ireland itself. The Union, which has subsisted for 93 years, has been, I venture to think, attended with immense benefit to Ireland. It has controlled the antagonisms of race ; it has controlled as well the bitterness sometimes caused by different creeds. Under it commerce and imports have increased ; Belfast has grown from the condition of a small town to a gigantic commercial centre ; Catholic Emancipation has been granted, religious freedom secured, national education dealt out with a generous hand to all the people. The Land Laws of Ireland are for the tenants the most liberal, the most generous of any Land Code ever formed in the civilised world, the envy of the tenants of Republican France and of Democratic America. Taxation which has been imposed has been marked by differences of generosity in favour of Ireland. Public money has been poured out freely for land purchase, for land improvement, and to develop the industrial resources of the country. I cannot quite follow the curious arguments from statistics to which we have been treated. To a certain extent a man becomes intoxicated with too much of his own figures. The idea of suggesting that in consequence of the Union the potato crop has diminished by one-half ; that in consequence of the Union the fish will not come to be caught ! He did not say that it was in consequence of the Union, but that was what he desired to convey, and what he wished us to understand. It is about on a parallel with what the noble Earl indicated yesterday in his rapid résumé of the history of Ireland since the Union, when he seemed to suggest that things which had occurred since the Union were consequences of the Union. The noble Earl, for example, mentioned religious animosity. I ask, was religious animosity developed or assuaged by the Union ? It was under the Union you had Catholic Emancipation. It has been said that under the Union there has been poverty and famine. What is the meaning of that ? The suggestion appears to be that the Union has worked out poverty and famine, and that if this wretched Bill is passed famine will cease and poverty will be over. Looking at the reality of things, everyone knows that it is the Union which has assuaged the bitterness of poverty. Everyone knows that when the pinch of famine came generous help was extended by the British Parliament. Taking the broad view such a statesman should take ; taking into consideration everything by which you can measure the real worth of a nation, it was all acquired under the Union, and you now ask us to destroy it. At the time of the Union Ireland was not prosperous. At the time of the Union the only growing thing in Ireland was its Debt. Its exports, its shipping, and trade were all diminishing. It was stated by a great authority that Ireland was at the time of the Union within three years of bankruptcy ; 25 years after the Union, and long before the great change took place, commerce, shipping, and exports all increased. A vague impression is sought to be worked into men's minds that Ireland at the time of the Union was in a state of happiness and prosperity ; that the Union gave it a check ; that ever since Ireland has been going from bad to worse ; and that, therefore, you must interfere. There never was a suggestion more absolutely unfounded. The truths I have presented are not directly encountered by the noble Earl who spoke yesterday or the noble Lord just now, who presented such a vast array of figures to us. They are not even directly challenged ; but I tell you—and I speak on this question with the advantage of not being a Scotchman—these obvious truths are recognised in Ireland by all the law-abiding classes ; they are recognised by the commercial classes to whom security of commerce is as the breath of their nostrils ; they are recognised by the banking, the railway, and the industrial communities ; they are recognised by the great seats of learning—or the great majority of them—and by the great bulk of the professional classes. I decline in every way to make this a religious question. It was almost suggested to me by the noble Lord to use some words that might stir up old religious differences ; but I will not do it. I will not put it for a moment that it is a question of religious differences. Almost to a man the great Protestant community of Ireland is against this Bill. Is it not a fact that the mass of educated, independent, and intelligent Roman Catholics are against it ? Why is it that these men, over 1,000,000 in number, a third of the population—some of the most intelligent, educated, and independent of all those who have anything to lose—are against this Bill ? Why do they loathe and detest it? It is because they are on the spot, because they will have to suffer, because your empty philosophical theories are not shared by them, and because they know that what you say will not occur, because you express a doubt upon the subject, will occur. There has always been more or less agitation in Ireland. But do you think that even if you pass this nostrum of yours that agitation will cease, and that for the future there will be nought in Ireland? There have been agitations in Ireland for many a long day; but what have those agitations mainly depended upon? Two potent factors, certainly, during the last 30 years, without which those agitations would be powerless. One is the aid of American sympathy, incitements, and gold. If Ireland had been left without the gold and incitements from America the agitation would have died. What is the other factor which has given life and vitality to agitation? It is the land. Every agitation that I can recollect—and long before for what I know—has striven to link itself to the land and appealing to the cupidity of the farmer; and, therefore, you find sometimes that it calls itself Fenianism, and sometimes Moonlights, and more recently the Plan of Campaign. If you get rid of the American element, if you settle the Land Question, as it can be done, to satisfy the reasonable wishes of the farmer, what then remains of the life of these agitations? Up to a recent period the traditions of the English public life were courageous and patriotic. Be the Party what it might, the Union was safe, the Constitution was safe, the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was a thing not to be touched. Crimes Acts were passed mostly under the Government of Mr. Gladstone, but never to hurt to the extent of a pin's point any law-abiding citizen. They were solely directed against those who by crime and terrorism denied to their fellow-citizens the enjoyment of the first rights of civilisation—liberty and safety. The noble Earl yesterday alluded to the fact that the law in Ireland has not been aided by public effort. I know it, and I regret it. But has not that been largely due to the remorseless power of intimidation and terrorism with which we are all familiar? The efforts of every statesman in England, without exception, have always been directed to point out the benefits of the Union. And this has been going on for 86 years. Mr. Gladstone, in the year 1866, used these words—

"My firm belief is that the influence of Great Britain in every Irish difficulty is not an influence of domination and tyranny, but a softening and mitigating influence."

I shall not use any quotations to-night for the small and puny purpose of establishing inconsistency. I use that quotation as the testimony of a statesman who has an experience of far more than a generation of public life. In 1881, in introducing the Irish Land Bill, he observed—

"It is said that our legislation in Ireland has failed. I admit the process to be incomplete. If I am asked how it is to be made complete, I say by patient perseverance in well-doing, and by steady adherence in the work of justice."

These are hopeful words; they are the deliberate conviction of a statesman presenting a great ameliorating measure to Ireland. More recently, on May 16, 1884, Mr. Gladstone used these words of deep significance, having regard to many recent utterances—

"England for 50 years stood in the face of the civilised world a culprit with regard to Ireland. I say that the civilised world has entirely changed its judgment."

That is a most interesting statement, as containing the belief of the view of the civilised world. That was in 1884. In two years after that all is changed; a miracle of conversion is wrought. Mr. Gladstone changed his mind in a moment, almost in the twinkling of an eye. If he had not changed his mind we should have no Bill before us, and if he changed back his mind to-morrow morning what would become of the Bill? Would there be any need of a Division on Friday, and would any of his Colleagues be sorry? The noble Earl yesterday gave us a glimpse of his mind when, in rather a halting explanation, he stated how he came to change—he said it was on account of the continuity of coercive legislation. [Earl SPENCER dissented.] I read the report of the noble Earl's speech this morning, and I heard the words last night, and if they did not mean that they meant nothing.

*EARL SPENCER: I did not read the report of my speech this morning, but I do not think I referred to the continuity of coercive legislation, but to the want of continuity in support of the ordinary administration in Dublin.

LORD ASHBOURNE: I do not know what that means if it does not mean that. Why should the Union now be broken? Why should the immense experiment of this Bill be tried unless it can be shown that great benefits would arise from the breaking of the Union? Where is the prospect of justice to Ireland—I mean justice to all classes in Ireland—from this Bill? Where is the prospect of peace and contentment? The very introduction of the Bill has roused passions and animosities which may be assuaged by time, but which it will take years to allay. The Bill works a revolution; it destroys the Constitution of England in the effort to set up a new Constitution for Ireland. There is an enormous difference between making a Union and breaking one. You cannot obliterate the tremendous fact that the Union has been in existence for 93 years. I am an Irishman, and I speak from what I am bound to know, and of which I am entitled to have a strong opinion about. And, speaking from the standpoint of an Irishman, I ask how many men of any sense could be found to state what the arguments are which commend themselves to a Home Ruler, and it would be found in this form—"Get rid of Irish questions; put a stop to coercion; let the Irish manage their own affairs, and let us manage ours." There is not one solitary syllable of that carried out in the Bill. So far as Irish questions are concerned, Ireland stops the way when Mr. Gladstone is in power; but how can the dullest fail to see that this Bill cannot put an end to Irish questions? It is not accepted as final; it is ostentatiously accepted as only provisional. Land, Judiciary, police, and finance are all put into a probationary period, and Mr. Gladstone says he is of opinion that during that period the business of the Irish Members would require them to be more at Westminster than in Dublin. Get rid of Irish questions indeed! Is that the hope and belief of a single one of you? We are not so easily got rid of as that, after all. What are we making 80 Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament for? Although your rôle is to make them angels, you do not think they will do nothing when they come over here—when you make them come over here—in order to goad the English Government to view English questions from the Irish standpoint.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: They interfere now.

LORD ASHBOURNE: They can meddle now, but they are not allowed to have a separate Parliament in Dublin at the same time. After this Bill is passed you will give them the exclusive management of their own affairs, and allow them to send a delegation of 80 over here to prevent you managing yours. The Irish are human beings; they are not a bit worse than English or Scotch people; indeed, I am not prepared to say they may not be better; but if you compel them to come to the Imperial Parliament and to take part in the discussion of English subjects, you must not be surprised if they consider the interests of their own country first and the interests of England second. What is the meaning of the second step in your argument, "get rid of coercion?" There is not a Crimes Bill now which has any provision of it in existence. Do you suggest that that is a reason to carry you on in this tremendous revolution. There is a Crimes Act now upon the Statute Book the provisions of which are lying dormant. The Act served its purpose well; it put down intimidation and boycotting and enabled law-abiding citizens to obey the law; it never harmed a single human being who wanted to abide by the law. But this Bill would work out a coercion of the most deadly character to the loyal minority in Ireland—a real and effectual coercion instead of the coercion now lying dormant on the Statute Book. From the way some people speak it would be thought that the Irish were a united people, with common objects, common hopes, and common interests. Must we again, even at the eleventh hour of this discussion, say that there are two Irelands? The meaning of "let the Irish manage their own affairs" is that a numerical majority, less educated, shall have sway over the more wealthy and better educated. Whose affairs are they to manage? Not their own, but the affairs of the loyal minority. And then you have the 80 Irish Members at Westminster to manage your affairs, never to forget the watchword bequeathed to them in past ages—"England's difficulty is Ireland's opportunity." We are asked in this case to attend to the words of the Irish Nationalist Leaders; but it is not easy to forget their actions and their words in the past. It is all very well to allude to the Irish Nationalist Leaders as "babes and sucklings." They are curious babes and sucklings, but we cannot forget the not very remote language which they used, harsh to the minority, to the police, and to the landlords. Is it fair to ask the minority to trust these men? I do not think it is when they cannot trust one another. I heard it said the other day—I read these words in The Irish Independent—

"Mr. Healy did not think much of Sexton, and Sexton thought less of him, and neither thought much of the other, but each thought highly of himself."

The whole administration of Ireland is to be handed over to these men—the Magistracy, police, law, maintenance of order, protection of life and property, and every right that made free citizenship of value. The administration of all these matters is to be handed over to them without check or stint. I have heard it said—"At all events let us pass the Bill as an experiment. It can be repealed if the experiment is a failure." Is not that an appalling suggestion—that you will try an experiment under which you gamble with the lives, liberty, and property of our fellow-subjects in Ireland? I must now refer to the important question of the land. We were told not so very long ago by the Prime Minister that it was an obligation of justice and honour to settle the Land Question before any Home Rule Bill was passed. In the same way Lord Spencer gave us to understand that in his opinion it would be most treacherous not to buy out the Irish landlords before granting Home Rule. Now obligations of honour and dictates of justice do not change from day to day and from hour to hour. Meanness and treachery one day are meanness and treachery the next. A man of honour should have an honour which is not mutable as a weathercock. Under this Bill no land legislation is to be possible in the Irish Parliament for three years. What is the meaning of that reservation? I am entitled constitutionally at this Table—[pointing to the Front Ministerial Bench]—to search your consciences, and to test the reality of your honourable convictions, and as men of honour you are bound to give an answer. What is the meaning of this reservation? Do the Government intend themselves to present a Bill upon this question? If they do, when do they intend to present it, and upon what lines will it be drawn? Or do they merely desire to conceal by this postponement the infamy of the transaction which they contemplate? Can it be possible that they intend to hand over the landlords to the merciless treatment of the Irish Nationalist Leaders, who have declared that the landlords are only entitled to "prairie value," and ought to be hunted until they are as scarce as foxes? In the Debate on the Third Reading of this Bill in another place Mr. Dillon denied that the landlords were entitled to regard Ireland as their country, and in alluding to the action of the National League he referred to "felonious landlords." Is it just and honourable to hand over the property of the Irish landlords to men who have used this language? It is a curious circumstance that the first judicial term of 15 years under the land legislation of the Prime Minister will expire in about three years. Can the infamous thought have passed through the minds of the Government that it would be expedient to leave the subject of judicial rents, and the appointment of the Sub-Commissioners who will fix these rents, to be dealt with by the proposed Irish Government? I should be glad to hear from some Member of the Government that that idea did not enter into their heads. What was the explanation given by the noble Earl opposite to account for the absence of legislation respecting the land? He said that the Purchase Acts passed in recent years have taken the place of the contemporaneous Land Bill of 1886. Is this not puerile to a degree? I desire to use no terms calculated to give pain, but I never heard a more lame, halting, and impertinent excuse. Why, the first Act in the Land Purchase Code was passed before 1886—when my noble Friend was Prime Minister for the first time, and it held out every inducement for the tenant to become a purchaser. But the system will be changed by this Bill. Who will buy if it be passed? Will it not obviously be better to remain a tenant than to purchase when the chances are that a man will be able as a tenant to avoid all payment successfully? The treatment of the landlords by the Government is like sentencing a man to be hanged at the end of three years, and suspending him in the meantime. Everyone would say it was brutal and cruel, but the Judge would be candid. What do the Government think would be the fate of the Irish landlords? I am not sure that it would not be better for them to know their fate; but what would it be if they are handed over at the end of three years to the merciless mercy of the men who have always said they would show them none? If that is their object, it is impossible to use words strong enough to mark one's sense of the conduct of the Government. I have used words of considerable strength, and I cannot at the moment think of any stronger; therefore, I leave the matter where it is. If that is what they mean, it would be better for them to try to be men enough to confess their shame, instead of taking refuge in what my late great countryman, Bishop Magee, called the "cautious cowardice of refusing to say anything at all." It is thought that a fair trial will be secured in jury cases by the appointment of the Exchequer Judges; but the juries will be empanelled under the Jury Laws, and will be at the mercy of the Irish Government. They will return exactly what verdicts they please, whether the Exchequer Judges like it or not. As to the jurisdiction to be given to these Judges, legal minds are unable to understand it. It is a conundrum without an answer. There is to be an appeal, but is there to be an appeal on facts and law? Is there to be an appeal from the verdict of the jury? The section bristles with difficulties, and yet it was absolutely undiscussed. Then, how are the orders of the Exchequer Judges to be carried out? That is a momentous question, but it was absolutely undiscussed in the other House of Parliament. It may be said that, like other orders, they are to be carried out by the Sheriff. I am speaking in the presence of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, the Lord Chancellor, who must endeavour to clear up some of these legal difficulties. It is said that the Sheriff must execute the orders of the Exchequer Judges, but the Irish Government might not compel him to obey the orders of the Judges, and there is no provision in the Bill for the punishment of the Sheriff if he disobeys their orders. It is a grotesque machinery not worth the paper it is written on. If there should be a brawl, and life is lost, the Sheriff and his assistants would be tried before a common jury empanelled under the then laws of Ireland; and I am not at all sure that it would be very easy to get them acquitted. Sir Charles Russell said that the Exchequer Judges would have at their backs the Imperial power. That is a very fine phrase, but what does it mean? The Imperial power will not have a single policeman or Magistrate at its back, so that this is merely a phrase of the Attorney General's. It might be said that it refers to the Army, that there is the Army to fall back upon; but the Army could not act in the matter, because the very second the Imperial Government directed the Army to interfere in any struggle, such interference would not be administration of the law, but civil war. The Executive impotence of the Exchequer Judges must expose them to contempt. If their orders are unpopular they will not be executed; but if executed, it will be at the risk of riot, bloodshed, and civil war. It is an endeavour to set up an imperium in imperio, but your imperium will have neither power, nor resources, nor credit. Your Bill treats Ireland as a suspected Province, whose justice is doubted and whose honesty is questioned. You trust Ireland with everything except the till; but in order not to hurt their feelings you order the money to be placed in the chest and give them the key. It is nothing but a medley of distrust, unbelief, and credulity. You entrust the Irish Executive with enormous powers, and then endeavour to balance them by things called "safeguards." No one believes in them, not a single human being outside a lunatic asylum. The Irish Nationalist Leaders play their part well. They listen to the description of those safeguards with an air of reluctant resignation. I can only say that, for myself, I regard those safeguards as absolutely illusory, ineffective, and unworkable. The Second Chamber proposal I pass by. It is too ludicrous to be taken seriously. I have a great respect for Second Chambers that are intended to perform real functions as to stability or caution to legislation; but the Second Chamber under this Bill is not the real thing at all. With regard to the veto, Lord Spencer spoke as if he had some belief in it, and that makes me think that he has not rightly grasped the meaning of some sections of the Bill. Under ordinary circumstances the veto is to be exercised under the advice of the Irish Cabinet. Surely it is nonsense to expect them to advise the Lord Lieutenant to veto their own Bills. Then where is the protection of the veto? It is said that the English Cabinet may give special directions, but who is to invoke the intervention of the English Cabinet? Is the Lord Lieutenant to do so? Is there to be an Imperial Minister who is to watch the Irish Legislature? The Lord Lieutenant of the future will be a strange creature, fearfully and wonderfully made. He may disagree with a Bill when it is submitted to him; he may believe that it is fraught with peril and gross oppression to the minority; he may get no directions from England. What, then, is he to do? He may ask for special directions. He may get back a definite reply; but has he any discretion to act on his own clear judgment? Mr. Morley says that sometimes he may act on English advice, sometimes on Irish advice, and sometimes on his own judgment; but would he not be bound to assent to a Bill presented by his Irish Ministers in the absence of any special directions from the English Cabinet? That is a clear Constitutional question that I am entitled to ask, and it must be answered before this Debate closes. The Lord Lieutenant would be sometimes Imperial, sometimes Irish, sometimes hung up between heaven and earth, like "Mahomet's coffin." He may be in a paroxysm of doubt, yet, like a Colonial Governor, he cannot reserve the question for consideration. It may be that the Bill before him threatens the grossest oppression to the minority, yet he has not the power to veto it. At every step it turns out that the veto is a sham. It is not a real protection, and my opinion is that it is not intended to be a real protection. The Lord Lieutenant of the future—I do not know whether any noble Lord is in training for the office yet, but I advise his friends to keep a very close eye upon his sanity—will sometimes be as pliant as indiarubber, sometimes as hard as adamant, and sometimes composed of something that it is impossible to baptize with any name at all. Then it is said that the Imperial Parliament is a safeguard. What is the meaning of that? The supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is now the greatest safeguard to every subject of the Queen in the United Kingdom, because it means its action. The supremacy of the Imperial Parliament of the future will have no power of action whatever. Parliament may pass Resolutions against Irish administration; it may pass concurrent legislation. How can it carry out Resolutions or legislation? The Irish Executive could not be relied on in these cases, because it would be against the Irish Executive that the action of the Imperial Parliament would be directed. If an Imperial Executive is set up, what is your position? You will have in this poor Ireland two hostile Executives, and that is your message of peace. If a row or a breach of the peace arose—and these things have occurred in Ireland before—the Members of the English Executive would be promptly arrested by the Irish police and subjected to that due process of law of which we have heard a great deal. Again, you will find in every season of difficulty, doubt, and trouble, the 80 Irish Members will always crop up. How is the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament to be asserted in the face of the shifting ballast of 80 Irish Members ready to vote against any assertion of supremacy, against any effort to do justice to the minority? It is said the loyal minority will be represented among these 80 Members, and that they could make their wants known in the Imperial Parliament. But the Schedule is a gerrymandered Schedule. I do not accuse Mr. Morley, a man of honour, of desiring to do anything of the kind, but he is the victim of some less scrupulous statistician than the noble Lord opposite. Dublin University, the great seat of learning with which I am proud to be identified, and proud to remember that I represented it for many years in the other House of Parliament, is to be disfranchised, and this in a country with thousands of illiterates. The only constituency, every man of whom can read and write, is to be deprived of its representation, and the Protestants of Connaught, Munster, and the greater part of Leinster are to lose the only voice they have for asserting their grievances in the Imperial Parliament. The doom of the loyal minority is hard. Is it not an inconceivable meanness to stifle the voices by which they could make their sufferings heard? Mr. Morley said there was a principle involved in his figures, that principle being that one Member should be given for every 75,000 of the population, and a second Member for any excess over the 75,000. Thus Meath, a Nationalist county with a population of 76,000, is to have two Members; while Fermanagh, a mixed county, with a population of 74,000, is to have only one. Leitrim, with 78,000 inhabitants, is to have two Members; while Armagh, with a population of 143,000, is only to have two Members. Kerry, with 179,000, is to have three Members; while Antrim, with 174,000, is to have only two Members. If that is not gerrymandering—I do not say it is—it is the most miraculous coincidence that ever was known in the history of figures. In Ireland the Bill will work chaos; it will tend to civil war; it will lead to bankruptcy; it will give the Loyalists less protection than was afforded in America, after the Civil War, to the negroes. A supporter of the Gladstonian Party, though not of the Bill, has declared that “his revered chief” wishes to carry any sort of Bill in any sort of way. The Bill now awaits judgment at your Lordships’ hands. It is false in its principles; it is dangerous in its policy. There is surrender in every line; there is betrayal in every sentence. It sends to Ireland not peace, but a sword. It preaches not the assuaging of passions, but the rousing into fever-heat of old and sad animosities. While that is the wretched message that is sent to Ireland, I put this point to your Lordships. There is not one single solitary advantage that will accrue to England under this Bill. The Bill has passed the House of Commons. I do not discuss the question how many Members voted for it, thanking God there was a House of Lords; how many Members voted for it, thanking God it was not going to become law by the mechanism of their votes. The whole nation has its eyes turned to the House of Lords, watchful and expectant as to our action. But we act more or less with the certainty that the nation is behind us. Each day feeling deepens and broadens, in spite of tremendous pressure. In the House of Commons votes diminish, and not one single vote was gained in the whole of these months of fighting. The tide of opposition is rising, the tide of support is going out. The Bill cannot pass. I believe that the people of Great Britain, now that their intelligence is awakened and their conscience aroused, never will allow a Bill of this kind to discredit the Statute Book of Great Britain. Animated by the conviction that our action will be ratified by the country, let us reject this pernicious Bill, in justice to Great Britain and in mercy to Ireland.

LORD CASTLETOWN said, that he occupied in the House a twofold position. Every hope and interest he possessed was centred in Ireland, his native country; and yet he had a seat in their Lordships’ House as a Peer of the United Kingdom. It was proposed by the Bill to confer on Ireland a Legislature subordinate to the Imperial Parliament, but by means of paper safeguards. What must be the first impulse of every Irishman, if he loved his country and was anxious for freedom and independence and for the national life of his country, would they not naturally ask that their power of legislation might be increased for the purpose of giving it to them; but to attempt to enlarge the powers conferred by this Bill, to break through the paper fetters which the Government in their fatuity had created, and to force by slow but sure degrees the Imperial Parliament to give the subordinate Legislature greater and more extensive powers, until an absolutely free Parliament for Ireland, with 80 Irish Members in the British Parliament, was created? Mr. Redmond, speaking for the active and increasing Parnellite section of the so-called Nationalists, distinctly stated that the word “provisional” was written in red ink on every page of the Bill. He was as good an Irishman as Mr. Redmond, and he would say openly that if such a pitiable measure as this were forced on this country it would be the duty of every Irishman to force the Imperial Government to make the Legislature an effective one; it would be the duty of the minority as well as of the majority in Ireland to make the law-

creating machinery of their country equal to the task imposed upon it. If this were not done the position of Ireland and of every Irishman would be simply unbearable. Speaking solely as an Irishman, proud and jealous of his country and nationality, he would boldly declare that he would rather see Ireland separated for ever from this Empire, see her trying to stand alone among the nations of the world, see her even fail and fall in that effort, than see her subjected to the malignant growths which this measure must engender in her political system. If the Bill were provisional it meant that years of discord must intervene, not only between the Irish and British Legislatures, but between the priestly factions on one side and the Fenian factions on the other; and during these conflicts the minority—the men of Ulster and the scattered communities in the other parts of Ireland—would be permitted to work out the salvation of their country by physical force under the advice of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The outlook for Ireland would be deplorable. The one thing she needed was peace and rest from agitation, and they were abolished for generations by this measure. Capital, which was returning, would fly from a country harassed by every political feud, and which might at any moment become the prey of a foreign foe. As to the financial provisions, there were three salient points with which he would deal. The first was Clause 12, Sub-section 2. By this provision taxation in Ireland would be doubled. The Irish people would have to pay for the maintenance of the Legislature, and for the 80 Members in London. Did Irishmen realise this? Every Irishman would indirectly suffer, and as, no doubt, the first Chancellor of the Exchequer of Ireland would step up from the Board of The Freeman's Journal, his fellow-countrymen must look forward to expensive times. The second point was Clause 13, Sub-section 2. This sub-section directed the Controller General to certify any amount due from the Irish Exchequer to the English Exchequer and the Treasury to send an order to the Lord Lieutenant for the collection of the amount. How was he to collect it? One thing was absolutely patent. If this extraordinary clause became law it would start the same danger; would initiate the same agitation that ended in the separation of the States of America from Great Britain. The 3rd sub-section, which would deeply affect all classes of Irishmen, was Clause 16, Sub-section 3. That meant for Ireland the extinction of her credit; it meant the loss to all classes of every possibility of ameliorating their position by improvements; it meant the withdrawal of the Imperial credit, and to a poor country like Ireland that meant absolute bankruptcy; it meant the impossibility of effecting any improvement except at a usurious rate of interest. Yet the men who called themselves Irishmen, who called themselves Nationalists, who called themselves Representatives of the Irish people, had the brazen audacity to accept this Bill with clauses in it such as these, which must mean ruin, civil discord, and hopeless bankruptcy to their native land. From the Imperial standpoint, the ground of opposition to this measure was even stronger than from the Irish aspect. The issues involved were greater, the aspect wider, and the dangers even more patent. The Government had always set before themselves certain points which they said were contained in the four corners of the Bill. The first was the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Was that maintained? Every man knew that with 80 Irish Members in the Imperial House acting under orders from Dublin the Imperial supremacy was moonshine and a farce. Clause 10 extinguished the supremacy of Great Britain, while it extended the tyranny of the Land Leaguers of Ireland over the United Kingdom. On this point none of the arguments of the Government could have any weight so long as the representation of Ireland was as at present, and as long as 80 Members, or rather items, were brought from Ireland representing, not the opinions of Irishmen, but the dicta of so many ecclesiastics. The first point contained in the Bill was the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Now was that maintained? With 80 Irish Members in the House of Commons acting under orders from Dublin everybody knew that Imperial supremacy must be the merest moonshine and a farce. The supremacy of Great Britain was extinguished by Clause 10, which extended the tyranny of the Land League over the United Kingdom. The arguments of the Government with reference to supremacy must be absolutely without weight so long as 80 Irish Members were brought from Ireland to represent not the opinions of Irishmen, but the dicta of the Roman Catholic Bishops, of Fenians, or of the Clan-na-Gael. It had been stated that the Irish Members represented the opinions of Irishmen, but he knew the country well, and knew how they were elected. In the constituency where he lived the right man apparently could not be found, and a gentleman from Cork was nominated by the Federation. That gentleman was elected, but out of a large constituency nearly one-half abstained from voting. Still, he was elected simply by the orders of a certain clique. Imperial supremacy was, he maintained, impossible. Followers of the Government seemed to think that elections in Ireland were like elections in England. In the large towns or in the North that might be the case, but in the rural constituencies everyone who lived in Ireland knew that candidates were nominated by one or other of the Nationalist Parties, and those who dared not vote against them and would not vote for them abstained. The result was that a certain item was elected as a Representative, not expressing the opinion of the electorate, not expressing the wishes of the people, but simply as the nominee of the dominant faction in that district, a faction not dominant owing to votes, but simply from power of combination, or through clerical influence. Imperial supremacy could not exist when those items, whether in Ireland or in the House of Commons, were so elected. Mob supremacy or clerical supremacy might result according to the particular turn of the wheel in Ireland, but to say that an absolutely clear representation of the Irish people existed at the present time in Parliament was absurd. Then what would be the result of either mob or clerical supremacy dictating terms to the Imperial Parliament? The result must be either surrender to that supremacy, or else it must be fought against—whether the result were mob supremacy or priestly supremacy, the Imperial Parliament would have either to surrender or to fight. In the first case, as he had said, that meant Ireland becoming a separate country; in the second it meant civil war and bloodshed for the preservation of the Union. Were their Lordships, who were now the sole guardians of the rights and liberties of the British people, for the other House was nothing but the playground of Mr. Gladstone, willing to surrender the liberties gained through generations of conflict, bloodshed, and patience? Would they surrender everything to the tender mercies of 80 men, the political merchants of the present day, who were selling their wares to the highest bidder? That was practically what it amounted to. Were they going to hand over the freedom of Parliaments, the Constitution of this Empire built up by the wisdom, the care, and the forethought of their ancestors to be the playthings of the illiterate voters of Kerry and Clare, or—which would be still more serious for Ireland—or to be subject to the dictates of the American-Irish Fenians? Then they were always being told that the Bill preserved the equality of the Three Kingdoms; but the very essence of this Bill was the domination of the Land League in Ireland over everything and the tyranny of the Land League and Clericalism combined over England and Scotland. Then, on the point of equitable repartition of the Imperial charges, he denied that that was carried out by the Bill. Ireland, the poorer country, was to go to the wall, while England must make up any deficiency on the part of Ireland. The promoters of the Bill claimed for it that it was to be “a real and continuous settlement.” They did not dare to use the word finality. If that were so anything that would make a real and continuous settlement of the Irish Question would be of vital importance, and every citizen of the Empire would hail it with joy. So far however from its being a real and continuous settlement, having looked through every line of the Bill and read most of the speeches on it he could say honestly and conscientiously that he had never seen any plan more capable of producing, and more certain to produce, “a real and continuous” conflict between Great Britain and Ireland. Every line of the Bill bristled with conflict; every clause in it dislocated the constitutional fabric framed by our forefathers; and, in short, the Bill was the torch of civil war. No supremacy for the Imperial Parliament, no protection to the vast British majority who were opposed to its proposals was afforded by the Bill; and, worse than all, there was no finality, not even a real or continuous settlement. Not one meeting had been held in favour of the Bill in the rural districts of Ireland. The agitators dared not hold one, and scarcely one Petition had come from Ireland in favour of it. In the South of Ireland nearly every man was praying that the Bill would never become law, if he dared to tell the truth. That House was threatened with all pains and penalties if their Lordships threw out this mischievous measure, but they never had less cause for fear. He would gladly see reforms in the constitution of that House, or any plan which could be suggested to strengthen the position of the Second Chamber in the eyes of the Empire. But, as he had said, they had in this case no cause for fear. They stood on solid ground, and had simply to do their duty. The course the Government had adopted in the other House had proved the necessity of their existence as a Second Chamber, and the country would recognise that that House had done its duty by giving time for thought and for discussion of a measure which had never been discussed. If, after an appeal to the electorate, this plan was desired, he, as an Irishman and citizen of the Empire, would say, if it was the wish of Great Britain that the Union should be broken, then let Ireland go free and unshackled to her destiny, not tortured and bound by such a puny and miserable measure as this. If, on the other hand, the verdict should be for the Union, their Lordships would have proved not only the honour and honesty and wisdom of their vote, but would have earned the gratitude of all future ages by proving that the Union of Ireland and England, like the Union of Scotland and England, could, after years of patience and mutual self-sacrifice, be made not only what the Government called a Union of hearts, but what was grander, nobler, and more lasting, the Union of three peoples under general laws in one United Kingdom.

*THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he ventured to ask their Lordships to allow him to deal with one or two of the issues raised by the question before the House, and he could assure their Lordships that he approached the subject with a full consciousness of the difficulty of treating it adequately under the circumstances. In the position in which they were called upon to discuss that Bill, it was difficult for a speaker to feel otherwise than somewhat hampered in regard to any arguments he might desire to adduce, for he could not help feeling that such arguments must be invested with a certain air of unreality, as being directed either in favour of or against a proposal which, to use a phrase not unfamiliar to some of their Lordships, was not really meant. Everybody was perfectly aware, by this time, that this Bill was not intended to stand by itself on its merits; but that its production and the efforts made to carry it as far as their Lordships were due to the imperious necessity of doing something towards redeeming, in a fashion, some of those wild and vague promises that were sown broadcast during the General Election campaign, as well as to the nature of the majority which the Government commanded in the House of Commons, and that it was, as it were, the avant courier, and part and parcel of a general policy, of which that House, and through it the Constitution of this Kingdom, was the ultimate object of attack. It required no great effort to predict the fate of the Bill in that House, and they had the strongest indications, coming from an influential and at all events an outspoken quarter, that in its fall it would drag with it a very important item of the general policy of which it was a component part. Even in the opinion of the most advanced Radicals and thorough-going Home Rulers, the consummation so devoutly to be wished could, it appeared, be bought at too high a figure, and it was no part of the bargain that, while Ireland was to be free to manage her own affairs, she was also to have full and absolute control over those of Great Britain. And so, in spite of Party discipline, in the face of the extreme undesirability of exposing any rift within the lute, or of weakening in any degree that appearance of mechanical unanimity which had been so conspicuous of late, Dr. Wallace, of Edinburgh, had summed up for them his view of the situation. He had spoken very clearly—

"He has not observed that the country has welcomed the 'Irish Occupation' with any great signs of enthusiasm or cordiality."

And he finally tells us that—

“The Government having marred their measure, his chief regret, when the House of Lords should throw the Bill out, would be that an opportunity would have been lost of aiming a great blow at the hostile power of the hereditary Chamber.”

He hardly thought their Lordships would require any stronger admission, coming as it did from a strong supporter of the Government and a fervent and enthusiastic Home Ruler, of the nature of the view that would be taken by the country of their Lordships' action with regard to that Bill, and it was surely a fair and just interpretation of Dr. Wallace's words to look upon them as a confession—an unwilling confession on his part, it might be—that their Lordships were expected, nay required, in the discharge of their great public functions, to put a period to this futile attempt to secure so-called “Better Government for Ireland.” There was at least one thing for which they could give credit to noble Lords opposite who supported that Bill. They, at all events, were not the authors or producers of a policy of Home Rule as a serious factor in politics. They had shown a marvellous adaptability—what he might perhaps be allowed to call a silent adaptability—to the tenets of their new creed, for he had never heard or read any deliverance from a public platform or elsewhere in which any noble Lord opposite had ventured to cope with or defend any of the details of that Bill. The Bill had been cut to pieces in argument, and yet noble Lords followed the lead blindly. He dared say some of their Lordships, in the course of their travels, had found themselves in the City of Chicago, and had visited there the great establishment of Mr. Armour. Such noble Lords would have observed, with astonishment, the herds that had accumulated from the great Western prairies standing there dazed by their unaccustomed surroundings and the novelty of their position. These herds were met at the entrance by an aged and astute creature after their own kind, who, having gained their confidence, guided them on their way, and lured them to destruction, while the leader preserved his life, and continued to perform the functions of his office for the benefit of subsequent followers, one would have thought rather to the deterioration of his reputation.

Their Lordships would appreciate the analogy, and he would ask them to read, for Western plains, the cold shade of Opposition, for the novelty of the position, the disappointed hopes of the last General Election. He did not envy noble Lords the position, but it might be worse. Theories might be impossible for two reasons; one, because they were impracticable, the other, because no patriotic or right-minded man could adopt them—and he did not wish to be taken, in what he was about to say, as attempting to lay down any practicable or possible theory as regards their Lordships. They had had lately some remarkable experience of the effects of the doctrine of “Party before all.” Speeches had been delivered in Parliament which hardly corresponded with the accompanying votes. Declarations had been made in the country which pointed to a Lobby other than that into which their authors had ultimately drifted. They had witnessed numerous instances of that capacity for sudden and complete conversion of which the Secretary for Scotland was perhaps the most brilliant and shining example. Their Lordships' House would certainly not set aside Imperial considerations for a mere Party advantage; but if such a thing were possible, if they in that House were to accept that Bill as it stood, he should like to know what would be the feelings of noble Lords opposite? What would be the feelings and the position of the Government when confronted with the universal chaos which the passing into law of the measure would inevitably bring in its train? How long would the Government last under those circumstances, and what would the action of those Representatives of the people be like who had depended upon their Lordships' House to take the course they had not the pluck and the moral courage to take themselves? It would really be a most interesting condition of things, but there was no possibility of their Lordships permitting it to come within the range of practical politics. No, the authorship of Home Rule as a policy was not vested in noble Lords opposite. It was private property. It was the exclusive copyright of the Prime Minister. The grounds for it were declared by him in 1886, and no one fairly recalled them more forcibly than Solicitor General in his able speech on the 14th February last. To sum them up in two words, they were the failure of coercion and the inseparable connection of the question of the land with that of Irish government. Now, into that latter question he did not desire to go. A noble Friend of his (the Marquess of Waterford), who was undoubtedly the greatest authority in their Lordships' House on the subject, would deal with it far more ably than he could. He only desired to say this, that if to deal with the land was an obligation of honour in 1886, it was equally an obligation of honour now. Nothing had happened to make it otherwise; and though Mr. Gladstone now contended that the rejection of the Bill of 1886 put an end to the obligation, every word he said on the subject when introducing that Bill directly contradicted the assumption. And now they were told, if his recollection served him, by the Prime Minister, that the Bill of 1886 was not brought in to pass. If that were so, where was the use of talking of the obligation ending under those circumstances? It was as strong and as binding now as ever it was, yet it was so far ignored on the night of the introduction of the Bill that Sir Edward Clarke had to ask what had become of it. And then there was the cuckoo cry of coercion. Surely that argument was dead and buried. It died with the administration of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, and it was dead still, unless revived, not against the criminal, but against the loyal and law-abiding portion of the Irish community. And they had heard a great deal about a mandate. The Prime Minister laid stress on it on the Third Reading in the House of Commons. Any careful student of the General Election Campaign must have been struck with one remarkable circumstance, and that was the varying and various degrees of importance with which the Home Rule cry was invested in different localities. In some it came in for no observation at all; in others it was in the forefront of the battle; in others it was accorded some slight and cursory mention; and in all it was sandwiched up between other considerations and it was called from the New-the Lordships' programme. The policy of disject with a

Lord Castl. of Donoughmore

at all, and in whatever form it was presented it was certainly not in the form or in the spirit of that Bill. Whatever verdict the constituencies pronounced upon, Home Rule was given upon an abstract proposition, hemmed in, as it was foreshadowed, by every sort of safeguard and proviso. And if there was one point more firmly insisted upon than another in election addresses it was that the functions of the Irish Parliament should be confined strictly to local matters, and that the supremacy of the English Parliament was to be complete. But the General Election passed, and the position changed. The Government did not find themselves to be free agents in the matter, so the Party Whip was applied, and every safeguard and proviso by which the adhesion of the English electorate to Home Rule was to be secured have successively gone by the Board. But the doctrine of the mandate had got its quietus from a far more authoritative source than any argument of his could furnish. It was practically repudiated by both sections of the Irish Party. On the one hand, they had, Mr. John Redmond, who on the 15th of September last stated that—

“By withholding the details of the Home Rule Bill Mr. Gladstone was only mystifying the people of England.”

While a few days before, on the 24th of August, they found it proclaimed by Mr. Dillon that—

“Had we been silly and wicked enough to make these foolish and ridiculous demands upon Mr. Gladstone before the Election took place, the verdict of England would probably be given, not for Home Rule, but against it.”

That utterance of Mr. Dillon disposed effectually of the doctrine of a mandate to Parliament in the case of that Bill, and even if such a mandate ever existed, it could hardly be taken to contain a direction to Parliament to enact that the Irish Nationalist Party should be enabled to run a Parliament of their own in Dublin at the cost of the British taxpayer, to the tune of something over a million and a half a year. But did that Bill fulfil, in any single particular, any single one of the conditions upon which the country was asked to grant a mandate for Home Rule? What were those conditions? There was the absolute supremacy of the British Parliament. That was gone. There was the protection of the minority.

That was absolutely gone. And thirdly, there was the freedom of Parliament, the most potent argument, the most alluring bribe ever offered to the constituencies. Would any noble Lord opposite tell them where that was now? Or when under the proposed arrangement they might expect to see it realised? In six years? Not in 60. Governments came and went, opinions changed according to the pressure they were subjected to from without, and there was a wonderful power to enforce conviction to be found in a state of chaos. But all these conditions and the effect of their settlement could be summed up in one word—finality; and he was willing to admit to their Lordships that if there was any sound and valid consideration to be advanced in favour of Home Rule it was this: In dealing with the Irish Question in its many phases, the cry of finality had always been with them. It had proved a most convincing, indeed an irresistible, argument. It opened up a vista of a Parliamentary millennium in Westminster, which was calculated to lead even the strongest and most patriotic instincts astray. It began in 1886, it was reiterated in 1870, it permeated all their debates in 1882; and yet it was every day more like a Will-o'-the-Wisp, which, in spite of all their efforts, was ever evading them at every floundering step they took in its vain and profitless pursuit. It would probably strike the House, looking at the matter as it did from a common-sense point of view, that the only chance of realising finality on questions such as that was by an arrangement in regard to which the various parties to the concession intended to secure it were practically in agreement. Well, the House had had ample opportunities of forming a judgment as to the harmony which prevailed in the Irish Party. He would recall one or two latter-day instances. It was not many days ago that Mr. Healy and Mr. Dillon made entirely contradictory declarations on the important question of the retention of the Irish Members. Their Lordships had not forgotten those edifying scenes in The Freeman's Journal office, alluded to by his noble Friend who spoke last, where the future Irish Chancellors of the Exchequer were seen struggling over the remains of a once prosperous business, in mutual recrimination and abuse. The record of those men was before their Lordships, and he should be very much surprised if any Member of this House had the courage to rise in his place and seriously undertake their defence. They were the men who, upon their own confession, bought and paid for the influence of the Irish priesthood, and who unscrupulously used that influence for the coercion and intimidation of voters, as was known from the disclosures of the Meath Election Petitions. They were the men who held one language at their hillside meetings in Ireland and another in the House of Commons and in English constituencies. They were the men who had been condemned by the highest judicial authority as members of an illegal conspiracy and as inciters to crime and the breaking of contracts; and it was to them that the Government proposed to hand over Ireland and her government, body and soul. And they would persuade the Opposition as well that their conversion from the doctrines of murder, of outrage, and of intimidation was as sudden and as sincere and as whole-hearted as the Government's own to the principles of Home Rule. The Government belonged to these people, they existed by their favour, they were at their mercy, and the result of this wasted Session was that, so far, they had acquired by this Bill the power to carry out every threat and to realise every item of revenge with which they had in the past menaced those who did not agree with them. But the country had, at all events, received a significant warning. The Bill and its history afforded a practical object-lesson of the enormous power for extortion which an illegal combination was able to bring to bear upon a weak Government. It should teach political Parties not to venture to treat Ireland again as she had been treated in the past, as the battlefield of English Parties, so that when the shadow of this curse which it was attempted to force upon Ireland should have been removed by the action of their Lordships' House, opportunity might be given to her to realise that prosperity of which she had shown herself to be capable under a firm and just administration of the law, and by the removal of every grievance of which she could fairly and rightly complain.

*THE EARL OF MAYO said, that living among the loyal minority of the South and West of Ireland, he denied that the interests of those who lived in that part of Ireland, the Ireland of ancient learning, were safeguarded by the Bill. He did not speak for himself alone, but for the thousands of the South and West of Ireland; for those who were afraid to express themselves in public by reason of the intimidation which it was well known existed in the country. Their cry was that this was the most treacherous of all the Bills that had ever been introduced during the sad history of that country. It was impossible for him to enter into all the details of the Bill, but he would say that no minority could be protected under such a Bill, when the men placed in power by it were the very men who, from the beginning of their career, had sought to harass that minority, and to thwart its interests in every possible way. The capital, interest, and learning of the country, as represented by the minority, had all declared their dread of the future under this measure; and those who had no capital, no stake in the country, whose interest was political agitation, and whose learning was mere self-interest and intrigue, were the men to whom Mr. Gladstone was going to hand over the Government of the country. The principle involved could be easily described in a few short words. The Government was to be handed over to two Legislative Chambers which were to be supported by a large standing army. Did anyone who lived in Ireland imagine for an instant that that army was to be kept to fight against England's foes? There was not a fort around their coasts which could be defended with any safety. The noble Earl who brought in the Bill very truly said that while he was in Ireland for several years under the most difficult circumstances he had to administer the law entrusted to him by Parliament, and he had done so honestly and fearlessly. The noble Earl was one of the best Viceroy's that Ireland ever had; no Viceroy ever administered the law so well. Many a time the noble Earl carried his life in his hand; and if he were appointed Viceroy again, and came without the Home Rule Bill, they should welcome him and be pleased to see him. He lived in Ireland among Roman Catholics. His tenants were Roman Catholics, as were also all his labourers and a great many of his servants, and he could assure their Lordships there really was not one of them who cared one brass penny for this Bill. The loyal Roman Catholics of Ireland had spoken, and the noble Duke, the head of the great Roman Catholic families of England, who addressed their Lordships yesterday, clearly expressed their sentiments. The noble Earl who introduced the Bill said that the present did not initiate any political movement. They were not so foolish; they waited to see if the movement was a success, and if it was, they guided the people in the way they should go; they moulded the people's wishes, took them to the polls, and made them vote as they wished. The noble Earl went on to say that if the current was strong the Bishops and priests swam with it. They did not swim with it. They watched the current and dug dykes and directed it, and with it irrigated the political soil of Ireland, if it suited their purpose to do so. The peasantry grew up and flourished under that irrigation, and were influenced in every possible way by the priesthood. He had no desire to cast aspersions on the Irish priesthood. They were the guides, philosophers, and friends of the Irish peasantry for better or for worse, and were well known to be a strong political power in that country. Supposing Mr. Gladstone were to people an island in the Atlantic, and give this Bill to those people, he wondered what the condition of that island would be within a short time. Why, in 18 months, they would be "fighting like devils for conciliation, and hating each other for the love of God." He thanked the House for listening to the reasons why he was there to record his vote against the measure.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: My Lords, when yesterday I listened to the speech of considerable length of the noble Earl who introduced this measure, I could not prevent the thought entering into my mind as to what would have been his answer had anybody of a singularly courageous temperament ventured in 1885, when the noble Earl last had practical experience of Ireland, and since when I believe he has never set foot on the shores of that country—had anybody ventured to prognosticate that within little more than eight years from that date the noble Earl would have been introducing to your Lordships a measure of Home Rule for Ireland. Any one who ventured upon such a prediction would, I believe, have been contradicted in language of a forcible kind. The gist of the noble Earl's observations would probably have been—"I am a strong Unionist, for I am firmly convinced that the Union is absolutely essential to the welfare and prosperity of Ireland, and I am the last person to propose to hand over the loyal, honest, industrious, law-abiding inhabitants of Ireland who supported me in the time of trouble to a body of men whom the Government to which I belonged did not hesitate to imprison without any sort of trial, and whom I did not hesitate to prosecute for doing their utmost to stop the administration of the law." I listened with considerable interest and attention to the speech of the noble Earl in introducing this measure, and I am sorry to say that I heard from him no argument of any sort or kind to prove that Home Rule would be beneficial to Ireland. His whole argument was belief in the future, of which he knows nothing, and absolute forgetfulness of the past, of which he knows much. The noble Earl proved up to the hilt that, if a body of political agitators were only sufficiently persevering in carrying out their lawless principles, there was nothing which they might not hope for at the hands of the Prime Minister supported by a Government of a docile character. There was one astounding point in the speech of the noble Earl. He said that the reason of his conversion to Home Rule was that in 1885 the Conservatives had joined the Home Rule Party. [Earl SPENCER: No.] He certainly accused the Conservative Party of coming to an accommodation with the Home Rulers. Now, I deny that in toto.

*EARL SPENCER: I said that one of the facts which made an impression upon my mind in 1885 was that at the time when the Conservatives were in a minority in another place they were willing to come into Office on the Irish vote with all its responsibilities, in addition to the votes of their own Party.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDON-DERRY: I repudiate that statement in toto.

*EARL SPENCER: Does the noble Marquess dispute that the Conservatives were in a minority in the House of Commons?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I dispute that we had any desire to come into Office. We were forced to come into Office by the action of the Liberal Party.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDON-DERRY: I maintain that the noble Earl had no right whatever to accuse the Conservative Party of having intrigued with the Home Rule Party, and I defy him to quote any speech of any Member of the Party to which I belong which would bear him out in that statement. I am not going to quote the opinions of noble Lords opposite who were Members of Mr. Gladstone's Government in 1880, and who are Members of his Government at present, but this I will say: there was hardly a Member of the Government of 1880 who did not denounce the principle of Home Rule, and denounce their present supporters among the National Party in terms of greater violence than were used by any Member of the Party to which I belong. But there is one quotation which I will give from a speech of the Prime Minister himself which, to my mind, embodies in itself every obstacle and impediment to the measure introduced by the noble Earl. Mr. Gladstone said in 1881—

"Can any sensible man, any rational man, suppose we are going to disintegrate the great capital institutions of this country for the purpose of making ourselves ridiculous in the sight of all mankind, and crippling any power we possess for bestowing benefits by legislation on the country to which we belong?"

Why has Mr. Gladstone, and why have the other Members of the Government, changed those opinions? The noble Earl in January, 1886, was not a Home Ruler, for he made a speech in your Lordships' House in which he denounced the Government for not bringing in a Coercion Bill. But we are not in a position to know why he changed his opinions. The noble Earl made use of the only argument that can be put forward in support of Home Rule. He thought it a valid argument, but it is only plausible. It is the argument that the majority of the Irish Members demand Home Rule. But the Unionist Party in Ireland is grossly under-represented. If they had had their fair share they would have at least one-third of the representation. The 80 Irish Members who maintain Mr. Gladstone's majority are mostly returned by the votes of the least educated men, influenced by clerical intimidation. In my opinion, and in the opinion of almost every unprejudiced mind, the arguments against Home Rule are innumerable and overwhelming. From the Irish standpoint alone, your Lordships are justified in refusing to pass this Bill. From the Imperial point of view, as possessing property in Ireland and in England, I object to this measure because, in the event of Home Rule being granted, you would find a hostile Ireland with 60 miles of your shores. What would be the effect on India, on your Colonies, and on Foreign Powers if they were to see a surrender of this kind granted to a parcel of agitators, simply because they put forth demands that the Government dare not oppose? There is no finality whatever in this measure. Everyone who knows Ireland is aware that this Bill is looked upon only as a stepping-stone to separation. How can the noble Earl say that this is a final measure?

*EARL SPENCER: I never said so. I do not believe that a final measure could be introduced.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: Then the noble Earl agrees that separation is the result. Some of his supporters, amongst them Mr. W. O'Brien, have declared their determination not to accept any measure that does not give Ireland entire repeal. Mr. William O'Brien, M.P., at Ballaghaderreen on December 6, 1891, said;—

"Whatever the future may bring, of one thing you may rest assured—that the Irish Party will never barter their independence as the ambassadors of an Irish nation, and that they will never accept any national settlement, any Home Rule settlement, that will not draw the last fangs of landlordism, and that will not leave this old Irish race of our's masters, and the landowners within the four seas of Holy Ireland."

On another occasion Mr. O'Brien said—

"I take it that we are all united in demanding that the Irish Parliament, while it acts within its own province, shall be as free from Imperial meddling as the Parliaments of Australia or Canada. That is to say, practically speaking, as free as air."

The Marquess of Londonderry

After that I do not think I have gone too far in saying that the Irish nation regard this measure merely as a stepping-stone to separation. Then, from the purely British point of view there are many objections to this Bill. What, for instance, would be the effect of the presence in the House of Commons of 80 free lances prepared to sell their votes to whoever may be the highest bidder in order to oust the Government of the day? What have you to say to the increased taxation upon the British people, estimated at £500,000, and what will be our position in the event of a war? I now wish to put before your Lordships the objections to this measure from an Irish point of view. In the first place, the measure is not necessary. I am borne out in that statement by the representatives of commerce, education, capital, and certain branches of labour, by the Protestants of Ireland, by almost all the Nonconformists, and by tens of thousands of Roman Catholics. The interests of all these men are centred in Ireland, and they, therefore, would not go out of their way to oppose a measure like this unless they believed that it would bring ruin and misery to their country; and they will tell you that Home Rule means not only moral but material ruin. They will tell you that they distrust the present Leaders of the Irish Party. They believe that no truer words were ever written than those written by Mr. John Bright in his letter to Mr. Gladstone—

"You deem them to be patriots. I hold them to be not patriots, but conspirators against the Crown and the Government of the United Kingdom."

Mr. Bright, like sensible men to-day, judged these men by their past, and not by their statements as to their future policy. The noble Earl opposite (Lord Spencer) bases his belief on the unknown future; we base ours on the known past. We do not choose to expunge from our minds the record of these men in the noble Earl's facile fashion. We know them as the originators and promoters of the Plan of Campaign, which was declared illegal by the Judges of the land, and immoral by the Pope of Rome. We know them as the advocates of boycotting and intimidation, and we have not forgotten words like these, which were used by Mr. Dillon—

"When we come out of the struggle we will remember who were the people's friends, and who were the people's enemies; and we will deal out our rewards to the one, and our punishments to the other."

We remember also that Mr. Dillon said that a man who stood aside in the struggle against landlordism, British rule and coercion, was a dastard and a coward, and that he and his children would be remembered in the days near at hand, when Ireland would be a free nation. Surely we are justified in refusing to have men who have spoken in this way put in authority over us. We did not hear much from the noble Earl about the future financial position of Ireland. My opinion is that the men who showed their financial capacity by their disastrous venture at New Tipperary, and by almost ruining The Freeman's Journal, are not likely to manage successfully the financial business of their country. Then we cannot forget the Report of the Special Commission of Judges, who found that these men had been guilty of a criminal conspiracy to coerce, intimidate, and drive out the English garrison, of seeking the total separation of Ireland from England, of inviting and accepting the co-operation of dynamitards like Patrick Ford, and of disseminating The Irish World, which preached the burning of English cities, and the murder of English subjects. Yet these are the people to whose tender mercies the Government propose to hand over the peaceful and law-abiding population of Ireland. Speaking in 1881, Mr. Gladstone said—

"For nearly the first time in the history of Christendom a small body of men have arisen who are not ashamed to preach in Ireland the doctrine of public plunder."

And Sir William Harcourt once said—

"We have heard the doctrine of the Land League expounded by the man (Mr. Dillon) who is an authority to explain it, and to-morrow every subject of the Queen will know that the doctrine so expounded is the doctrine of treason and assassination. . . . To-morrow the civilised world will pronounce its judgment on this vile conspiracy. . . . The Land League is an association which depends upon the support of the Fenian conspiracy."

The noble Earl himself, who when he was in Ireland and knew these men, before he allowed himself to truckle to this body of agitators, did not hesitate to say of them that they were dastardly—

"But they will not terrify the English nation;"—

they have terrified the present Government—

"the Government will face their enemies with a determination not to give in, and they will not give up one point or one idea they consider it necessary to maintain——"

*EARL SPENCER: I believe the noble Marquess is quoting from a speech of mine at Belfast? I was then referring to the dynamiters and assassins which unfortunately had made their appearance in Ireland at that time.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: Yes; and I have quoted passages to show that these Leaders were associated with the dynamiters.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Did the finding of the Commission associate the Irish Leaders with the dynamiters?

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: Certainly. There is this passage—

"Inviting and accepting the co-operation of dynamitards like Patrick Ford and disseminating The Irish World, which preached burning of English cities and murder of English subjects."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I asked whether there was any finding that they were dynamiters, and the noble Marquess produces a passage of which I am perfectly well aware, but it is not the point.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I quoted these statements to your Lordships to show the class of men to whom the Government propose to hand over the government of Ireland. We distrust them; you did distrust them. You know them now, but you do not dare to say you distrust them. We believe implicitly that the Ethiopian cannot change his skin nor the leopard his spots. The noble Earl in his speech last night seemed to imply that there might be a different class of persons in the Home Rule Parliament; but I wish to ask him on what grounds he made that statement? Why are the present Leaders to be dislodged and to make place for others? Do you think that this body of agitators, who have challenged the law and undergone imprisonment, are going to put their interests on one side when the goal is reached and to retire into seclusion? I cannot believe that the inducement to enter the English Parliament was so great, that the gates of the gaol were only a prelude to a seat there, or that these men will take a back seat and never appear again when Home Rule is granted. The noble Earl knows full well that if Home Rule is granted these men, who have maintained their system of intimidation and crime, will occupy the foremost place in the new Parliament. Now, my Lords, I have dealt, I think, with the moral objections to the proposals of the Government. I go on now to what is, perhaps, more important, and what may be described as the material objections. I say that even if the Leaders of the National Party were of an absolutely unimpeachable character the material objections would be as strong as ever. It is hardly necessary for me to explain to your Lordships that on account of the close and intimate connection of Ireland with Great Britain she enjoys enormous advantages. England is the richest and most important country in the world, and consequently by the fact of being connected with her Ireland enjoys advantages from the Imperial Government. There is enjoyed by the citizens of this country a freedom such as is hardly known in any other part of the world. Ireland knows that were any grievance to arise she may count on its being speedily and justly redressed; but the main advantage that Ireland enjoys from her connection with a great and rich country is the power she has possessed up till now of borrowing money at a cheap rate of interest for the purpose of benefiting all classes of the community. There is not a class that has not been benefited in this way. Ireland, as you know, is a poor country. She has no mineral resources. I noticed that a noble Lord opposite in his speech to-day made out that Ireland was an El Dorado, but I say that Ireland has not the advantages you might expect her to have. She possesses no mineral wealth. She does not possess those great means of industry which this country possesses, and consequently her credit must be small when she wishes to obtain money for the purposes of developing her resources. In the last 60 years nearly £40,000,000 had been advanced to Ireland on the credit of England for the purposes of railways, harbours, and docks, the houses of the labourers and artisans, the public health, lunatic asylums, river drainage and navigation, the improvement of land,

seed supplies, and the relief of distress. Almost every class of the community has benefited by that money. But these advances must necessarily cease if Home Rule is granted. These resources which I have just touched must remain undeveloped; the benefits which we have begun must necessarily remain uncompleted. For who will advance money to Ireland under a Home Rule Government? Will any noble Lord opposite, or will any English capitalist, and is it likely in these circumstances that the British taxpayer will allow the English Government to advance money? Certainly not. Because there is no security. Capitalists, taxpayers, and your Lordships yourselves will consider the character of the men to whom you are to advance the money, and I do not think you will find anyone who will advance money to a Government manipulated by men who have preached and insisted on the doctrine of the repudiation of debt, and who have carried out that doctrine with a vengeance. What is to be the result in Ireland if no money is advanced? There must be either bankruptcy or an increase of taxation. Can it be wondered at that anybody with anything to lose in Ireland regards the measure with alarm? The fault of this is to be found in the fact that a great withdrawal of capital has taken place in Ireland. I find that there was a decrease of £16,000 in the deposits in the Post Office savings banks in June, 1893, as compared with June, 1892, and a decrease of £160,000 in June last, as compared with December, 1892. Government funds had decreased in June, 1893, by £759,000 as compared with June, 1892. I have said that capitalists have been betrayed by the present Government, whom they looked upon as staunch supporters of the Union under which they invested their capital. But there are many other classes which you have betrayed. You have betrayed the landlords of Ireland, the men whom the noble Lord opposite said it would be mean and treacherous to abandon. You have betrayed the Protestants of Ireland, many of whom were supporters of Mr. Gladstone up to 1886; you have betrayed Trinity College, you have betrayed the police, and you have betrayed the Civil servants. I do not propose to enter at any length into those cases. But I would draw your Lordships' attention to the matter of the Civil servants, who have been praised by every Chief Secretary as having discharged their duty in an admirable, able, and efficient manner. They are at the present moment in a most desperate condition. If they retire now they receive a pension so small and so miserable that they could not exist upon it. In many cases they have sacrificed posts of a lucrative but a temporary character to obtain these permanent posts. If they retain their posts, at the end of five years they will be at the mercy of Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Dillon, who have not hesitated to declare how they will treat them. Yet we are told that there is ample security. What is the security? The Irish Legislative Council. That part of the Legislature was never discussed in the House of Commons, because the Government dare not let it be known who the people are who elect that Council. They are men possessing land of a rateable value of £20; and those who know Ireland know what that represents. Under the O'Hagan Jury Act of 1861 the same qualification was established for the common jury. But these men were found so liable to intimidation that trial by them was a perfect farce, and they were abolished by the noble Earl opposite himself. Then the qualification was raised to £30, and in 1876 it was raised by the Government of Lord Beaconsfield to £40; and even then it was found that the men were so open to intimidation that the Clare Assizes had actually to be abandoned. But these £40 men are too good, and the Government return to the £20 qualification, which they themselves abolished. I am glad that the Lord Lieutenant is present to-night, because I have come across a speech of his which requires some explanation. Speaking at Devizes in 1892 the noble Lord said—

“He would like to ask the Tories exactly what it was the Protestants of Ulster were afraid of. The demand for information was not an impertinent one, for, if it could be shown that there was any serious risk of persecution, he would not support any Home Rule scheme that did not promise every possible safeguard.”

That speech was made on the 1st of April. I ask the noble Lord whether he adheres to that statement, and whether he thinks the £20 qualification is a sufficient safeguard for the minority? I now come to the main objection to the Bill—an obstacle of an overwhelming and insuperable character—the attitude of the Ulster Protestants. I would first answer a question put by the noble Earl yesterday—Have the Ulster people a right to oppose what Parliament decides? I ask him in reply—“Has Parliament any right to force down the throat of Ulster a measure which not only they detest, but which the majority of the people of Great Britain detest also?” I ask him further, if he is so determined that Ulster should obey Parliament, why the Government does not at once go to the country and ask the people if they support the measure and are willing to coerce Ulster? The Government dare not; but the country is beginning to understand this measure; and it will declare with no uncertain voice that Ulster shall not submit herself to this tyranny. That Ulster objects to this measure no man will deny. But let me say solemnly and deliberately that, though Ulster will accept the edict of the Imperial Parliament, be it led by the present Prime Minister or by the ex-Prime Minister, cheerfully and willingly in the future as she has done in the past, she will not submit for one moment to place her neck beneath the yoke of Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Brien and consent to obey the dictates of the National League. Mr. Dillon has said—“We have managed the South, and we will manage the North.” But Ulster will not be managed. Ulster has never bragged or blustered. [Ministerial cries of “Oh!”] When?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Continually. They never stop.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: When?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I shall apply the words to the speech of the noble and learned Lord this evening.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: Ulster has never bragged. I say that we have never boasted nor blustered in Ulster, but we know our position, and we will not recede a jot from it. We know well what Ulster is. Previous to the Union Ulster was the poorest of the four Provinces. She had none of the advantages of the other three Provinces. She had not the grazing pastures of Connaught or of Munster, nor the great harbours of Cork; but what is the position she occupies now? Agriculturally speaking, she is the garden of Ireland, and from the commercial point of view her chief cities rank as high as some of the large cities of England and Scotland. It was, therefore, proposed that the people of Ulster, with all the fruits of their energy and industry, should be handed over to a body of men whom she hated and who hated her. In order to prove the value of land in Ulster by the price of the tenant-right in that Province, I may state that in 1892, on the Somerset estate, in Antrim, the tenant right of a farm was sold for 24½ years' purchase; on January 3, 1893, a farm in County Down was sold for 27 years' purchase, and on April 12, in County Tyrone, one was sold for 77 years' purchase. I come now to the City of Belfast, and wish to show your Lordships the enormous strides which have been made there since the Union. The population of Belfast in 1800 was under 19,000; now it is 275,000. The number of inhabited houses was about 3,000; now they number 60,000. The number of ships entering the harbour in 1800 was 777; now the number is 8,304, and the tonnage amounted to 55,268 tons, as against 2,053,637 tons in 1893. The income of the harbour was £2,748; at present it is £129,864. The Customs Revenue in 1784 was £101,376; in 1893 it was £2,376,511. Another great industry was the linen trade. In 1850 the number of persons employed in the linen trade was 21,121; in 1890 the number was 64,000, while on bleaching greens and in other processes connected with the finishing of linens there were 50,000 persons, making in all a total of 114,000. The annual value of the linen trade is estimated at £1,200,000 per annum. Though Ulster has been guilty of no bluster, she has this enormous stake in the country, and she is not going to give it up without a struggle. She is taking precautions to guard herself in the future, and there have been enrolled under the Ulster Defence Union 170,000 men. These men have elected 600 delegates to represent them in a great Convention at Belfast in October, and I have no doubt that at the meeting of these delegates a resolution will be passed absolutely declining to submit to any edicts that may emanate from Mr. Dillon or Mr. O'Brien if an Irish Parliament is established on College Green. There had been no less a sum than £250,000 advanced in connection with this Body. And let me tell your Lordships that that sum of money, large as it is, does not consist entirely of the thousands of the rich, but to a large extent is composed of the pennies of the poor. I maintain that that shows the determination of the people of Ulster to resist to the utmost any attempt that may be made to set up a Department on College Green. I wish that any of your Lordships who are ignorant of Ireland could visit Ulster; you would then see what the determination of the people is. I trust implicitly to the people of England; I know they will not desert us. I ask your Lordships to remember that on Friday you have to decide whether you will assent to the disintegration of the Empire. I ask you for a moment to consider the measure moved by the noble Earl and the rejection moved by the noble Duke. In favour of the measure is the Prime Minister of England, who has proved to have sold himself body and soul to the Nationalist Party. And behind him stand his Colleagues, who have been unable to resist the moral influence of the Prime Minister to carry this measure through the House of Commons. It is common talk that supporters of the Government would not have voted for this measure if they had not believed that this House would throw it out. You are asked to pass the Bill by the Nationalists, who have supported boycotting, the Plan of Campaign, intimidation, crime, and cruelty. You are asked to reject it by the majority of the people of England and of Great Britain, and by those who represent the wealth, industry, and intelligence of Ireland. Can you hesitate for one moment? I make no appeal to noble Lords opposite who, whatever their convictions may be, are tied body and soul to their Party. I appeal to all the rest of your Lordships, and I will ask you to remember that the eyes of every member of every nation of the civilised world are upon you. Your enemies are hoping, and your friends fearing, that in a moment of temporary aberration you will carry a measure that will ruin Ireland. In conclusion, I will suggest the spirit in which your votes should be given by quoting words once used by the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition, who said—

“I have no fear of the conduct of the House of Lords in this respect. I am quite sure, whatever judgment may be passed on us, whatever predictions may be made, be your term of existence long or short, you will never consent to act except as a free, independent House of the Legislature, and that you will consider any other more timid or subservient course as at once unworthy of your traditions, unworthy of your honour, and, most of all, unworthy of the nation you serve."

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN observed that the Bill before the House was the biggest Bill which had ever been submitted to Parliament. It was the biggest in the Constitutional changes which it proposed, and in the possible consequences which it might hereafter entail, and it was for the Government which proposed a Bill of that character to justify the measure to the House. It was for them to show that this measure, which admittedly went far beyond anything that they had ever proposed before, was required, and that there was every chance of its working successfully, and, above all, that it was just to the minority of Ireland. Yet every speech delivered on the Government side seemed to him carefully to avoid the provisions of the Bill altogether. It was a strange thing that not one single word had been heard from the Government of justification with regard to the constitution of the two Houses of the new Legislature, although in the opinion of many persons it was on the constitution of the Legislature that the working of the measure and the future of Ireland must necessarily depend. He was surprised to find his noble Friend Lord Brassey a Member of Her Majesty's Government, because, as far as he could make out, he agreed with nothing in the Bill except the general principles of Home Rule, and he proposed a variety of Amendments not one of which had the slightest chance of being accepted by the Government. In the first place, he knocked down the number of Irish Members at Westminster from 80 to 35, and he had other schemes of his own, one of which was that a Commission should be appointed on the Irish Land Question. His noble Friend Lord Ribblesdale made an able and interesting speech; the only fault he had to find with it was that it had nothing to do with the Bill. His noble Friend said he had, like the rest of the Liberal Unionists, hardened his heart and resisted Home Rule. He asked for a sign, and that sign was given by the Election of 1892. He was surprised his noble Friend said that, because he remembered having had the honour of being on a Unionist platform with him, and he did not remember the date at which his noble Friend left the Party, but it was long before the Election of 1892, which appeared to have exercised so converting and potent an influence upon him. Lastly, they had had the speech of Lord Playfair, who said that the Duke of Argyll made a long speech not connected with the Bill. But it was not the duty of the noble Duke to defend the Bill. Lord Playfair made a long and able speech, in the course of which he added and subtracted and proved to his own satisfaction that this Bill was supported by the majority in England, Scotland, and Ireland, but he never addressed himself to a single clause of the measure. He would not follow his noble Friend into all his additions and subtractions, but he would say that this Bill had been carried in another place solely by Irish votes, owing to the fact that Ireland was greatly over-represented in the Imperial Parliament. Had noble Lords who had brought forward this measure thoroughly considered the problem they had laid before the House? Was this Bill to be limited to Ireland, for, if not, it ceased to be Home Rule and became Federation. If they extended local Parliaments hereafter to Scotland and England then there would be a sort of triarchy with an Imperial Parliament to control it. He asked the other day whether the Government intended to give a Parliament to Scotland, and he was told that nothing of the kind was desired, and that the Government had not taken any thought with regard to it. That was an easy way of conducting the Government of the country. After bringing in an important measure, which dealt with the Constitution of Ireland and struck at the roots of the Imperial Parliament, they had not a conception how far they were going to persevere in this policy—indeed they had not a policy at all. He would now turn shortly to the details of the Bill. There was, in the first place, the great question of the land, which was the most important question of all. The noble Earl who moved the Second Reading recanted his opinions as to the necessity of dealing with the Land Question at the same time as the question of the Parliament. He remembered that his noble Friend did not speak in any great praise of the Ashbourne Acts; on the contrary, he predicted that they would fail. And he on that question said in 1889, the year of the first Ashbourne Act, that it had failed, and he would like to ask his noble Friend had those Acts anything to do with his conversion? It looked to him as though his noble Friend was looking for a way to escape from those extremely strong opinions that he had uttered at other times, and he fell back upon this the last straw. Whether his reputation would suffer or not he (Lord Camperdown) could not say; but if he did consider those reasons were sufficient to warrant his changing his opinions, did he look upon them as good now? He must do or else it was difficult to suppose his noble Friend would hand over the Irish landlords to the tender mercies of an Irish Parliament. If in that case his noble Friend felt any doubt as to what was likely to happen, let him turn to the utterances of the Nationalists. The Leader of the Anti-Parnellite Party had, at the Irish Nationalist Convention, made it clear what the landlords might expect from the Irish Legislature at the end of three years. There was no way for the Irish landlord to get out of his position except by sale to his tenants and no other person, for no person would buy. He thought that that condition of things would induce the landlords to be reasonable and possibly liberal; moreover, it was extremely probable that the prospect before them at the end of three years would induce the landlords to sell as soon as possible. He would have very much liked to hear something from the Government with regard to the constitution of the Assembly which was to be represented by the present constituencies. Those constituencies most unfairly represented the real opinion of Ireland; and when they were establishing a new Legislature, it was absolutely intolerable and unfair that they should accept and perpetuate a state of things which gave undue representation to the decaying towns and the small constituencies of the South at the expense of the loyal population of the North. If due consideration was to be given to population six years hence, why was it not to be given now? Why had the boundaries of the constituencies not been marked by Boundary Commissioners? Why were Newry, Kilkenny, and Galway, with a population of 44,000, to have three seats, while County Down, with 35,000 electors, was to have only the same number, and while Belfast, with 38,000 electors, was to have only four Members? Why was Dublin University to be entirely disfranchised? The Prime Minister said there was no disfranchisement; but if they examined the Schedule there was. He believed one of the reasons was that it had consistently returned Members who were not in community of feeling with the present Prime Minister. Under the Second Schedule there would in every case be a gain to the Nationalists and a loss to the Loyalists. It was quite impossible to make it a complete system. As to the financial scheme, which had undergone such frequent alteration, they had been told by Lord Spencer that the bargain was a good one for his country; but, as to that, he had never made any attempt to prove it, and until more effective arguments than had yet been adduced were brought forward to prove this, he should doubt whether the noble Earl's view was correct. As things stood, Great Britain was to bear a cost of collection in connection with the Revenue amounting to £200,000, and was to pay an allowance of £500,000 a year to Ireland for an unlimited period. The most significant thing with regard to this financial scheme was that all Irishmen were agreed as to its being ungenerous. They apparently thought that it was the duty, nay, the privilege, of this country not only to provide Ireland with a Parliament, but also to provide that Parliament with a surplus. In providing this surplus the Prime Minister had acted very much in the same way as he (the noble Lord) had acted when at Eton, and which, he dared say, many of them had with regard to a sum in arithmetic. They turned to the end of the book and looked at the answer, and, having got the answer, they then ingeniously devised some scheme by which they arrived at the necessary figure. There might be a surplus, but it could not be proved in any way. With respect to the subject of the Irish Members, it struck him as strange that the Government should not have discovered that the plan of partial retention was unworkable until after they had incorporated it in the Bill and brought it before Parliament. The noble Duke below him had said it was impossible to exclude the Irish Members, because if they did, they taxed them without giving them a representation. The Unionist Party believed that there would be much intrigue as a consequence of the plan finally adopted by the Government. The Prime Minister, on February 13, in introducing the Bill, said—

“If some large question of controversy entirely British, but still deep and vital, were severing the two great Parties in this House, and the Members of those Parties knew that whichever could bring forward the 80 Irish Representatives, or a large contingent of them, would carry the day, I am afraid of this possible opening of the door to wholesale and dangerous political intrigue. I dread a state of things through which there may be an opening to intrigue, with the result that British questions may be decided on Irish motives. . . . I confess that I and my colleagues have not been able to face such a contingency as this.”

Yet on July 13, under pressure of political necessity, the Prime Minister found himself well able to face the contingency, and what was now wanted was some adequate reason which led him to adopt that which he had previously declared would be entirely wrong. The most important speech delivered from the Irish Benches on this Bill was that of Mr. Redmond on the Third Reading, in which he said that the word “provisional” was written on every line of the Bill, and that no one would dare to say that it would be accepted as a final settlement. What would be the result. In three years from this time there would be a great land struggle in Ireland. He thought that in their dealings with Ulster they were taking upon themselves a great and grave responsibility. In six years there would be a great financial struggle, and a financial struggle in the House of Commons. The 80 Irish Members would be always en evidence, because whenever it came to Irish interests they would always be found fighting together. How could their Lordships pass the Bill upon the case, or, rather, no case, presented by the Government? The Government were in exactly the same position as promoters of a bogus Bill before a private Committee. The Bill ought to be rejected, because they had nothing to say in defence of its provisions. In the words of the noble Duke who spoke that night, their Lordships could not but know well the deception practised by the Prime Minister on the country and on the House of Commons. He could not forget an answer given by the Prime Minister to Mr. Chamberlain. The Prime Minister promised over and over again to bring forward the 9th clause, but at the last moment he rose and proposed the omission of that provision. When the Prime Minister was asked by Mr. Chamberlain whether he did not give that undertaking, he replied—“I knew the object of your question, and I was determined to defeat your purpose.” That was an extraordinary proceeding. Was that the sort of action the Prime Minister ought to take in the House of Commons? He called their attention to the changes that had been made in this Bill in the present Session. They had got a new clause which had not been half debated, and which had been closed and passed, and they had not had a word of explanation as to that, and the Bill must fall by its own weight, they being unable to make any case in its favour. Was the House of Lords bound to accept every Bill of every kind that obtained a scratch majority in the House of Commons? If so, what was the use of their Lordships’ Chamber at all? They had only one course to take in duty to the country—they must reject the Bill. He had no fear of the judgment of the people. He thought he could persuade them that there was no reason why an Irishman should have three votes while an Englishman or a Scotchman had only one, and why an Irish Parliament was to be set up and paid for by increasing the burdens of the English and Scotch taxpayers. He had no fear that when the Bill was fully explained to the electors they would declare that it was wrong to pass a measure which committed the decision of British affairs to a band of irresponsible Members.

*VISCOUNT CROSS: I wish to address to your Lordships a few words on the question of finance in connection with the Bill. I am quite aware that the propositions contained in this Bill and the principles on which it is founded are so radically unsound that it will be quite impossible for this Government or for any Government to present a good Bill to your Lordships on the subject. But there is one matter which I think, at all events, we are entitled to have from any Government which presents a Bill of this kind—namely, that it contains in its pages the deliberate convictions of the Government themselves, and also the deliberate convictions of the House of Commons. I maintain as strongly as possible that this Bill does not contain the deliberate convictions of Her Majesty's Government. We had in 1886 a speech from the Prime Minister when he first introduced this subject to Parliament. He then said, after he had given all the consideration to it he could before he brought the subject forward, there were two initiatory propositions and principal parts of the Bill. What are they? The first was that the Irish representation at Westminster should cease; the second was that the fiscal unity of the Empire should be absolutely maintained. These were the vital principles. They are not found in this Bill. There was a third proposition which he made at the same time, and on which, at that moment, he laid equal stress, and that was that in order to be a good plan it must be a real settlement for the Irish Question. That is not found in this Bill. One more quotation from the Prime Minister. He said—

“It is perfectly clear that if Ireland is to have a domestic Legislature, the Irish Peers and Irish Representatives cannot come here to have control over English and Scotch affairs. That I understand to be admitted.”

But that is not found in the Bill. We do not yet know what are the deliberate opinions of the Government as to whether the Irish Representatives ought to be or ought not to be here. We have had three plans. First the Irish Members are to be out; next they are to be in and out; and now they are to be in. Which plan represents the deliberate conviction of Her Majesty's Government? That I think we are entitled to know. What did Lord Spencer say on this very in-and-out plan yesterday? He said it was perfectly impossible as a practical measure.

“How was it possible to have a Government supported at one time by one body of men and at another time by another body of men?”

If that was the conviction of the Government, as it was of Lord Spencer, why was that plan laid before Parliament?

Viscount Cross

Then as to fiscal unity, as to the contribution of Ireland, we should like to know the deliberate conviction of the Government on that point. We have had three plans submitted. We have had the tribute, or lump sum; we have had the allocation of the Customs, and now we have the quota. We should like to know why these three plans have been presented so rapidly the one after the other? We do not want to hear about the best and easiest means the Government could find for passing the Bill through Parliament, but we want to hear the deliberate convictions of the Government. These clauses are not the expression of the deliberate opinion of the House of Commons, because the House of Commons has not been allowed to discuss this question of finance. Your Lordships seldom interfere with financial questions; but never before in my long Parliamentary experience have I heard of a Bill dealing with financial matters which was sent up to the House of Lords without having been deliberated on by the House of Commons. The Speaker of the House of Commons comes from time to time to the Bar of the House and asks for recognition of his privileges, among which are freedom of debate and freedom of speech, and Her Majesty has always readily granted the privilege; but what Her Imperial Majesty always grants this imperious Minister has refused. I might say a few words about the three different policies of finance. First of all, the proposition of 1886 was that the Irish people should pay a lump sum; why was that plan not reproduced in 1893? It had been very strongly pressed on the House of Commons by the Prime Minister, and the only reason the right hon. Gentleman gave for dismissing it was that the

I do not see the connection. I am glad, however, that plan has been produced. In that plan the contribution by the Irish Government towards the cost of police was to continue at £1,000,000, and the savings made by the Irish Government were not to go into their pockets, but into the Imperial Exchequer. Another question of importance was the collection of the Revenue, and according to the plan of the Government the cost of collection was without dispute put on the Irish Exchequer, and not upon the English Exchequer. We need not discuss that second plan, because it was based on estimates in which upon discussion we found a mistake had been made of £350,000. The third plan is that of this Bill; it is said that Ireland should pay something like what she does now. There are great objections to that plan; they were stated by the Prime Minister himself; and they seem to me to be insuperable. He said there was no difficulty as to the Excise, but there was great difficulty as to the Customs in distinguishing between the respective consumptions of Ireland and of Great Britain. No answer has been given to that question. You do not mean to say that within the last three months the Customs have found some way out of the difficulty which they could not see before. The second difficulty of the Prime Minister, which appears to be equally insuperable, is that Irish finance would be exposed to inconvenient shocks from changes made in the English Budget for Imperial reasons. Let us follow that out. If the Sugar Duties had not been repealed you would have seen the effect of it immediately. There is a great cry amongst a certain class of people, and I think a reasonable one, that we should have a free breakfast table. Let us say the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the future, wishing to get a little popularity, acceded to this cry of the free breakfast table. Then there would have to be extra taxation to meet the difference lost in that way, and then the Irish Exchequer would lose £502,000 a year, and in that case what would become of the Irish surplus? Let me take a natural corollary from the objection stated by the Prime Minister. We all know the finance of each year varies in two respects—either the Revenue increases or the Expenditure increases, or both may happen—and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to meet the difficulty by revising his Budget. But he cannot do it. He is tied down by the bargain with the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer, and if he touches one of the taxes he interferes with the surplus to be given to the Irish Government. There is the duty on dried fruits, about which there is some considerable clamour.

As far as Ireland is concerned, that comes to £40,000 a year. There is a question which we may be forced into by foreign complications—the Wine Duties. Ireland's share of the Wine Duties is £104,000 a year, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England would be bound to send over to Ireland and say—"I am bound to alter this financial arrangement of mine; I must consult you before I can do it; otherwise I shall not be fulfilling the bargain with Ireland." The Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day, in reply to this objection, said he had now a Local Budget and an Imperial Budget to arrange, and that it would be no more difficult to deal with this new system than with the old. What an absurd answer for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make! The contribution which he makes to local expenditure is entirely in his own hands; he can do exactly as he likes; he has nobody to consult. But with an Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer he cannot put his finger on a tax, direct or indirect. Whichever he touches, he touches the surplus which you have given to the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Irish Chancellor says—"No; there is a treaty; you are depriving me, and have no right to touch these things without my consent." Let me take the third objection. "We should," says the Prime Minister, "under this system give to Imperial officers a meddling and intervening power in relation to Irish fiscal affairs." What is the answer to that? That you have given the power to these 80 Irish Members of meddling and interfering in English affairs. Do you suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer will stir one foot or hand in anything which might affect the surplus without the strong intervention of these 80 Irish Members who will be there as Delegates? I should like to consider the result of this particular bargain. The first question that arises is, What does Ireland contribute at present to the general expenses of the country? The general Revenue, according to the Returns placed in our hands, in 1892-3 is £96,000,000. The Irish contribution is £7,600,000, but, deducting the amount expended by the United Kingdom on Ireland, the balance left for the Imperial Exchequer is £2,103,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken an average of three years, and he says that £2,100,000 may be taken as the sum to be contributed by Ireland for Imperial purposes. That is what she does pay, but what ought she to pay? The Prime Minister said that the best test is the amount paid on the Death Duties. In 1886 he laid down that 1-15th was the proportion which Ireland ought to pay. I believe that the Death Duties have been somewhat considerably reduced since that time. Therefore I am willing to adopt the contention of the Government and say that 1-18th would represent the proportion which Ireland ought to pay in 1893 according to the Death Duties. Now take the total for the whole of the Three Kingdoms, and it is admitted on all hands that the amount required is £60,576,000. One-eighteenth of that will come out at £3,350,000, and that is the sum which, according to the Prime Minister, Ireland ought to pay towards Imperial Expenditure; but what would she pay under the Bill? The average contributed by Ireland in the last three years has been £2,262,000. You are going to make them a present of one-third of the cost of the police, or £486,000, which reduces her contribution to Imperial Expenditure to £1,776,000. A further amount of £224,000 has to be deducted as the cost of collection, so that Ireland will really have to pay £1,552,000, which is not 1-18th, nor 1-15th, but 1-40th. That is a question which ought to be discussed before the constituencies. Then they turn round and say that the cost of the police ought to be an Imperial charge. The result is that the British taxpayers will have to pay £700,000 a year, at least, for the bargain which the Government have made. Do you think that the people of this country had any notion that they would be called upon to pay this sum? The arrangement for the collection of taxes, involving an annual expenditure of more than £200,000, had no place in the scheme of 1886, and the proposals respecting the police are totally different from those made then. This is the price which the Government propose that we should pay, and for what? In order that they may buy 80 Irish votes. Your masters will not be contented with anything less. The dish had to be flavoured to suit the palates of those who were to enjoy it, and they said somehow or other we must have £500,000. All these accounts are cooked in order that this sum may be arrived at. I do not believe that the people yet understand this. We were told that when this Home Rule measure was passed the English Parliament would be relieved of all Irish business. But what are the facts? We have to pay £700,000, and 80 Members from Ireland are to be present in the House of Commons. Do you think those Irish Members will let you rest? No; if you set up these tyrants they will tyrannise over you. The English people had, at all events, reason to believe in 1886 that under the scheme then proposed they would get rid of the Irish Members and of the Irish Question. If the Government wish to know the opinion of the English people upon these points, let them put on the Estimates a Vote of £700,000 for the cost of the Home Rule Bill; or let them bring in a Bill to place this amount on the Consolidated Fund. Their proposals would then be made short work of in the House of Commons and the country, and you will dispose of this Home Rule Bill for once and for ever.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Marquess of Ripon): I hope your Lordships will allow me, even at this late hour, to make some observations on the course of this Debate. I would beg at once to point out that only one supporter of this Bill has had an opportunity of speaking to-night. Of course, in the present circumstances of the House, there are many more Members who are opposed to the Bill than support it; but I think there ought to be some limit to the exercise of the power of your overwhelming majority, and that you ought to allow a larger amount of time to the minority than you have done to-night. We had at the outset of the Debate this evening, in the eloquent speech from the Duke of Argyll, a long treatise on Irish history from the point of view he takes of the subject. I will not follow my noble Friend upon that point, but will content myself by saying that in respect to Irish history, and especially the Union, I would rather take as an authority the history of Mr. Lecky than I would the history of the Duke of Argyll. Before I proceed to speak of the provisions of the Bill, I am impelled to notice the course of this Debate in one respect. Noble Lords who oppose the Government seem perfectly unable to imagine that we could have had any good or honourable motive for adopting the policy of this Bill. I am quite sure that this must arise from your not having followed the arguments that have been deduced in favour of this measure. I think that already there have been given to you in the course of these two nights, by the few persons supporting the Bill who have been allowed to address you, some reasons of no small weight, quite apart from those charges of desiring to buy the support of the Irish Members that form the stock and staple of the speeches of our opponents. My noble Friend Lord Spencer, in opening this discussion, laid before you many instances of the fatal tendency of English remedial legislation in Ireland to be always too late, and my noble Friend Lord Playfair, in his able speech, spoke about the commercial condition of Ireland during the years it has been governed under the present system. But still your Lordships think that these reasons cannot have weight with honest men, and that there is some concealed and improper object in the policy which we are pursuing. We held at the Election of 1886, and our assertion has since been proved up to the hilt, that there are but two methods of governing Ireland; we said that there was no choice except between conciliation and coercion. We believed that the policy of coercion pursued for 87 years through 87 Coercion Acts had been proved to have failed for the purpose for which Government is established in free countries. What were the last experiences of coercion at the time of the Election of 1886? They were the Coercion Acts administered by Mr. Forster and Lord Spencer. With respect to Mr. Forster's Act, it is now admitted on all hands that it was a failure. I had nothing to do with that Act, because I was not in this country at the time. The Act which followed and which was administered by Lord Spencer produced good results in respect of the diminution of crime; but my noble Friend himself has told you in the course of this Debate that, having administered that Act to the best of his ability, the result of that administration left upon his mind the conviction that a policy of that description never could produce that which I venture to say is the great end of government, the contentment of the people. But, apart from that experience of the failure of coercion, we have another important circumstance which took place in 1885, and again in 1886. In 1884 Parliament for the first time gave to the Irish people the same franchise that the people of England enjoyed. To that measure the Duke of Devonshire was a party. Why did you do that? Did you extend the franchise to the Irish people because you wanted to disregard their opinions, or did you do it in order that you might get in Parliament a better representation and a fuller expression of the feelings of the Irish people? What was the result? The supporters of the Home Rule policy were returned by an overwhelming majority both in 1885 and in 1886. The result of the reduction of the franchise was the return of overwhelming Nationalist majorities in 1885 and 1886, and that is a fact which cannot be disregarded, and is a circumstance which may reasonably lead men to think that a new policy with regard to Ireland ought to be pursued. There were also in 1885 some remarkable expressions of opinion upon the question of the state of Ireland; and the late Lord Carnarvon, in a speech in your Lordships' House, said—

"I have been astonished to find that ever since 1847, with some short intervals that are hardly worth mentioning, Ireland has lived under coercive legislation. No sane man can admit that this is a satisfactory or a wholesome state of things. It does seem to me that it is very desirable, if possible, that we should extricate ourselves from this miserable habit and aim at some wholesome and better solution. But more than being undesirable, I hold that such legislation is practically impossible if it is to be continuously and indefinitely re-enacted."

I am bound to say that these words made a deep impression on me, and I might add that before I returned to this country from India I had come to the conclusion that I would not again, unless under very exceptional circumstances, be a party to a policy of coercion. There was another description of Irish government as it then stood, and still stands, given by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, when he was still in the service of the Crown. He described the system of government in Ireland as depending on 30,000 bayonets, and compared it to Russia's government of Poland or Venice under Austria, and finally said—

“The time has come to reform altogether the absurd and irritating anachronism which is known as Dublin Castle.”

It is impossible for responsible persons to use such language without leading men to think whether such a system ought not to be stopped. It is, therefore, quite needless for the noble Marquess to seek for some sinister motive for the change of policy adopted by the Liberal Party. We took the experience of the past to heart. We took your teaching to heart. To us it seemed that a policy of conciliation was the only policy by which we could deliver Ireland from coercion, or by which we can reform the irritating anachronism of Dublin Castle. For my part, I give all honour to the late Lord Carnarvon and his Colleagues. In 1885 they set us an example. The only difference between them and us is that they have withdrawn their hands from the plough and we have gone forward.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : What plough ?

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON : The ending of the miserable habit of coercion and the anachronism of Dublin Castle. Our policy is a full and complete concession to the Irish people of the management of their own affairs.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : Does the noble Marquess mean to suggest that we intended to give Home Rule to the Irish people ?

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON : You told the public from these Benches that the system of coercion was a bad one, and that it should be abandoned ; and you were on the look out for a better method of government. I do not want to carry you further than your words. But such words cannot be spoken in the Parliament of this country without making a great change in the position of any question. Our policy, then, is to give a full and free power to the Irish people to manage their own Irish affairs. That policy implies a trust in the Irish people. But your Lordships are accustomed to sneer at the notion of putting trust in the Irish people, though here, again, we have on our side the words of the late Lord Carnarvon. On July 6, 1885, Lord Carnarvon used these words—

The Marquess of Ripon

“It may be said that this is a question of trust. No doubt it is a question of trust, but trust begets trust, and it is, after all, the only foundation upon which we can hope to build up amity and concord between the two nations.”

That is language which we thankfully and gladly accept. We came to the conviction that the policy of coercion could not be maintained, and that there was no choice between a policy of continued coercion and a policy of trust. That policy we have since firmly adhered to. When I speak of coercion, I do not say that noble Lords opposite have had a monopoly of coercive policy in Ireland. Doubtless the Liberal Party has had its full share in the adoption of that policy. The difference, however, is that we have learned our mistake, and have had a glimmering of the truth, and retrieved our former error. Now, I will turn for a moment, before touching on the Bill, to another argument which has been very largely introduced into this Debate. We have been told several times that Parliament has no mandate in regard to this Bill. That is the language of my noble Friend the Duke of Devonshire, and that was the language of my noble Friend Earl Cadogan. I cannot help remarking here that I am not sure that it is altogether judicious for noble Lords to talk about a mandate to represent the people of this country, because it is not impossible that some irreverent people may ask whether the Members of this House have any mandate to represent the people at all. That is not a point I want to press. What I want to say is that your doctrine of mandate is totally new to the Constitution. If ever any Parliament had a mandate to deal with any question, this Parliament has a mandate to deal with the question of Home Rule, which has been discussed throughout the country in every possible way. I have been a long time in public life, and I have never known a public measure so fully discussed. At least in Liberal speeches Home Rule has held a foremost place for six years. It is said this Bill has not been before the country, though its principles have been discussed in every shape and way. There is a new-fangled idea of a sort of referendum which is to be entrusted to your Lordships which is very rife just now. I should like to ask what has been the practice in the past? I should like to ask, of the great measures which have been passed within the last 50 years, in which of them has the actual Bill been laid before the country, and in regard to which of them you have claimed this right of referendum? Take the Corn Laws. If the Parliament which repealed the Corn Laws had any mandate it was to maintain them. It certainly had no mandate to repeal them; but at the bidding of a great Minister at a great crisis it did repeal them. Then, take the Reform Bill of 1867. The noble Marquess will remember the Ten Minutes Bill. Was there any mandate given to Mr. Disraeli to pass the Ten Minutes Bill?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Not the Ten Minutes Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I may have applied the wrong name. But, at all events, the Bill against which the noble Marquess protested so strongly had never been submitted to the country. What happened about the Disestablishment of the Irish Church? A general Resolution was passed in the House of Commons; no Bill was prepared or was submitted to the country. A majority in favour of Disestablishment was returned at the General Election, and my noble Friend (the Duke of Devonshire), who was a Member of the Government, must remember the pains that Government took and the length of time they employed in the preparation of the details of the Bill. That Bill was passed; you did not talk about the referendum then. Your Lordships did not say that the Bill had never been before the country; but you passed it, and one of its authors was the noble Duke. A few words as to our experience in this matter of giving wide self-government. After we had brought a few of our Colonies to the verge of rebellion we gave them self-government. What has been the result? The effect has been to bind them more and more closely to the Mother Country. Look at Australasia, look at the Cape, look at Canada. Canada is a complete parallel to the case of Ireland. There you have two races and creeds; there you had open rebellion. You tried coercion, and failed. You proposed self-government, and it was denounced vigorously by many men in this House and in the country. They said it would produce all the evils which are prophesied with regard to the grant of Home Rule to Ireland. The prophecies failed, and the result has been to bind Canada to the Mother Country in the closest bonds. There may be a few scattered individuals in the country who still dream of annexation to the United States; but when they want to get a Leader they cannot find him in Canada, but they have to go to a distinguished member of the University of Oxford. I turn now to some points in the Bill to which allusion has been made. In the first place, we are told that the manner in which we have provided for the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in this Bill is inadequate. Lord Playfair answered that argument, and showed that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is amply secured. No one values the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament more highly than I do, but, as a matter of fact, the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament needs no protection. The supremacy of the Imperial Parliament cannot be touched. The Parliament of to-day cannot bind the Parliament that succeeds it. The Session of Parliament of 1893 cannot bind the Session of Parliament of 1894. We asserted that supremacy in the Preamble. But it was well to accept also the proposal of Sir Henry James. A cardinal point of our policy is the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Lord Castletown, in his speech to-night, used the expression "The supremacy of Great Britain." But what we are concerned with now is not the supremacy of Great Britain, but the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and we contend that we have protected it as much as possible. Lord Camperdown asserted that my noble Friend Lord Spencer had changed his opinion on the question of land legislation. But I should like to point out that Lord Spencer held a strong opinion in 1886 that land legislation should accompany the grant of Home Rule. But he pointed out yesterday that, in his judgment, the legislation which had taken place since 1886 with regard to the land had rendered it unnecessary to deal with that subject now, and therefore that the point upon which he had insisted in 1886 was not now a cardinal point. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Ashbourne) fell foul of the Schedule and accused the Government of gerrymandering.

LORD ASHBOURNE: The charge was made against Mr. Morley in the other House that a figure had been selected which would produce results which were unfair to the Unionists.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: That is just it. Your opponents are either knaves or fools. If you do not like to call us fools, you call us knaves. It does not matter to us, but I do not think it does you any good. Now, there is another point, in respect to which I would say a few words — that is, the position of the Members who will remain in our House of Commons. The Bill of 1886 proposed the exclusion of the Irish Members. We now propose their retention; but that is not one of the new points in the Bill, because it was known to the country long ago. You objected to the removal of the Irish Members in 1886; in 1893 you object to their retention. We are told that, in future, the British Government will be at the mercy of the Irish Members. The Irishmen are there now, and all we are proposing to do is to reduce their numbers. Before now Governments have been put in power, and kept in power, by the votes of Irish Members. We are not aggravating the situation; on the contrary, we are doing the opposite by diminishing the power of Irishmen in the House of Commons. The noble Viscount opposite spoke, as he always does, with courtesy and moderation upon the subject of the sum for the cost of collection and the contribution towards the Irish Constabulary, and he said that that was an enormous charge to impose upon the English people. But the noble Viscount forgot that both liabilities are temporary. The charge for the Constabulary will be a diminishing charge, and the charge for the collection of Revenue is limited under this Bill to six years. I doubt whether my noble Friend will find, when he goes on the stump this Autumn, that he will stir up such very great indignation among the British people by denouncing this contribution in aid of the new Irish system in its inception. I believe that the British people have made up their minds that they will give self-government to Ireland fully, and I believe them to be just enough and generous enough to see that you cannot set up this new Government without making a temporary provision for its immediate needs. We have heard a great deal of strong language as to the manner in which the Closure has been applied in the House of Commons. I do not want to discuss the proceedings in that House; but when I am told that a Bill so passed through the House of Commons can never be accepted by your Lordships, I cannot help asking who taught us to take that course? It was yourselves. You passed the Crimes Act in that way, and it seems that a system which is legitimate to confiscate the constitutional rights of the Irish people is not legitimate to enlarge them. With regard to what fell from the Duke of Devonshire as to local self-government, I am as anxious as any man can be that local self-government should be extended in Ireland; but if you extend it without granting general self-government you will not satisfy the people, and you will ruin local self-government, because you will make every County Council a scene for political discussion. I might have said much on other matters, but you have left me very little time. My Lords, the result of this Debate is a foregone conclusion. Those who lead the serried ranks that we have seen earlier in the evening have told the world long ago what is to be the fate of this Bill in this House. The unwonted faces that have shown themselves on the Benches opposite tell the story of Friday night. It would be hypocrisy in me to make those appeals to your Lordships to pass this Bill which are often heard on occasions like this. You made up your minds what you would do with it before you knew what it was. And, therefore, I will content myself with saying that if on this occasion you frustrate the will of the people, and refuse the just claims of Ireland to the management of her own affairs, it will not be that will or those claims that will be in the end overthrown, but it will be rather the rash and fatal counsels which dictate the rejection of this Bill which will at last be brought to nought.

Further Debate adjourned till Tomorrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 6th September 1893.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.
The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—
Whereupon Mr. Mellor, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table, and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Order.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY,—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said, that he did not intend to move a reduction of the Home Secretary's salary, but he wished to ask a few questions. In the first instance, he desired some additional information with regard to the appointment of 15 new Assistant Inspectors of Factories, including two lady Inspectors. He assumed that the new men were to act as the spies, so to speak, of the Factory Inspectors; to be their eyes and ears; to go about the factories and workshops collecting evidence. He thought that was a very right thing to do to supplement the present administration of the Factory Acts; but, of course, any Minister who increased the Factory Inspectors by so large a number as 15 was bound to give an explanation, and to show that this new staff was created for the purpose of genuinely improving the administration of the Act. Especially was this necessary in cases of appointments carrying small salaries. He did not suggest that these appointments had been made for the purpose of rewarding political services in the country, but with the view to enabling the Home Secretary to further satisfy the public mind on the subject he invited him to make a further explanation. He also wished to ask whether these new additional Inspectors were subject to the ordinary Civil Service rule, that persons in that position were forbidden to take part in political agitation. This was a requirement particularly necessary in the case of those officers. They had to exercise extraordinary statutory powers, and according to the way in which they exercised those powers so did they gain local confidence. He would be glad to know whether the Committee could, by the presentation of a Return to the House or otherwise, be informed as to the qualifications and the examinations, if any, of this new class of Inspectors' assistants. The House might remember that the conditions of the examination of the old staff were altered by the late Home Secretary in a direction he thought they would all agree was very much for the better. It used to be the fashion to require that a Factory Inspector should show some form of literary qualification, such as was required from all the other branches of the Civil servants; but the late Home Secretary conceived that it was much more important that they should be examined in the history and growth of the enactments they had to administer. He hoped some such knowledge was required of these new assistants, and that these appointments were not merely conferred upon candidates on the sole ground that they belonged to what was commonly known as the industrial and wage-earning classes. It was quite right that candidates should, when they had shown themselves to be otherwise qualified, be appointed as much as possible from the working class, and a large number of appointments were made by the late Home Secretary from that class. With regard to Mines Inspectors, he observed that during the last Parliament, in the Debates on the Estimates for the Home Office, many complaints were made that the staff of Mines Inspectors was totally inadequate for the work they had to do. But there was no increase proposed in the present year. He did not say there ought to be an increase, but he thought, considering the amount of criticism, which sometimes pretty nearly amounted to abuse, the House should have its attention drawn to the fact that although a full year had elapsed, during which there had been complete opportunity of reviewing the situation, no increase in the Mines Inspectors had been proposed. With regard to the financial consideration, a few increases would not come within dangerous distance of changing the balance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would be observed that the sub-head also included Inspectors in metalliferous mines. One of the subjects which used to be pressed upon the attention of the late Government was the amendment of the present Act regulating these mines. There were many sources of danger in that dangerous industry which might possibly be relieved by legislation, and he would be glad if the Home Secretary had it in his contemplation to introduce legislation on that subject. Another subject that came under these sub-heads was the question of retreats for inebriates. The late Home Secretary appointed a strong Departmental Committee to consider whether the present law might be altered, and they made a Report which indicated several material improvements which might be made in the present system. That Report had been shown to be the germ of a great deal of work which might possibly be done to great advantage. He would be glad to know that the Home Secretary was able to make any promise as to initiating legislation in the future. He was afraid that most of the recommendations of the Departmental Committee were things which could not be carried into effect without legislation. Therefore, the House would be very interested to know whether the Home Secretary, as a Minister, would recommend legislation to that House.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) said, he desired to call attention to the want of action of the Home Secretary in connection with the tithe riots which had recently occurred in Cardiganshire, South Wales. Within the last year there had been very serious disturbances indeed in the neighbourhood of Cardiganshire, owing to the refusal of the people to pay tithes and the fact that the County Council did not send a sufficient police force to protect the bailiff when he attempted to execute the order for the tithes. Over 100 of these orders were unexecuted in the neighbourhood of Cardiganshire, with the result that the tithe owners had to a certain extent been deprived of their income. Those people who refused to pay tithes were small freeholders, and, therefore, were not affected by the late Act, which transferred the payment of tithes from the owners to the occupiers. On May 5th the bailiff set out to collect the tithes in Cardiganshire. He had only a protection of four policemen, accompanied by a member of the County Council, to persuade the people to pay the tithes; but as that gentleman was a member of the Anti-tithe Committee for the district, his efforts in that direction were not successful. A crowd of about a hundred people collected, and the bailiff was severely handled by them. He (Mr. Griffith-Boscawen) brought the matter before the House by asking questions of the Home Secretary, and he was bound to admit that the right hon. Gentleman had taken a certain amount of action with satisfaction. The right hon. Gentleman ordered the Public Prosecutor to prosecute a man named Thomas for the brutal assault on the bailiff, and Thomas was convicted and got three months' imprisonment. But what he had to complain of was that the Home Secretary had taken no steps to provide against a recurrence of the disorder, or to provide for the carrying out of the law in the future. In fact, when he asked the Home Secretary to recommend to the Chief Constable that a sufficient force of police should be available for the protection of the bailiff in the future, the right hon. Gentleman refused to do it, and said that he had confidence in the Chief Constable. He would venture to ask the Home Secretary how he was able to say that he had confidence in the Chief Constable. The predecessor of the present Chief Constable had been dismissed without a pension simply because he gave adequate protection to the tithe bailiff, and as to the present officer he knew that if he took action his situation would not be worth a day's purchase. In face of these facts it was absurd to say that there were any grounds for confidence in the Chief Constable under the local circumstances. After the trial of Thomas, he (Mr. Griffith-Boscawen) questioned the Home Secretary as to whether he would take steps to warn the Joint Standing Committee, who had control of the police arrangements, that a sufficient police force should be provided in the future. The Home Secretary did write to the Chief Constable, but the Chief Constable thought so little of the letter that he never referred to it in his Report to the Joint Standing Committee, and only mentioned the fact when he was asked about it by the Chairman of Quarter Sessions. On the strength of the letter, the Chairman of Quarter Sessions proceeded to move two resolutions. The resolutions were intended to carry out the suggestions made by the Home Secretary in his letter. But the Joint Standing Committee simply treated the Home Office with contempt. They rejected those two resolutions, and left in force a previous instruction to the Chief Constable that he was never to send more than two or three constables with the bailiff and a County Councillor to persuade the people to pay tithes. The majority against the resolutions were entirely County Councillors, and two of them, he contended, had no moral right to vote, being members of the Anti-tithe Committee, and, therefore, interested parties. After the resolutions in favour of the enforcement of the letter of the Home Secretary had been rejected by the Joint Standing Committee, he again asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he intended to take any strong action to compel the observance of the law. He believed that the Home Secretary had done absolutely nothing, so that at the present time they had the Local Authorities in league with the law-breakers, and the Home Office looking on with indifference. Cardiganshire was truly a disturbed district. There was, in fact, in the district as much disorder as had arisen in many parts of Ireland during the recent land agitation. The feeling in the district was indicated by the fact that a Welsh Liberal newspaper had started a public subscription for Thomas, who had committed a brutal assault on a bailiff. Whether the people objected or not to the payment of tithes, so long as it was the law of the land the Executive Government was bound to see that the collection of tithes was carried out without disturbance. He, therefore, moved the reduction of the Home Secretary's salary by £200.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £200."—(Mr. Griffith-Boscawen.)

*MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid.) said, he had some personal information as to what had taken place with reference to the collection of the tithes in the parish of Penbryn. This was not a "disturbed district." Notwithstanding the strong feeling which prevailed amongst the people against the payment of tithes in the locality, there had only been one criminal prosecution for a serious assault upon a bailiff. The hon. Member for Tunbridge—whose qualifications for taking this matter in hand he was at a loss to understand—had called this a very brutal assault. He thought the Committee ought to be informed that the bailiff first of all took proceedings before the Justices against a man named Thomas for doing him grievous bodily harm, and also for unlawful wounding. The Magistrates dismissed the charge. They came to the conclusion—and there was no doubt of it from the evidence of the medical men—that not even a rupture of the skin had taken place from this “brutal assault.” However, the authorities determined to prosecute at the Assizes, with the result that a verdict was given against Thomas for a common assault, not for doing the bailiff grievous bodily harm, and not for unlawful wounding, and he was sentenced to a term of three months’ imprisonment. He had heard some complaints made by the bailiff in the County Courts. The bailiff, according to the evidence in these cases, took a very high-handed course, and took a very high view of his authority. When distraining for the purpose of compelling the payment of tithes the bailiff thought he had a right to go over hedges, break down fences, and go over locked gates, and that he had a right to go upon premises by any means he chose; but the opinion of the Law Officers had been given to the effect that he had no such right at all. What the tithe bailiff said, practically, was this—that when he attempted to go over fences the farmers or their friends took up a position on the top of the fence, that he pushed against them, and then he exclaimed, “You see these cruel men; I knocked up against them, and they assault me.” He had in some cases heard the bailiff give evidence of this description. The bailiff thought he had a right to get in to a farm over a gate. There were people inside the gate on freehold premises. The bailiff put his foot on one of the bars of the gate, and thereupon his foot came into contact with the knee of somebody on the other side. He at once took proceedings in the County Court, and said, “I am assaulted in the execution of my duty.” The fact of the matter was, police protection was not required for the bailiff at all. The Chief Constable, a man of admirable tact and judgment, was of that opinion. The County Council who had appointed him thought it was better in the regulation of the district and for the peaceful carrying out of legal process that there should not be a big police force. He knew what the hon. Member opposite would like. If the Home Secretary acceded to the request of the hon. Gentleman, and ordered down a large force of police, the hon. Gentleman would then like a military force sent into the district. He thought the fact that during the last two years there had only been one serious case of assault—which it required the lively imagination of the hon. Member to describe as a “brutal assault”—was proof that no further protection was needed for tithe bailiffs. It was not a disturbed district. There had, no doubt, been prosecutions for unlawful assembly. But although the prosecutions were before the Magistrates, and the Chairman was a clergyman and a tithe-owner, though a man highly respected in the district, the Bench did not think fit to commit any of the defendants on the charge of unlawful assembly. He ventured to tell the Home Secretary that his action in this matter was the right action to take. The County Council were fully alive to the state of things. There was no serious disturbance, and he hoped the Home Office would not undertake, without due necessity, to interfere with the Local Authorities in respect of this matter. The effect of sending a large military force would be, in the first place, to say to the County Council what the Home Office had no right to say—they were neglecting their duty; and, in the next place, it would be a further incitement to the people; and, in the third place, they would be using the forces of the Crown to collect tithes for the tithe-owners in that district. That was not what was required. As soon as it appeared that it was necessary to have a large force to protect the bailiff he dared say the requisite force would be given, but he had shown that a larger force was not necessary at present, and, if sent, might even create disturbances which did not now exist.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): This discussion is carried on on lines which range over fields very widely apart, and I would point out to the Committee at once the small area that is really covered by the Vote. As to the Motion now before the Committee, the hon. Member has moved to reduce my salary owing to some act which he disapproves of on the part of the Joint Standing Committee of Cardiganshire. What the hon. Member has succeeded in doing is to point out—unconsciously, but very effectively—the defects of the legislation of the late Government on this very question. The Tithes Act was passed, as we all know, to settle this question two or three years ago. Power is given by the Act to the County Courts to enforce the payment of tithes. When I entered Office I received complaints from Cardiganshire that a large number of these orders remained unexecuted. I thereupon took the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to what right the bailiff had to call upon the police to assist him in the execution of these orders. The Law Officers gave me a very clear opinion on the point. They say that under the legislation passed two or three years ago a bailiff, in executing a County Court Order on the premises of a freeholder, was in no better position than a bailiff levying a distress for rent due to a landlord at Common Law. The law is perfectly clear on that point. A bailiff levying a distress for rent may not make a forcible entry on the premises in respect of which the rent is due. The police are not bound to render him any assistance whatever in making such an entry. The police are bound only to protect the bailiff from breaches of the peace or bodily harm. Under these circumstances, I gave advice, which, if it had been acted upon, I have reason to think that, though probably a number of the Orders would remain unexecuted, there need have been no trouble. Whether the bailiff was acting lawfully or not on the occasion to which the hon. Gentleman referred I will not undertake to say; but he was undoubtedly assaulted by the crowd. It was the only case of assault brought to my knowledge. I ordered a prosecution at the public expense, and the man was sentenced by the Judge to three months' hard labour. I also wrote to the Chief Constable pointing out that, in my opinion, a sufficient force of police ought to have been sent to protect the bailiff from actual harm. I said that there had been a neglect of duty, and that I hoped it would not occur again. The Chief Constable wrote me a most becoming and sensible letter. He said he had been taken by surprise, that he did not anticipate that there would have been such a crowd, and he undertook that it would not occur again. What more could I do? The hon. Gentleman has complained of the Joint Standing Committee, from whom the Chief Constable has to take his orders as to the service of the police. The hon. Gentleman has advanced the novel theory that some Members of the Joint Standing Committee should be suspended from voting, because they are Members of the Anti-Tithe Committee. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and if Members of the Joint Standing Committee are to be disabled from the performance of their statutory duties because they are members of Political Bodies outside, the administration of the police in England would soon be paralysed. If I find the Joint Standing Committee neglecting to discharge the duties laid upon them by Statute in handling the Police Force in such a way as to endanger the maintenance of law and order, I shall not hesitate to bring the matter under their notice; and when the time came for giving the certificate of efficiency, I should consider whether I was bound to give such a certificate. I have maintained a perfectly impartial attitude in this matter. Up to this moment I have no reason to doubt that the Police Force are being properly used; and if they should at any time be improperly used, I shall not hesitate to take such steps as the law enables me to take in the matter.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, the Home Secretary's salary was a legitimate opportunity afforded to the House of Commons of criticising his administration. The real importance of this matter lay in the fact that, by the course of action which the Home Office had permitted, a serious blow had been struck at the power and dignity of one of the constituted tribunals of the country—namely, the County Court. The Tithe Act made the County Court in Wales responsible for the collection of the tithes proved to be justly due, and the bailiff of the Court in this case, in endeavouring to carry out its judgments, had been grossly assaulted by mobs and prevented from performing his duty. It was a mistake to say that the bailiff had been assaulted only once. He had been seriously assaulted over and over again, and what he and his hon. Friends contended was, that the Local Authorities and the Home Secretary had failed to see that the bailiff, who was an official of a legally-constituted Court, was properly protected in the performance of his legal duty. If the titheowner obtained a judgment from the proper Court that he was entitled to certain tithes, surely he had a right to the payment of those tithes, and it was the duty of the authorities to see that the judgment of the Court was properly executed and the law carried out. In this respect, however, there had been culpable neglect in the case in question, and the result of the attitude which the Home Secretary had taken in the matter had been, most unfairly, to make the just and legal collection of tithes in Cardiganshire increasingly difficult. The right hon. Gentleman was usually very rigid in his view of Ministerial responsibility and the enforcement of the law, but in this particular case he seemed to have thrown in his lot with the law-breakers. He very much regretted the attitude which the Home Secretary had taken up, and under the circumstances he hoped his hon. Friend would press his Amendment to a Division.

MR. W. REES DAVIES (Pembrokeshire) said, he had been repeatedly assured by the Chief Constable of Pembrokeshire that a small police force was more effective than a large force in effecting tithe distraints. The noble Lord opposite was entirely mistaken in supposing that the task of the bailiff would be made easier if a dozen or 20 or 100 policemen accompanied him. The resistance was simply made as a protest against tithe altogether; and, in his opinion, the Nonconformists of Wales were fully justified in a Constitutional agitation against it. He could assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that they were entirely mistaken if they supposed that they would silence the agitation by the means suggested. A case had now been stated for the opinion of the High Court as to the bailiff's right to cross over hedges and gates in effecting tithe distraints, and it was well-known that the people in resisting this were acting in accordance with the opinion given by the Law Officers of the Crown. Of course, the bailiff, in the action which he had taken, had been bolstered up by the clerical party in Wales; but he entreated the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to pay no heed to the noble Lord or to the hon. Gentleman, who were entirely misinformed as to the facts, but to leave the matter entirely in the discretion of the Chief Constable, who was responsible for law and order, and who had the full support, in the course which he had adopted, of the representatives of the ratepayers on the County Council. An increased police force would mean an increase in the rates, and would increase, if possible, the hostility to tithes.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY admitted that much of what the Home Secretary had said justified him in the course he had taken. It was perfectly true that he had the power of refusing a certificate of efficiency, and thereby his Ministerial connection with the action of the police force was technically established. He agreed that it was only in an extreme case that he would be justified in refusing that certificate, but the policy of moral suasion by means of a small police force did not cover cases of intimidation that did not proceed to actual assault. The Home Secretary must know that the system existed in Wales of collecting crowds and causing them to observe an attitude so menacing that the commission of actual violence was rendered unnecessary. Cases of that kind required police protection. He protested against the doctrine laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, that what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander in this matter. Those, on the one hand, to whom the right hon. Gentleman alluded were maintaining the existing law as to tithe distraint, and neither advised nor instructed the Chief Constable to do anything in excess of that law; whereas, on the other hand, it was notorious that the object of members of the Anti-Tithe League was to abolish tithes, and with that end in view their policy was to paralyse the law by sanctioning a series of acts that were on the border line between legality and illegality.

MR. MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow) said that in Cardiganshire the Chairman of Quarter Sessions resigned because his ruling with respect to the authority of the Joint Committee over the Chief Constable was outvoted by a majority of Liberal Magistrates, who had made an expoliceman, supposed to sympathise with the anti-tithe movement, Chief Constable, in the place of one who had carried out the law, who was dismissed. It was not an ecclesiastical question at all, as in Cardiganshire only 25 per cent. of the tithes were paid to the clergy, the rest being paid to lay impropriators.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I should like, Sir, to make a few remarks on the question of tithes.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the only question before the Committee was the action of the Home Secretary, and that it would not be in Order to discuss the general question of tithes.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I will keep entirely to that question. What I want to do is to urge some reasons why the Home Secretary should use all the power which he possesses to secure the due administration of the law in reference to the collection of tithes, and I want to point out that this is not, as it is sometimes treated, entirely or even principally a question of ecclesiastical distinctions. It is perfectly true that the ground given for the refusal to pay tithes is the religious scruple on the part of the tithe-payers to contribute in any way to a Church with which they do not agree. So far as that goes, I, of course, have very considerable sympathy with the objectors. That was the principle on which the Quakers or Society of Friends resisted the payment of Church rates. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN said, the right hon. Gentleman must confine himself more closely to the question before the Committee. It was a much smaller question than the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I must emphasise what I say. I must point out that this is a national question, which goes very much beyond the narrow question of disputes between religious bodies. [Cries of "Order!"] I am perfectly in Order. I am directing myself to showing the importance of the Home Secretary, who is not concerned in these disputes, taking proper measures to secure the payment of tithes. Whatever sympathies one might have with those who object to pay tithes from conscientious scruples, we all know that other influences are brought to work, and, although those scruples are to be respected, it must be borne in mind that, whether tithes are paid to the Church or to a sect, in any case the contention of those who are opposed to a State Church is that tithes are a national fund. If, as is contended by a great number of hon. Members who are supporters of the Government, the tithe is a national fund, it behoves the Government to take care that the corpus of that fund is not destroyed. ["No, no!"] If hon. Members will not be quite so impatient I shall not occupy many moments. If this fund is a national fund, what we have to do is to preserve the corpus of the fund. As to the destination of the fund, that is a totally different question, and we may hold different opinions on that point. Some may desire to see it appropriated to purely national purposes, others to the National Church. But, whatever opinion we hold on that matter, it is of the first importance that the fund itself should be preserved intact. The persons who are now tithepayers are pledged to this burden, and it is the State they rob, and not the Church, when they refuse to pay the tithe. Under these circumstances, whether they agree with those in favour of Disestablishment or not, it is the duty of the Government to maintain the law and see that this fund is not destroyed. Well, Sir, the fund is being destroyed. How is it possible this fund can remain intact or be protected when it is well known that the sympathy of those locally called upon to administer the law is against the payments, and when they practically gave instructions to the Chief Constable to be lax in his duties. ["No, no!"] We know perfectly well what happened. We know how the Chief Constable appointed before the agitation was forced to resign his position, and a mere creature of the majority who compose this Committee appointed in his place. This Chief Constable has not taken the steps which anyone in his position, acting impartially, would have taken, and the result is that, in my opinion, this fund from tithes in Wales is seriously endangered. I think it is a case in which the Home Secretary ought to exercise the fullest powers in his possession. [Mr. ASQUITH: What are they ?] They are to refuse the certificate of the Chief Constable, and it is perfectly certain—I do not think it would be necessary to go to that extent—that if he showed he was prepared to exercise that power we should see a very great difference in regard to the administration of the law. But because it is known he will not exercise that power—and he has practically expressed in this House that under no circumstances will he exercise that power——

*MR. ASQUITH: I said the exact opposite.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Then I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon. I was misinformed. If that is the case, and if he is prepared to withhold the certificate from the Chief Constable, I have no complaint to make of him. But when I suggested he should do that he tossed his head and gave an ironical cheer. Therefore, I did not understand what his exact position is. If he is prepared to withdraw the certificate if this action, or rather inaction, on the part of the Chief Constable continues, then I am perfectly certain that the Chief Constable, and those who are his legal masters, will be better advised in the future than they have been in the past.

*MR. ASQUITH: I very much regret that my right hon. Friend should not have taken the trouble to be present at this Debate if he intended to take part in it, as on the matters as to which he has attacked me and the Government he has obviously been misinformed. At least, we are entitled to expect from my right hon. Friend that proper and orderly conduct which is generally practised in this House in regard to its Debates, and by which it is understood that right hon. Gentlemen should not take part in them unless they are prepared to take the trouble of ascertaining what has passed. My right hon. Friend gave us a disquisition as to the value of maintaining the corpus of a national fund, which was interesting, no doubt, as an expression of his opinion, but which, I venture to think, was totally irrelevant to the question. The sole question before the Committee is whether I, in the character of Home Secretary, have done something I ought not to have done, or have omitted something I might and ought to have done, in relation to this particular case. My right hon. Friend does not know what I have done, or what I have omitted to do, and yet he comes down here prepared to join in an attack on the Government, and, I suppose, vote for the reduction of my salary. I think that shows an impulsiveness on the part of my right hon. Friend to think evil of his political antagonists that, I confess, I did not give him credit for. I have already explained my action to the Committee. I must point out again that I took the opinion of the Law Officers as to the duties and powers of the officers of the law in this matter. They advised that the bailiff had no power to make a forcible entry. I communicated that to both the bailiff and the Chief Constable, but, at the same time, I expressed my opinion—I had no direct power over the Chief Constable—that it was the duty of the Chief Constable and police to protect the bailiff against assault and breaches of the peace. Well, Sir, what more does the right hon. Gentleman think I should do? He says I ought to have done something I have not done. What more could I have done? So far as I am aware, no one who applies a rational and unprejudiced mind to the consideration of the question, and who knows what the duties and responsibilities of the Home Secretary are in relation to the management of the local police, can say there is anything in this matter I could effectively do which I have not done.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend has referred to my remissness in my Parliamentary duty, but I do not find my absence from the House for a very brief period has in the slightest degree interfered with my accurate knowledge of what had taken place during my absence. The right hon. Gentleman asks me what he could have done and what he has omitted to do? I thought I had told him, but I will repeat it. In the first place, let us see what happened here. I am perfectly aware that the bailiff would have been going beyond his legal powers in endeavouring to make a forcible entry. But he was entitled to the protection of the constables, and I understand, on a review of the whole circumstances, my right hon. Friend communicated to the Chief Constable his opinion that this man had been insufficiently protected—[MR. ASQUITH: On one occasion]—and that, as a matter of fact, in consequence he was brutally assaulted. ["No, no!"] He was not, says an hon. Member from Wales, but at all events, a Crown prosecution was instituted by the Home Secretary and one of the bailiff's assailants got three months' imprisonment, which I do not suppose was a bit more than his deserts. That is the state of the case. I admit the Home Secretary did all he could do at that moment. He warned the Chief Constable that in future he ought to give greater protection than he had done, and that in consequence of not having given sufficient protection personal injury had been done towards this man. I want to know what the right hon. Gentleman has done, and what he is prepared to do in future, to see that his recommendation is accepted? because we have reason to believe that the Chief Constable treats the opinion of the Home Secretary with perfect contempt, and that, secured in his position by the Joint Committee by which he is appointed, he is prepared in the future as in the past to withhold sufficient protection from the persons who are engaged in the collection of tithes. That is the position, and I want to know if there is another assault on the bailiff, and the right hon. Gentleman again employs State money in order to carry out a Crown prosecution, what is he going to do with the Chief Constable? Will he withhold his certificate? If he says he will, then I shall be perfectly satisfied.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I should like to make one observation, and that is with respect to the authority and power of the Home Secretary over the local police. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham knows something about local administration. I should like to know what they would say in Birmingham if the Home Secretary were to communicate with the Chief Constable in Birmingham and tell him if he obeyed the orders of the Watch Committee and not the orders of the Home Secretary he would withhold his certificate? I think I know very well what the Watch Committee would say on that subject. But really I do not think it necessary to enter into further argument on the subject with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, because last night he informed us that he is prepared to vote against any Supply being granted to the Government.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I rise to a point of Order, Mr. Mellor. Is the right hon. Gentleman justified in going into matters which occurred at previous Sittings?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am not going to refer to it—

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I ask for your answer, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is quite in Order.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Gentleman opposite will, perhaps, not be so precipitate in future. But, Sir, I was going to say that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has adopted the principle of refusing all Supplies to Her Majesty's Government because he does not think them entitled to have any, really he might spare the House the trouble of listening to any other reasons for his votes, because the principles on which he acts are thoroughly well understood.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN remarked that the Home Secretary appeared to be under the misapprehension that the bailiff was engaged at the time he was assaulted in making a forcible entry. That was not the case, because the man was assaulted in his carriage before he had time to get out. The Home Secretary said he was only assaulted on one occasion, but the bailiff said he was assaulted on five occasions. Why had he not been assaulted recently? Because of the intimidation and neglect to send a sufficient force there had been no attempt to collect the tithes, and that would be the mode of proceeding in future. He believed the majority of those elected to the Joint Committee by the County Council were members of, or interested in, Anti-Tithe Leagues, whose ostensible and avowed object was to prevent the payment of tithes, and who, therefore, connived at law-breaking in order to accomplish their object.

THE CHAIRMAN (interposing): The Home Secretary is not responsible for that. He is only responsible in the matter so far as he himself indicated—namely, in the advice he gave.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN said, he thought it was a matter of some importance what advice the right hon. Gentleman gave to a County Council so constituted, and he contended there was ample ground for refusing the Chief Constable's certificate.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 46 ; Noes 135.—(Division List, No. 295.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, North-wich) desired to know if the Factory Inspectors' assistants, who had been recently appointed, were under the same regulations as their superior officers, and one of whose rules required that they should not disclose trade secrets? The Factory Inspectors were men who could be thoroughly trusted in this matter. He would not insinuate for a moment that the smaller literary acquirements on the part of the Inspectors' assistants rendered them any less worthy of confidence than their superiors, but he wanted the assurance that they were bound by the same rules.

*MR. ASQUITH : With reference to the Inspectors' Assistants, they, like the Inspectors, are strictly forbidden by their instructions to reveal trade secrets. The Inspectors' Assistants, who are 15 in number, were appointed mainly for the purpose of assisting in the inspection of workshops rather than of factories ; and the great object was to provide by a more efficient and vigilant system of supervision against the evils of sweating, which prevail so largely in the workshops of our great cities. The number at present appointed is, I hope, only the first instalment, because, of course, it is obviously impossible that this work should be carried on over the whole country by 15 men, and the 15 men appointed this present year are exclusively stationed in London and Glasgow, and there is one in Ireland. They are put under the superintendence of Mr. Lakeman, one of our most efficient Inspectors, who has a considerable acquaintance with the industrial conditions of the Metropolis, and who has almost done more than any public servant in the past to provide for protection from, and the abolition of, sweating. The object being to obtain quickwitted and practical men who can go about amongst workshops in an informal way and make themselves acquainted with what is going on, it appeared to me a very much lower standard of educational qualification was required in the case of these men than in the case of Her Majesty's Inspectors, and accordingly the scheme of examination they had to submit to is of an elementary kind. It comprises handwriting, spelling, and arithmetic, including fractions, and a general knowledge of the law relating to workshops as laid down in the Factory Act. Further, each candidate was required to write a simple report of a practical character on a given subject connected with workshops. By means of an examination of that simple kind, coupled, of course, with the testimonials I received from practical persons of the experience of each of these gentlemen, I believe I was able to select 15 thoroughly competent men. In future I intend still further to simplify the scheme of examination, as I am not satisfied that the particular requirements as to vulgar and decimal fractions may not possibly have excluded men, otherwise well-fitted for the purpose. I do not think you ought to make the literary part of the examination so important. We have carried the literary side of examinations for the public service to a ridiculous extent, particularly when dealing with men like Factory Inspectors—men as to whom what you really want is no doubt a certain kind of scientific equipment, but chiefly some practical knowledge and ability. I am strongly in favour, as far as possible, of reducing the literary side of the examination. They must be able to read and write and spell, and have sufficient facility of composition to be able to tell us in a simple, and perhaps homely, but intelligible way what they have seen. I do not think we ought to include much more than this in the examinations, and I think on this there will be a general agreement on both sides of the House. All these assistants are members of the Civil Service, and they will become entitled to pensions in the ordinary way and on the ordinary terms. As I pointed out to the hon. Member behind me, they will be forbidden to reveal trade secrets, and I need hardly add that the general rule of the Civil Service which forbids others to take an active part in political agitation will be rigidly enforced in the case of these men.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY : What is the age limit?

MR. ASQUITH : The age limit is between 21 and 38.

Mr. Griffith-Boscawen

*MR. M. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.) : Has the age not been extended to 40?

*MR. ASQUITH : Yes ; it has been extended to 40. I have received a report from Mr. Lakeman, who tells me that great good is being done, particularly in and around London, by their investigations. I was able some months ago to extend an order made by my predecessor, requiring certain trades to keep a list of out-workers—a very useful provision of the Factory Act. I have been able to extend that order to other branches of trade, and to take steps which, I believe, coupled with the appointment of these assistants, will prove very effective in putting down some of the worst forms of sweating. As the hon. Gentleman opposite probably knows, what the Act of Parliament enables the Home Secretary to do is to require the occupier of a factory or workshop to keep a list of all persons employed outside in carrying on his business. By first requiring the occupiers to keep these lists, then having them inspected by Her Majesty's Inspectors and sending the Assistants to visit the out-workers at the place of address given in the lists, we have been able to track to its home a great deal of the industrial sweating which now exists. I hope we may see a very considerable extension of these orders in the future. For the purpose of their being effectively carried out throughout the country, it will be absolutely necessary to increase the staff of Inspectors' Assistants; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer promises to give me the requisite sum, I hope to be able to make this increase in the course of the next year. As to salaries they begin with the very modest figure of £100, rising by increments of £5 to £150. That is a very small sum, and I should be glad if I could make it larger. But small as it is it has enabled me to secure thoroughly competent and efficient men for the purpose, and on the whole I can report very favourably on the progress of the experiment. In no sense is it a Party question, and I trust on both sides of the House there will be a disposition to further the extension of the system in the future.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) : I do not rise for the purpose of moving a reduction of the Secretary of State's salary, but I do so for the purpose of inviting him to make a statement to the Committee upon what I venture to think is an extremely important question, that is the progress which is being made by the Executive Department of the Home Office in carrying out the provisions of the Factory Act of 1891—firstly, with reference to noxious trades ; and, secondly, with reference to sweating. The right hon. Gentleman has already made some statement as to the policy and progress of the Home Office in reference to sweating ; but I should like to have some further and fuller statements made. Now, I was extremely pleased to hear the Home Secretary say, in a little speech he made a few minutes ago, that he regarded these questions as not being of a Party character ; and I hope, at least in this House, they may be discussed as questions which are not Party questions. But it is very much to be regretted that the admirable sentiment which the Home Secretary expressed in this House as to the non-Party character of these social questions should not be observed by him out-of-doors, because I notice that out-of-doors no one is more given to confer a Party character upon these social questions than the Home Secretary himself ; and this very speech, upon which I am inviting him to make some explanation to the House, affords an instance of it. In January last I read, with great interest, an excellent speech made by the Home Secretary at Liverpool to the National Union of Liberal Associations—an opportunity which a Leader of a Party might have made use of to point out the non-Party character of these questions. But, instead of that, I am bound to say I read with pain that the Home Secretary practically invited those whom he was addressing to recognise him as the Executive authority who was very earnestly endeavouring to carry out the Factory Act of 1891, and reflecting upon his predecessor in Office, who had made the Act, as he then stated, practically a dead letter. I am perfectly ready to give to the Home Secretary every credit for being perfectly sincere, and honest, and energetic in carrying out these Acts in the interest of the local population, and especially the poorest and most distressed parts of the local population ; but I think we have a right to expect that a person in his high position and with his great authority should give equal credit to his predecessor in Office, and I hope that hereafter he may give equal credit to his successor in Office. As to the exercise of powers under the Factory Act of 1891 with reference to noxious trades, the late Home Secretary was making inquiries with a view to putting the powers given by the Act into force, as no one knows better than the Home Secretary himself, although he did not tell his audience at Liverpool that that was the case. But, unfortunately, in January, 1892, the late Chief Inspector, Mr. Whympster—whilst he was at Manchester making inquiries into the manufacture of white lead, and preparing rules for that particular trade which is one of the most noxious and unhealthy carried on in the country—was seized with a serious illness which ultimately resulted in his death, and that was, no doubt, the reason why considerable delay had been occasioned in carrying out the provisions of the Act. But at Liverpool, in January last, the Home Secretary expressed his intention of acting in this matter with considerable vigour. I am informed that the whole matter as to the necessary rules in the white lead and chemical works was fully threshed out 12 months ago, and the only thing now wanting, and that has been wanting for some time, is action on the part of the Home Secretary. I am sorry to say that instead of giving that a Departmental Committee has been appointed—that universal refuge for persons who cannot make up their own minds, and who require some delay. That Departmental Committee has hung up all matters with regard to these works, and there is no expectation of any rules being made for an indefinite time to come. I hope the Home Secretary will be able to make some statement to the Committee which will show that within some reasonable time the powers given by the Act of 1891 will be really carried out—that rules will be made and promulgated, and that progress will be made in giving effect to such provision as Parliament made in 1891 for the protection of the workers in these particularly noxious and dangerous trades. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will agree with me that two years having now elapsed since the Act became law, it is high time that its provisions should be, at least in some trades, enforced. Of course, all progress in legislation and in administration of this kind must be of a rather experimental character, but when you find that so long a period as two years elapses from the passing of an Act before the experimental carrying out of that Act by the Executive Government, it is not unreasonable to ask for some explanation of the delay, and some assurance that that delay will come to a prompt conclusion. So much for obnoxious trades. I should like now to ask the Home Secretary to make some further statement about the action of the Executive Government in regard to sweaters. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman must regret having stated at Liverpool that nothing had been done by his predecessor. He stated here to-day that the late Home Secretary had issued an order for lists of out-workers to be given, and that the present Government had extended that order, but in Liverpool, when addressing his political partisans, he said that the credit due to the present Government was on account of its superior administration, and he instanced, as an example, the order for the lists of out-workers, making no reference whatever to the order made by his predecessor, leaving it to be inferred that the Act had been treated by his predecessor practically as a dead letter. Well, I want to ask how is sweating actually going to be suppressed? The issue of lists of out-workers will not suppress sweating in the East of London, in Glasgow, and in Ireland, to which places this action is confined. What I want to ask the Home Secretary is whether he sees his way to any large and comprehensive policy for really suppressing sweating? I must say I have long thought that however costly the central office in London may be, you will never be able through the action of a central office to suppress sweating all over the multifarious industries of this great country. You never can really reach the sweater until you devise some method of local inspection as distinguished from centralised and Imperial inspection. I do not at all wish to undervalue the inspection of the Central Authority in London. It is desirable and necessary; but if you really mean your law to be carried into execution you will have to enlist the sympathy and assistance of particular localities. You cannot carry your law into execution unless you have Local Authorities—controlled by the people of the localities—with you, with officers of their own, to see that the law is obeyed. I do not quarrel with the Inspectors the right hon. Gentleman has appointed. As an experiment, I have nothing whatever to say to the arrangement. I have nothing but praise for it; but these Inspectors are confined to the small area of London and Glasgow. They cannot exercise any sort of influence or power over the whole Kingdom, but as an experiment I must praise it—unless, indeed, the right hon. Gentleman should think praise from me an impertinence. I was very pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman say he had determined not to require literary attainments from the Inspectors. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that we have driven the demand for literary attainments, and especially for spelling, to an almost absurd extent. There is no reason why competent people should not serve the State, though they may not have acquired all the elements of a liberal education, and may not on all occasions be able to spell correctly. But what I want particularly to ask is whether the Government have any policy as to extending the system of inspection by making it in a sense local. If the right hon. Gentleman says, “We have no policy in regard to local inspection, and intend to restrict ourselves entirely to inspection from head quarters,” we shall know where we are. Those of us who think that local inspection is essential for putting down sweating will be able to endeavour to ventilate our opinions in the country and to get the country to press on the Government the necessity of taking proper steps in this matter. I do not know whether the present would be a convenient opportunity for saying anything about the Inspectors themselves. Perhaps not; I had better reserve my observations about the staff and the arrangements for inspection to a later period. My object now is to get the right hon. Gentleman to make a more extended statement as to the progress being made in carrying out the Act of 1891, especially in regard to obnoxious trades, and also to give a full account of the policy Her Majesty’s Government intend to pursue in regard to the suppression of sweating.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, that before any reply was given there were two subjects to which he desired briefly to call the attention of the Home Secretary. All these questions affecting factory legislation ought to be of great interest, especially to those who represented constituencies in which factories existed. There were two questions in which he took particular interest, and as to which he wished to have some information. In the first place he desired information with regard to the clause in the Factory Act of 1891 called the “particulars clause.” He believed it was the 24th clause. That clause came into existence by virtue of the demand made by the operatives. They asked that they should always have information as to the amount of wage they were entitled to receive, so that they might know how much at the end of the week or day they were entitled to obtain by way of recompense. It was very easy to make the demand, but it was very difficult to carry it out. It required great practical knowledge to know the exact amount of particulars which should be given to the operatives without the employé discovering the secrets of his trade. The late Home Secretary appointed one Inspector, a gentleman whom he was sure the present Home Secretary would agree was about the best fitted man that could be found for the post. He meant Mr. Birtwistle. This was the only Inspector employed, and he presumed that this gentleman’s task was an almost overwhelming one. He knew that inspection of the kind which was necessary under the clause he had named required peculiar practical knowledge and that inspectors like Mr. Birtwistle were not easy to find. But the Home Secretary had been good enough to give assistance to those who wished to extend the clause. He (Sir H. James) hoped that that clause would be extended not only to the particular trades or class of trade mentioned in Clause 24, but to almost every textile industry. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to appoint additional Chief Inspectors or sub-Inspectors for the purpose of seeing that these particulars were duly given. There was a great difficulty in selecting sub-Inspectors. The whole requisite was confidence. They could not send an Inspector into the factory hostile to the employer, and they, therefore, would have to find men who could almost act as judges between employer and employed. Then, with regard to the carrying out of the Cotton Clause of the Act of 1891, that Act was also founded on the demand made by the operatives, who complained, with the greatest possible reason, of the high temperature which existed in some cotton cloth factories. The temperature was taken for the purpose of sizing fabrics so as to put substance into shoddy materials, and the temperature was raised to such an extraordinary extent as to be dangerous to the health and very existence of the operatives. The disclosures made were perfectly frightful as to the effect in winter time on young men and women who had to pass into the cold air from the overheated sheds. He had received a great many communications in consequence of having had charge of the Bill, saying that there was a great deal yet to be done.

*MR. ASQUITH ; There is one Inspector to look into the subject the right hon. Gentleman refers to.

SIR H. JAMES : Yes, Mr. Osborne ; and I am aware of the ability and zeal he displays in carrying out the Act. Perhaps the Home Secretary, by the appointment of additional Sub-Inspectors, if necessary, would see that the provisions of that Act were fully carried out.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said that any legislation which would benefit the Lancashire operatives would receive the unanimous support of the Lancashire Members. As representing a manufacturing town in Lancashire himself, he could endorse what had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury. With regard to the Report of the Committee on Inebriates, which the hon. Member for Sheffield had alluded to, he hoped the Government would not let the matter sleep, but would remove the difficulties which now interfered with the fulfilment of the hopes of those who felt strongly on this question. He complained that the Shop Hours Act had been to a great extent a dead letter, owing to insufficiency of inspection. The Reports of the Inspectors of Workshops and Factories and the number of visits they had paid under the Act was sufficient justification for legislation. A great deal might be done by giving publicity to these Acts. He believed many Acts affecting the industrial life of the people remained totally unknown to many persons in whose interests they had been passed, and he was glad that the Government had taken some steps by means of the post offices to impart this information. They had arranged to distribute 30,000 notices in one case and 20,000 in another. When these notices were published and were read by the people in the post offices and the local newspapers there would be no room to complain that these Acts, at any rate, were unknown to those whom they affected. He observed that in France a most wholesome custom prevailed of publishing the Acts of Parliament passed for the benefit of the people with statements showing the benefit of the legislation. He did not know that in a country with a free Press like England it was desirable to adopt the French system, but the system was sound in itself, and he was glad to see that something approximating to it had been adopted by Her Majesty's Government in two instances. The next point to which he wished to refer was that of licences for overtime. The statements made by Inspectors on that subject were truly melancholy. In some instances persons of tender years were employed as improvers in clothing shops, and were kept at work 14 hours a day without wages. Could sweating assume a worse form ? These people in return for their labour were supposed to obtain skill in their trade, and the moment they became skilful and asked for wages they were discharged ; beginners, condemned to like labour, being taken in their places. He was glad that the Government were appointing women Inspectors, and he should be glad to know if they were considered by the Home Office to be a success. No doubt the advantages of their employment were clear and obvious ; but he felt some doubt whether women would be found to possess strength enough for their labours or to command sufficient technical knowledge in the exercise of their duties. With regard to the Reports of the Inspectors, they often had a very wide range. The Inspectors frequently went beyond their legitimate duty, dealing with the state of trade and questions of co-operation, technical education, and other subjects. Some years ago the Reports of the School Inspectors became discursive, and the attention of those officials was invited to the failing; a request being made that they should devote their attention rather to the schools than to the state of society generally. He did not wish to discourage general observations, but he did think that where complaints were made that Inspectors were insufficient in number it was probable that there would not be so much room for objection if in Reports attention were more confined to the subjects in hand.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, that they were now discussing the most important Labour Department of the Government, and he was sorry to find that not one of the Labour Members was present.

*SIR C. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): They are all at Belfast at the Trades Union Congress.

MR. HANBURY thought that the House of Commons was just as important as the Congress at Belfast. He urged that the Inspectors should not be taken from the matters with which they were specially competent to deal. To make Factory Inspectors deal with quarries was ridiculous. Such work ought to be done by the Inspectors of Mines. Some years ago the late Home Secretary issued a Circular against the practice of imposing heavy costs with small fines, but he was afraid that it was being disregarded. There was a tendency on the part of Magistrates' Clerks, who had, he believed, some pecuniary interest in the matter, to disregard the Circular.

MR. ASQUITH: Not as a rule.

MR. HANBURY said, that whether as a rule or not it was undoubtedly the fact, as one knew from one's own experience. In spite of the Government Circular, many Benchmen of Magistrates were glad to pile up heavy costs when the fine was only small. He had had during the past few weeks brought under his notice a case in which, where the fine was only 1d., the costs were 14s., and another case in which, where the fine was 5s., the costs were £2 2s.

*MR. M. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.) said, he hon. Member (Mr. Hanbury) had referred to the absence of the Labour Members; but he would remind the hon.

Member that there was at present holding its sittings in Belfast a Labour Parliament, not, perhaps, of a less important character than that honourable House. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to the disparity in the payment of Factory Inspectors. If quick-witted and intelligent workmen were needed as Inspectors they should be recompensed in the same degree as those appointed from another class. He thoroughly agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that some modification in the examination papers was necessary. Though they might appreciate a literary standard, still sound common sense and practical knowledge of the inner life of the workshop was far more desirable than mathematical problems in seeing that the provisions of the Workshops and Factory Acts were carried out. Then there was the question of female Inspectors. There had been only two female Inspectors appointed up to the present—one in London, and the other in Glasgow—although there were something like 100,000 female workers in the North of Ireland. Surely they were entitled to be looked after as much as female workers in Glasgow. He thought it necessary also to call attention to the want of Factory Inspectors in Ireland. There were only three such Inspectors at present in the country—two of them for the North, and one for the Midlands and South. In many portions of Ireland there were numerous small mills which were totally neglected as far as inspection was concerned; some months ago there was a deplorable accident in the South of Ireland owing to the want of inspection, the place not having been visited by an Inspector for years. He trusted that the Home Secretary would also take into consideration the desirability of recompensing the working men who were appointed as Inspectors in proportion to their ability.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, he wished to call attention to a subject of an entirely non-political character—namely, inspection under the Cruelty to Animals Act of the 39 and 40 Vict., popularly called the Vivisection Act. His reason for doing so was that there was a very large increase in the number of experiments which took place under the Act. This increase had made the outside public very anxious about the carrying out of the Act, and there was great eagerness to have the matter brought forward in order that in future the measure might be properly carried out. He had no intention or wish to enter upon the question of vivisection or anti-vivisection. His desire was to try to obtain the general support of the Committee. Anti-vivisectionists were very often accused of being sentimental; but he assured the Committee that there was a great deal more fact than sentiment at the bottom of their agitation. He was sure that no one could accuse the Home Secretary of being a sentimental man; but he (Colonel Lockwood) would be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would find some room for sentiment, of course subserviently to his official feelings. The United Kingdom bore a very high name for its humane treatment of animals; and this was, he believed, chiefly owing to the action of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Great Britain alone, of any country he was aware of, had interfered to prevent the needless infliction of cruelty on animals under the name of science. Previous to the passing of the Act he referred to, no person was allowed to ill-treat or torture any dumb animal, but that measure allowed the granting of licences and certificates both for painful and painless experiments. He wished to be guided in his remarks by the action of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. That Society was above suspicion on the question of accuracy of statement, and the evidence of its Secretary (Mr. Colam) before the Royal Commission on Vivisection was treated by the public with the greatest confidence. The Committee of the Society had called attention to the subject in their last two Reports, and had pointed out that the experimentation, which was 270 in 1881, grew to 2,661 in 1891, and to 3,960 in 1892. No one could accuse the Society of fanaticism on the subject of vivisection. Indeed, they had been found fault with by other Societies on the ground that they had not taken sufficient action on the question. The Committee reported in the following language:—

Colonel Lockwood

“ Even if the enormously-increased experimentation sanctioned by the late Home Secretary had been followed by satisfactory inspection it might be contended that the Act had been properly administered, though even then with a prodigality of experiments. Your Committee have year after year, for the last 12 years, called attention to the fact that the Returns made by the experimenters have, in some instances, been the only means on which Her Majesty's Inspectors have been enabled to make their Reports instead of by personally witnessing operations. A few may have been personally inspected, but the majority of the experiments are reported to the Inspectors by the very persons whom the Inspectors are appointed to inspect. In Section 13 of the Act it is provided that the Inspectors shall visit the places registered for experiments for the purpose of complying with the provisions of the Act. Seeing that the provisions of the Act refer to the mode of experimentation, it will be obvious that the Legislature intended personal inspection. On a careful study of the present Return it is evident that the imperfect inspection has not been intelligibly improved, and still consists mainly of an examination of Returns only; but they are also constrained to give expression to a sense of painful anxiety arising out of the present Return, which in 10 years shows the enormous increase of 1,000 per cent. in the number of experiments.”

He begged the Committee to remember that this was not the Report of an Anti-Vivisection Committee, but the Report of the dispassionate men who formed the Committee of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Under no other system of inspection would it be allowed that the very individuals whom it was desired to keep under inspection should make their Reports unchecked to the House. An Inspector of Mines did not report on the Reports furnished to him by the owners or the workers in the mines, nor would an Inspector of Factories report on the ipse dixit of the owners or representatives of factories. He asks that the inspection under this Act should be as thorough, searching, and effective as were the other inspections carried out by Government officials. The system of inspection under certificate was arrived at as the result of a series of compromises under the Act of 1876. He believed the public were too greatly influenced by the Reports of the great medical authorities who were in favour of vivisection; and they, therefore, refuse to abolish it altogether; but they believed that the well-authenticated stories of some of the cruelties inflicted on dumb animals were too true, and the result was that the Government determined to put a stop to the unlicensed practice of vivisection. By the passing of the Act it was proved that unnecessary cruelty had been practised on dumb animals. He did not wish to overstate his case. He believed that a good case had been greatly injured in the past by the use of statements which could not be proved, and he was extremely anxious to preserve as moderate a manner as he could under the circumstances. He might say, in passing, that he believed the British public, who were so humane in the treatment of animals, would see in time that vivisection was altogether anomalous, and would refuse to allow it to continue. The Government Inspectors were supposed to stand between the vivisectors and their subjects, the dumb animals, in order to insure what the Royal Commission declared to be the claims of the lower animals to humane consideration, vivisection being, in the opinion of the Commission, from its very nature, open to abuse. There were three Inspectors for the United Kingdom, one covering England as far North as Newcastle, one covering Scotland and England down to Newcastle, and the third covering Ireland. These gentlemen were not occupied solely and entirely with the inspection of the physiological laboratories, but had other work to do, and many of their statistics were obtained from hearsay. One medical gentleman went so far as to say that the whole inspection was an absolute farce. He (Colonel Lockwood) would not go so far as that, but he maintained that it was not sufficiently efficient. The first Inspector (Dr. Buss) showed his partiality by alluding to the agitation of the Anti-Vivisectionist Society as a senseless and mischievous one. That being so, he could hardly be called an impartial man on the subject. The next Inspector (Mr. Allison) was a well-known advocate of vivisection, and the present Inspector (Dr. Poore), who was, he believed, universally respected, held appointments at the University College Hospital, at which, in 1893, there were 16 vivisectionists at work. A gentleman who was constantly in association with 16 men engaged in the work of vivisection could hardly be regarded as perfectly impartial. The two British Inspectors had 69 places to visit in England and Scotland, and he maintained that it was impossible for them to do the work properly. According to the last Report, they paid rather more than two visits, on the average, to each of these laboratories in the course of a year. He knew that several visits were paid to certain laboratories, and therefore he presumed that some of the laboratories were not visited at all. He believed the Home Secretary preserved a very equal mind on the subject, and thought he might ask him that for the future it should be stated in the Returns whether all the laboratories were visited. He hoped also that in the future, if possible, the names of the operations should be given, as well as the dates, and that it would further be stated whether the operations were going on at the time of the Inspector's visit. Further, he should like to know whether the visits were all surprise visits? Some time ago the Home Secretary stated that some of the visits were surprise visits; but he (Colonel Lockwood) desired that they all should be surprise visits. At the present moment, except so far as it prevented people without certificates practising vivisection, the Act was fallacious and misleading. He confessed that he himself was much exercised in his mind to find what an enormous increase had taken place in the experiments. In 10 years the returns had risen from 42 men licensed, 20 practising, and 406 experiments in 1882, to 180 men licensed, 125 practising, 55 stating on their own authority that they did not practise, and 3,960 experiments in 1892. In 1891 the experiments numbered 12,661, so that was an increase of nearly 1,300 in 12 months. He maintained that the supervision, as at present carried out, was absolutely inefficient. He might be told that a great number of these experiments were inoculation experiments, and were painless. The Times newspaper, which had never been very favourable to anti-vivisectionists, however, made the following remarks in a leading article on Dr. Klein's investigations for the discovery of the bacillus:—

“On rabbits the the results of inoculation were ‘altogether nugatory.’ Twelve monkeys were inoculated, and 11 of them remained unaffected. The 12th became the subject of pneumonia, and was killed by chloroform as soon as its recovery seemed hopeless. The inflamed lung contained numerous influenza bacilli; but together with them were bacilli of another kind, and it was impossible to say which of them, if either, had produced the pneumonia. . . . So far, therefore, the only results of the investigation ordered by the Local Government Board are such as were foreseen. We have some statistics of very uncertain accuracy and of no particular applicability to the affairs of life. We have a bacillus previously discovered by others, and we are entitled to believe that it does not live long after having made its way into the current of the circulation. During the acute stage of influenza it is abundant in the living secretions, and it disappears as the disease subsides. Its characters are sufficiently distinctive, and it is not known in any other conditions. These results were hardly worth obtaining at the cost. We do not speak of the cost in money, which in all such matters might be properly disregarded by a wealthy nation. The real cost has been the skill and labour of trained observers, directed from worthy and useful purposes and applied in directions in which failure was a foregone conclusion."

This was an opinion which went to show that these experiments upon dumb animals were absolutely useless for the purpose for which they were undertaken. It was said that these experiments were beneficial. He believed that these experiments were not properly supervised, and that it was advisable and necessary that from time to time there should be a searching public examination into the working of the Act in order to guard against its abuse. At present the Act was carried out in a misleading and unsatisfactory manner, and that was unfortunate for the reason he had stated. He was occupying the House a little longer than he expected, but he was anxious to place the case before the Committee as clearly as possible, and hoped he should not go too far in asking the Home Secretary—not wishing to move a reduction, he left it for the present in his hands, and he wanted to ask him whether in future Inspectors under the Act could not be appointed by him in conjunction with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and the Anti-Vivisectionist Societies? He saw that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Asquith) smiled; perhaps he would rather be content with going direct to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals? He should also like to ask whether the character of the experiments could not be stated in future Reports, and also how many visits were paid by the Inspectors to each place; and, again, whether it could not be arranged that all the visits of the Inspectors should be surprise visits? He would also like to press upon the right hon. Gentleman that it was widely and strongly felt that the carrying out of painful experiments on dumb animals before bodies of students in order to demonstrate for their instruction facts already known was unnecessary cruelty and ought to be discontinued. He was grateful to the Committee for listening to him upon a subject in which he took the greatest interest, and which he believed was of the greatest interest to other Members, and to everybody who was satisfied that they are right in the position which they had taken up.

*MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) said, perhaps the Committee would allow him to occupy a few moments. He wished to draw the attention of the Home Secretary to the existing deficiency in the inspection of collieries, particularly in the South Wales district. He wished to see a larger number of Sub-Inspectors appointed, whose duty would be to go through the coal districts to see that the regulations of the Coal Mines Act were enforced. He found from the Report of Mr. Robson, the Inspector of the district, that there were no fewer than 366 mines in the South Wales district, and though it was one of the largest coal districts in the United Kingdom it had the smallest number of Inspectors attached to it. He did not make any complaint at all about the present Inspectors: they had too much work to do. The Chief Inspector had shown in his Report for 1892 that, while taking the average in all the coal districts of the United Kingdom there was only one fatal accident for every 816 persons employed, there was one such accident for every 506 persons employed in the South Wales district: and whereas there was only one death caused for every 676 persons employed on the average of the United Kingdom, there was one death for every 291 persons employed in South Wales; and he expressed the opinion that there was urgent necessity for the further adoption of measures calculated to increase the safety of the workmen, and that there should be a more stringent enforcement of the Rules and Regulations in order to lead to a diminution of accidents and loss of life. The number of inspections was altogether insufficient. In 1892 there were only 341 underground inspections, and this did not amount to one inspection per annum for each colliery in the district. In these circumstances, he hoped the Home Secretary would be able to see his way to appoint a large number of Sub-Inspectors, and that when he did so he would select experienced men for the work from among the workmen themselves. Many such men could be found of great practical experience, who would command the confidence of the workmen, and see that the Act was carried out. He hoped this matter would be considered.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) asked why the Labour Members were not in their place to deal with the Home Office Vote this year. Many of the Labour Members were absent, as they knew ; but, in addition to that, they had a state of affairs that never existed before. The Vote for the first time contained something like a concession of what they had for years been fighting for. Fifteen Assistant Inspectors were appointed and two female Inspectors, and he desired to thank the Home Secretary for what he had done in this direction. That was a good reason. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would carefully consider the question of the remuneration of these Inspectors. There remained, however, the question of examinations for these appointments. While the Labour Members agreed that there should be an examination in practical knowledge, they thought it should be of such a character as would meet the case of men whose lives had been spent in workshops, and whose opportunities for education had not been many. There would be 20 districts, as between these men and others. It would often happen that the man who had gone through a high-class literary education was the best man for this class of work, but the literary man was by no means always a capable man for the work. They wanted men who, from their practical knowledge of what was required of them, would find no difficulty in discharging the duties in a satisfactory manner. The Member for Wigan (Sir F. S. Powell) spoke of Inspectors going out of their way in their Reports, and he made a comparison between School and Factory Inspectors. The Factory Inspectors made reference, it was said, to things that did not come before them. There was the case of Co-operation. It was a question upon which he (Mr. Rowlands) had a strong opinion ; and he believed that the Inspectors could make valuable representations upon the question as to distribution and production—questions which, in his opinion, were within their scope. For example, he thought that any information the Inspectors could give in reference to technical education in any industry was within the sphere of their duties. Any information on matters of that kind was bound to be useful. He had only again to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his attention to the business of this Department, and he hoped his further efforts would be equally beneficial in their results.

MR. WHITELEY (Stockport) said, he had listened to what had been said by one of the Irish Members regarding the supervision of Irish industries. As representing a manufacturing constituency, and as a manufacturer himself, he (Mr. Whiteley) was glad to see that there was an increased number of Inspectors in England. But he would impress upon the Home Secretary the necessity for a general overhauling of factories, and for insisting on a more stringent enforcement of the provisions of the Act by the Inspectors. Then there was the question of overtime. Many firms worked their employés overtime by starting their engines five or ten minutes before the hour in the morning, or running five or ten minutes late in the evening. The matter was, no doubt, a very difficult one for the Inspectors to tackle ; but he would ask that the attention of the new Inspectors should be specially directed to this question of running overtime. Then as regards the state of factories, he wished that the Inspectors should keep a factory register, and that they should visit factories as soon as the interval permitted by law for cleansing had elapsed. An important fact for consideration was that in some cases the Inspectors were really incompetent to carry out the requirements of the Act in regard to the ventilation of factories. All these points showed conclusively that the present number of Inspectors was insufficient, and he was glad to hear that an increase was contemplated. An increase was necessary. He was glad to hear that matters were progressing in Ireland.

*MR. M. AUSTIN said, they would progress under Home Rule.

MR. WHITELEY said, it appeared from what they heard that the number of industries in Ireland was insignificant as compared with Great Britain. If it were the fact that factories were springing up in Ireland, and that an increase in the Inspectors was necessary, it disproved a favourite argument of the Prime Minister in another matter. He hoped there would be a more careful inspection of factories in the future. He thought there ought to be more working-men Inspectors appointed, men who were practically appointed with the conditions of employment in factories, and who had the welfare of the working classes at heart.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda) urged that there were not sufficient working-men Inspectors. He wished to call attention to what the Chief Inspector in Wales himself said when he gave evidence before the Labour Commission in 1890. He said that the inspections made were 323, a total falling short by 49 of the number of collieries in the district. Therefore, in that extremely dangerous district, the Chief Inspector himself had admitted that there were 49 collieries that were not inspected during the year. As to the nature of inspection, the Inspector said that in most cases several days were required to make a thorough examination; but he admitted that they had only been able to devote, on an average, three hours for the purposes of inspection and examination. The Chief Inspector further stated that he considered he had fulfilled his duty by satisfying himself generally that the managers were carrying out the provisions of the Mines Act. If, then, it came to this, that they were content with what the managers were doing, where was the need for inspection at all?

Mr. Whiteley

According to the same authority, about one-half of these examinations were made after the accidents had occurred. This was a grave admission. It meant that the collieries had no real inspection before the accidents. What was really required, if accidents were to be prevented and avoided, was that the Government should appoint a class of men with knowledge of the collieries, who could make a practical and thorough examination. He also thought a large staff could be employed in inspection at considerably less than what was now paid, though he did not complain of the present remuneration.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, that there ought to be inspection of mines before fatal accidents as well as after. He wished particularly to call attention on this point to the Northern part of the Kingdom—a place called Scotland—to which the House had given little consideration. During a visit which he paid to that country a few months previously, he was asked by the miners themselves to represent to the Home Secretary their anxious desire that there should be inspection of mines before as well as after accidents. He had sent these views in writing to the Home Secretary, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give them his consideration. It was in the interest of the owners as well as of the men that mines should be inspected with a view to prevent accidents.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he desired to support the point raised by the hon. Member for West Limerick (Mr. M. Austin), in regard to the appointment of working men as Sub-Inspectors. The Home Secretary had taken that course in North London; and he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for making a new departure, which would do good to the State, and give satisfaction to those whose lives and health were dependent on the proper inspection of factories and workshops. He did not think that the remuneration in these cases was adequate. The commencing salary was £100 a year. Persons qualified for these Sub-Inspectorships were persons with a practical and thorough trade knowledge, and he must be a poor mechanic who could not earn more than the salary attached to this office. Therefore, in respect to the salary, the Government had not set that good example as employers, of which the House had declared its expectation. The salaries were also very disproportionate to the salaries enjoyed by the Inspectors. Some of the Inspectors had sources of income three or four times more than the salaries given to the recently appointed Sub-Inspectors, though they rendered services in some respects as valuable as those rendered by the Inspectors. He recommended strongly that there should be a readjustment of this disproportion between the salaries of Inspectors and the salaries of Sub-Inspectors. Then, as to the examination, he thought it should not be of the searching character that members of other branches of the Civil Service were subjected to. He did not desire, in the least, to depreciate literary attainments; but it must be apparent to all that what was most required in the men who filled those positions was technical knowledge, for the attainment of which there were now special advantages in almost every part of the Kingdom.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he also desired to express his satisfaction at the appointment of working-men Sub-Inspectors. No one should, in his view, be appointed to inspect a factory who had not a competent knowledge of the industry carried on in the factories and workshops he was required to inspect, and also with the general conditions under which those industries were carried on. The appointment of men of this character as Inspectors had been urged on the Government year after year by those who represented the industrial communities. It was about eight years ago that he formed part of a deputation that waited on the present Chancellor of the Exchequer who was Home Secretary at the time, and urged the appointment as Inspectors of men who had a practical acquaintance with the trades they had to inspect.

*MR. ASQUITH : Considering the multifarious duties of the office I hold, I cannot complain if the discussion on the Vote should be of a discursive character. I feel bound to acknowledge with gratitude the very considerate and kindly tone which has marked the large majority of the criticisms of hon. Gentlemen. There were two main subjects discussed. One related to by far the most important department under the Home Office—always, of course, excepting the exercise of the prerogative of mercy—the department connected with factories and mines. But there have been one or two incidental criticisms which I propose to dispose of before I come to those important questions. First of all, the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) referred to the Home Office Circular issued to Magistrates, calling the attention of their Courts to the provision of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, which enacts that where a fine does not exceed 5s. there shall be no costs unless expressly ordered, and suggesting that they should give a wider effect to that provision than they have hitherto done. The hon. Gentleman asks me what authority the Home Office has for making its wishes effective, and what means we possess of obtaining a knowledge of the actions of the Magistrates in those cases. I am sorry to say I cannot give a satisfactory answer to either of those questions. The Home Office has no direct authority in the matter at all, and the only way we can obtain a knowledge that this section has not been observed in Courts of Summary Jurisdiction is when the cases are brought before me for revision. I strongly deprecate the imposition of costs upon a defendant where the fine does not exceed 5s., except in very exceptional cases; and I make it an invariable practice to call the attention of Magistrates to the fact that, in imposing costs in such cases, they are violating, if not the letter, at least the spirit, of the Act. I am not, however, satisfied with the result, and I have it in contemplation to call for a Return from all Benches of Magistrates in the country of all cases during, say, a twelvemonth in which costs have been imposed where the fine does not exceed 5s.; and if the Returns show that the practice is widespread, I shall have to consider what steps may be necessary to make the provision of the Act mandatory instead of discretionary. The question of vivisection has been raised in a very temperate, and— if he will permit me to say it—very able speech by the hon. and gallant Member for Epping (Colonel Lockwood). If any hon. Member thinks that experiments on live animals for scientific purposes ought to be prohibited, his first step must be to obtain the repeal of the Act of 1876, by which these experiments are made legal. I will not express an opinion one way or the other on the general question. All I have got to do is to administer the Act as I find it; and I may say that there is no part of my duty that gives me greater solicitude, or to which I pay, as time allows, more constant attention. In no case, I think, since I have been in the Home Office has a licence to experiment upon dogs, cats, monkeys, and the higher class of animals been granted without the matter having come before me personally, and receiving my individual attention. We take the most careful precautions that these licences shall not be granted, in the first instance, except to persons whose qualifications are undoubted, and as to whose bona fides and desire for scientific research alone no reasonable doubt could be entertained. Further, no licence is granted unless the applicant is recommended by eminent medical men, such as the Presidents of the Royal College of Physicians and the Royal College of Surgeons, and the application is then sent on for observations to the Society for the Propagation of Knowledge by Research. Until these preliminary recommendations are obtained, the application is not considered at all by the Home Office. If a licence is granted, the licensee is bound to make Reports to the Inspector, and he is always liable to visits from the Inspector, which are as often as not surprise visits. It is impossible, however, to lay down a rule that all visits must be surprise visits. The Inspector has often to arrange an inspection in order that he may see the various stages of the experiment. An additional security is afforded by the fact that none of these experiments are allowed to be conducted in private places; and, for the most part, they take place in the great Medical Schools and the laboratories of Pathological Institutes. The area in which the experiments are carried on is narrow. In the whole United Kingdom there are only 59 licensed places for these experiments, and as these 59 places are contained in 37 institutions, the Inspector has only 37 different places to visit. The hon. and gallant Gentleman asked me to appoint an Inspector in consultation with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, or the Anti-Vivisection Societies. I am afraid that if I had to arrive at a conclusion with the Anti-Vivisection Societies, we should remain without any Inspector at all. The hon. and gallant Gentleman complains that the Inspector has not made a sufficient number of visits. The Act of Parliament requires that the registered places should be, from time to time, visited by the Inspectors; but it does not require that each experiment or any experiment should be witnessed by the Inspector, though I quite agree that the Inspector would not be discharging his duty properly if he did not make himself personally acquainted with the manner in which the experiments themselves are actually performed. Every licensed place is visited yearly, some of them three or four times a year; and the Inspector is in constant communication, by letter, with the licensees throughout the country, making suggestions and offering advice. We ought not, however, to look upon these scientific men as criminals, who are to be treated to constant surprise visits, and caught out in attempted infractions of the law. Only two or three cases have come under my notice in which the experiments violated the conditions of the licence. When that happens the most severe notice is taken of it, and unless a satisfactory explanation is forthcoming the renewal of the licence is refused. I do not think, therefore, that there is anything wrong in the method of inspection. If there has been an increase in the number of experiments, there has not been a corresponding increase in the amount of pain inflicted on animals during the last year. I would point out that the large increase in the number of experiments is almost entirely due to what is called inoculation. These are performed without anæsthetics, because they are perfectly painless; but it is a rigid condition of the certificate allowing these experiments that if pain supervenes after the experiment the animal is to be at once killed.

Mr. Asquith

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I might point out that the great increase is also due to experiments in connection with the Royal Commission on Tuberculosis.

*MR. ASQUITH: That is so. I will only say, in conclusion, that the working of the Act is being very carefully watched. In regard to the inspection of mines, I admit that the South Wales collieries are the most dangerous in the country, and perhaps in the world, and they must demand and receive the anxious attention of all those who are responsible for them. I was glad to hear the tribute which has been paid the Mines Inspector. I do not believe there is a more efficient Inspector. My attention has been specially directed to the mines in South Wales, and the Inspector has drawn up special regulations for them. These are under the consideration of the Under Secretary and myself. I think a prima facie case has been made out in this district for additional inspection, and I hope during the Autumn to deal with the question and that of quarries, which by an extraordinary legislative freak have been treated, not as mines, but as workshops. It may become desirable to transfer them from the Factories to the Mines Acts. I will not forget Scotland in this matter. As to factory inspection, I think that the pay given to the Sub-Inspectors is adequate, especially taking into account the fact that they become permanent Civil servants, entitled to a pension. Their pay is fixed at £2, rising to £3 per week. In the direction of noxious trades, I have at least done as much as any of my predecessors in Office. The Commission on the white and other lead trade has visited almost every factory in the country, and has taken a large mass of evidence, both as to the magnitude of the evil, and, what is even more to the point, as to the possible remedy. I strongly believe in the work of such Departmental Committees, and I have appointed them in four of the most dangerous trades—namely, lead, potteries, chemicals, and quarries. My attention has been called to the condition of the linen-workers in Belfast, who are mostly women and children, and I sent over a competent man to inquire. His Report, which goes to the very root of the evil, shows that there is a very large mortality from phthisis, owing to the excessive humidity and high temperature under which the work is carried on, as well as to the quantity of dust generated in the process of manufacture. Rules have been framed and submitted to the manufacturers, and the result, it is confidently anticipated, will be largely to reduce the rate of mortality in Belfast. As to sweating, I believe that any orders would have been but waste paper had it not been for the Inspectors' Assistants, whose appointments have led to valuable results. I think, therefore, that this system should be extended to other parts of the country. I do not share the very sanguine views expressed as to the results that would flow from making inspection local rather than central. I think no change has been found more necessary than that of the appointment of women Inspectors, of whom I have, as yet, only been able to appoint two. I hope, however, to increase the number. I am quite sure that the present women Inspectors have more than justified their appointments. Abuses have been found to exist in large West End establishments, and a large number of prosecutions and convictions have followed during the six months since the appointments were made. This has resulted in the law being better observed. As to the remarks of the right hon. Member for Bury with reference to the Particulars Clause of the Act of 1891, I can only say that if it is found necessary to appoint additional Inspectors I will see that it is done. The question of overtime occupies a rather peculiar position. Under the Act of 1878 there are some employments in relation to which there is a statutory right to work overtime, and in the case of other employments the Home Secretary has the power to relax the restrictions of the law. I am very careful in granting this relaxation, and only do so in cases where strong reasons are given in favour of it. Important changes in matters of this kind so closely affecting trade cannot be made without very careful consideration. I trust the Committee will now pass this Vote.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not a fact that three of the Factory Inspectors were pluralists—officers who had retired from the Army or Navy and were in receipt of pensions?

*MR. ASQUITH said, he believed the statement of the hon. Member was correct, but he certainly did not think that previous service in the Army or Navy should be regarded as a disqualification for the office of Factory Inspector.

CAPTAIN NAYLOR - LEYLAND (Colchester) pointed out that, although the staff of Inspectors under the Factory Acts had been increased by 27 during the last year, there were still only 86 Inspectors for the whole country, and he contended that this number was wholly insufficient to fully and effectively carry out the provisions of the Factory Acts. He thought also that greater power should be given to the Inspectors to enable them to deal more directly and promptly with insanitary workshops. If the premises happened to be a dwelling-house the Factory Inspector could not enter them without a warrant, and the result was that in 99 cases out of 100 warrants were never applied for, and sweating went on just the same. He should like to have a Report as to how this wonderful reform was working at the present time. He should like to see all matters appertaining to factories and the appointment of Factory Inspectors transferred to a responsible Minister of Labour. Whilst the law was extremely good, it was not enforced in many cases; and it was, in fact, perfectly useless to enforce it without an adequate number of Inspectors, the present staff being wholly inadequate for the purpose of carrying out a thorough system of inspection of factories and workshops. The Commission on the subject of Sweating, in their Report published in 1892, were of opinion that workshops, including under that description a factory, workshop, or domestic workshop, should be required to be kept in a cleanly state, and should be treated for sanitary purposes as factories were treated under the Factory Acts. By the Act, at present, this was purely a matter of administration on the part of the right hon. Gentleman; and from that day to this not a single thing had been done towards carrying out that important recommendation. The Commission also recommended an increase in the number of Inspectors, who, they thought, should have the power to enter all workshops within their jurisdiction at reasonable times without a warrant—that was to say, that where a workshop was also a dwelling-house they should be allowed to enter it without a warrant. There were many other recommendations of a similar character, and he wished to impress upon the Home Secretary that it was false economy to endeavour to enforce the law with such an inadequate staff of Inspectors, and instead of 15 extra they wanted a very much larger number. He was willing to believe the Home Secretary himself was, possibly, extremely anxious to carry out these reforms, but his position was that of a number of gentlemen on the Treasury Bench—"Heaven save me from my friends," and Heaven save him in particular from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, unfortunately for the factories of the country, was reclining in ease and opulence on the flesh pots of the Treasury; he had got a tight hold of the money bags of the State; and for no purpose, not even for the purposes of the working classes of this country, would he relax his grip. He would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to dole out a little sum to enable the Home Secretary to increase the Factory Inspectors, the present number being absolutely insufficient for the work they had to perform.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that after the very full and satisfactory discussion on this Vote, and the very fair and candid statement of the Home Secretary, he thought the Committee would feel the time had arrived when the Government should have the Vote. He only desired to say that he was not going to press the reduction he had on the Paper. It was a reduction of the salary of the Private Secretary to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and he put it down with a number of other similar reductions in the case of pluralists. This gentleman was a Clerk in the House; he was Private Secretary to the right hon. Gentleman; and he was also Gentleman Usher at the Court; and there did, therefore, seem to be a reason why his case should be carefully considered. He did not propose, however, to enter into the case that day, because he had not yet got the full list of pluralists which he intended to deal with generally, from top to bottom, when he got it; and as he was not in possession of this list he felt it would be invidious if he dealt with this particular case.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he believed that upon this Vote it was open to any private Member to challenge the general policy of the Foreign Department. If he were in Order, he wished now to challenge the policy of the Government in reference to the burning, or rather the blazing, question of Siam. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would not, he was sure, think he had put this challenge in any unfriendly spirit. He was hopeful that his challenge might lead to a satisfactory answer. He could assure the Government that an answer was expected from them by public opinion in all well-informed circles in this country; that they were, in a certain sense, on their own defence at the bar of the national sentiment; and that the onus probandi rested upon them at this moment to show that they had done all that duty required for the just interests of England. He earnestly hoped that they would be able satisfactorily to discharge that onerous task. They had had, as yet, no Papers laid upon the Table upon the question; and, therefore, they were at some disadvantage in respect to interpellations. Several of them had put questions to Ministers at various dates, and though they had received official answers, he must be pardoned if he said that these answers were never quite so explicit as to be satisfactory. They were afraid always that behind these answers, which appeared so full at first sight, there might lurk some danger. Public opinion was greatly exercised at the declaration they understood to have been made at the outset by the Government, that England had no interest in the quarrel between Siam and France. Had this been merely a matter relating to boundaries, or to some local question, they admitted that England would not have a share in that quarrel. But the quarrel assumed far larger proportions, and affected the very safety, honour, the independence and integrity of Siam.

When they came to a quarrel which extended to the cession of a territory, perhaps 100,000 square miles, which comprised the occupation of districts, the employment of naval forces, and menaces of a most formidable kind to the capital of Siam, that was a quarrel of the largest dimensions. It might be a vital quarrel, and he contended that our interest was immense, and that it was a most unfortunate thing if any such declaration was ever made by the Government which would make Siam think that England would not stand by her, but would almost cast her to the wolves. He was sure it was no exaggeration to say that Siam was led to fear she would be thrown to the wolves. It was a most unfortunate declaration. He knew not how far exactly it was made; but if the hon. Baronet could assure him he was labouring under an utter misapprehension, no one would be more thankful than he (Sir R. Temple). He contended that Siam was led to apprehend something of that kind, and in consequence of that declaration she yielded to the ultimatum of France. With regard to the integrity and independence of Siam, the House would recollect that originally they had the comforting assurance from the hon. Baronet that the French Government declared themselves just as anxious as we were to preserve the integrity and independence of Siam. But that integrity and independence were menaced in the most critical manner. The hon. Members then repeated their questions in this House as to whether the French adhered to their assurance as regarded the independence and integrity of Siam, and he understood the hon. Baronet to say that in general terms the French did adhere to that declaration; but that they put their own interpretation upon the meaning of this integrity and independence. The French were as much entitled as we were to put their interpretation upon these very vital and important words; but the question, however, was what construction the English Government applied to these words. What he apprehended was, that France had been allowed to interpret the words in their own way, and that England had acquiesced in that very dangerous interpretation. He submitted that it was the duty of Ministers to put the English view into juxtaposition with the French view. In the next place, when this matter was last before the Committee he raised certain questions which he must be pardoned for saying were not answered, the hon. Baronet devoting his attention to the speech of the hon. Member for Southport, whose questions were rather more sharply defined. That must be his excuse for briefly recapitulating these questions now, which either ought to be answered, or England ought to know the reason why they were not answered. The River Mekong was the fons et origo of all the trouble. The proposal of Siam was that the cession to France should end at the southern corner of the bend in the river. The French contention was that it should end at the upper corner of the bend at Luang-Prabang. The consequence would be that the whole of this bend—a great stretch of country containing tens of thousands of square miles—would go by the board to France, and would enable France to have the weight of territorial influence right into the very heart of the Kingdom of Siam. Supposing we had to acquiesce, or that Siam had to agree that the cession should go as far as Luang-Prabang on the north-east of the bend, he wanted to know whether the whole of the territory inside the bend was to be given to France or not, or was a straight line to be drawn by means of negotiation or delimitation from the south to the north end of the bend? If such a delimitation could be secured he admitted that, after all the diplomatic disasters that had happened, this would be something of a retrieval for this country, and it would be greatly to the credit of the Foreign Office if, even at the eleventh hour, they could secure something of this kind. He would ask whether, in the negotiations, this territory inside the bend was to be ceded to France or not? Of course, if the hon. Baronet said that negotiations were still going on, and that it would be prejudicial to answer, he must accept such a reply; but he could assure the Under Secretary that the British interests in that part were directing close attention to this important point. He understood that somewhere about the 21st degree of North latitude there was to be a neutral zone—somewhere between Luang-Prabang and the British Protectorate or British protected territory. He desired to know whether the negotiations were going on satisfactorily in reference to this neutral zone, and he would also like to know what was to become of Luang-Prabang itself? He apprehended that half of it would go bodily to France; and that the other half would be somewhere inside Siamese territory, or perhaps in the neutral zone. Further, the French had made the monstrous claim that for some distance along the right bank of the Mekong River there should be no Siamese troops; thus the right bank, or the portion that was spared, would remain absolutely under French control, so that the whole river on both banks would be under the French command. That was a cruel expansion of the original claim. Was it not enough to take the whole of the left bank for some comparatively trifling offences which Siam had committed—if they were offences at all—but that, in addition, they must alienate from Siam all that bank which still nominally belonged to the Siamese? They were entitled to know whether this article was included in the ultimatum, and whether it had been accepted?

It being half-past Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [5th September] reported.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS I.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH, (Bristol, W.) said, he understood that they would have a statement as to Business. When might they expect it?

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make a statement to-morrow. He might add that Vote for salaries and expenses of the officials of the House of Lords would be postponed till then.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) inquired whether the Vote could not be postponed until Monday?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, on a point of Order, he would like to know whether they could postpone a matter of this kind on Report?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Yes.

Resolutions read a second time.

Res. 1. "That a sum, not exceeding £142,176, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for the Erection, Repairs, and Maintenance of Public Buildings in Ireland, for the Maintenance of certain Parks and Public Works, and for Drainage Works on the Rivers Shannon and Suck."

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he would like to draw attention to the necessity for providing the Suck Drainage Board with the necessary funds to complete the works. He had been informed by The O'Connor Don, a Member of the Board and a former Member of the House, that the works could be completed in November if the money was provided, and he hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would see his way to provide the money.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): said, he was in entire agreement with the hon. and gallant Gentleman on this question. According to his information, it was probable the money would be found for carrying on the works; but he was not prepared at the present moment to say how it would be found, and he hoped the hon. Member would not press him on the point.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, for his part, this being a question he wished to raise, he was prepared to accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, he wished to ask what had been done with regard to the Shannon Drainage Works. Had the Board of Works' scheme been approved by the Treasury?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, the hon. and gallant Colonel (Colonel Nolan) wanted to get more money.

COLONEL NOLAN: Not exactly.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, if there were money to spare he thought they should have some of it for Peterborough.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the money referred to by the hon. Member was obtained under Act of Parliament.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, it was the duty of the Government to pass an Act of Parliament.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said, he wished to ask a question about Arklow Pier. It would be in the recollection of the House, when the pier was about to be constructed, that the estimated amount was £7,000, half of which was to be provided by the Government and the other half by the Local Authority. The work was going on, and he did not know whether the work had been completed, or whether the whole sum had been voted. With regard to the Suck Drainage Works, was he to understand from the Secretary to the Treasury that if the money was required means would be found for saving the landlords and the Local Authority from the very large loss of interest which they would otherwise suffer, because he understood that the interest was falling due at the rate of £5,000 a year? But, so far as that was concerned, he understood the money would be found, so that the difficulties might be considered at an end.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he was anxious to know what conclusion had been arrived at with regard to running the Baltimore Railway to the water side? It was a matter of great moment to the fishing industry in Ireland.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: This is a different Vote.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jackson), it was expected that the work at Arklow would be completed this year, and that the money would be sufficient.

MR. JACKSON: And all the money would be expended?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes.

Resolution agreed to.

SIR A. ROLLIT said, his question had not been answered.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT was understood to say he had dealt with the matter at a previous period in the Debate.

Res. 2. "That a sum, not exceeding £8,676, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for Payments under 'The Tramways and Public Companies (Ireland) Act, 1883,' and 'The Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889.'"

SIR T. ESMONDE (Kerry, W.) said, he wished to know whether any action had been taken in regard to the inquiry into the Tralee and Dingle Railway accident? The matter was one of a good deal of importance to his constituents. It was now three weeks since the interview on the matter had taken place with the Secretary to the Treasury, and he wished to know what the Government intended to do?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is not this the very question you ruled out of Order last night? [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: My ruling last night related to the management of the railway, and that question is out of Order on this Vote.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): May I point out that what my hon. Friend is asking is as to what steps the Treasury have taken or are about to take upon the statement made by the Secretary to the Treasury, that an inquiry would be instituted?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether this matter is not out of Order? I submit that the principle is the same as the question raised last night, and which was ruled out of Order?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. Baronet is out of Order.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he would just say, in reply to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir A. Rollit), in the matter of the Baltimore Railway, there were at present no funds available for the completion of this railway to the water-side. The work was not included in the Railway Vote, and unless funds could be obtained from the Congested Districts Board, who had money at their disposal, he did not see how this small portion of the line could be completed.

*SIR A. ROLLIT: Will the right hon. Gentleman bring the matter under the notice of the Congested Districts Board?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he would do this.

MR. SEXTON: I wish, Sir, to ask the Secretary to the Treasury with regard to the charge to the Treasury of £2,400 included in this Vote for the Tralee and Dingle Railway—

MR. MACARTNEY: I rise to Order — [Cries of "Order!" and "Chair!"]

MR. SEXTON: I am perfectly in Order, and I submit that, notwithstanding the great intellectual powers of the hon. Member (Mr. Macartney), he is unable to say what I am about to ask until I have asked it.

MR. MACARTNEY again arose amid cries of "Order!"

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! Mr. Sexton.

MR. SEXTON: What I wish to ask is, do the Treasury propose to take any steps to alter the incidence in regard to this sum of £2,400 in respect of the guarantee of this line?

MR. MACARTNEY: That was the very point I was wishing to raise last night, when I was asked to sit down— [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the point is that which was raised last night it is clearly out of Order.

MR. SEXTON: Is it out of Order to ask, in regard to a charge of £2,400 to the Treasury actually included in the Vote, whether the Treasury propose to make any arrangements to alter the incidence of that charge?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I submit that the hon. Member for North Kerry is endeavouring to evade your ruling of last night.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: May I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that if he will put the question down on the Paper for to-morrow I will endeavour to answer it?

Resolution agreed to.

CLASS II.

Res. 3. "That a sum, not exceeding £22,595, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the House of Lords."

Resolution postponed.

Res. 4. "That a sum, not exceeding £33,223, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for the Salaries and Expenses in the Offices of the House of Commons."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

Mr. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, he would ask that this Vote should be postponed, for the purpose of obtaining fuller information than was given last night. The promise made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not clearly understood by Members of the House, and they should have a fuller statement. He was prepared to move the Adjournment of the Debate in order that they might have a more definite statement.

Sir J. T. HIBBERT said, he could not agree to any postponement of this Vote, as it was included in the Ways and Means Bill, which must be introduced this evening. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had, he thought, given a very fair answer last night, having offered to confer with the Chairman of the Kitchen Committee.

Mr. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrew's, &c.) said, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman was not able to assent to the suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Cremer). But he hoped, at any rate, the matter would be made clear. As he understood it, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be willing to confer with the Kitchen Committee on the question of accommodation. But the hon. Member for Croydon (Mr. S. Herbert), as Chairman of the Committee, made a request for an extra sum to meet the necessities of the case. They would like to know whether it was intended that this sum should be granted to meet the views of the Chairman of the Committee? They should have a little more definite information. They should know whether, whatever sum might be granted, it was to go to structural alterations, or, if not, what the money was to be applied to?

Mr. MARJORIBANKS said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer distinctly stated that he was not prepared, upon the present Vote, to go into the question of structural alterations in the Kitchen and Dining Room. He said he would confer with the Chairman of the Committee as to granting of an extra sum of money, which he said he would be personally anxious to see granted, and he thought it was understood that the money so granted would go to an improvement in the waiting staff and kindred matters.

*Mr. A. C. MORTON said, he might further object to grants, but he did not object to structural alterations. The question was not altogether as to the accommodation for Members, but also as to the accommodation for servants. What was wanted was that the Government would promise to consider the question of structural alterations, so that both Members and servants could have proper facilities. He did not rise to continue the discussion now, but he begged to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR hoped the hon. Member would not press the Motion. They always recognised the reasonable nature of his views; but this matter had been discussed at considerable length. He thought the House should be satisfied with what had been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

An hon. MEMBER said, he hoped the Government would arrange reasonable hours for the sittings, and so avoid the necessity of their dining in the House of Commons.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL said, it was perfectly well-known that, while complaining of sweating outside, they were sweating the people in the Kitchen downstairs, and that in a worse way than anything that existed outside. They should look after their own House before troubling with outsiders' houses, for theirs was much worse.

Mr. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, it would be for the benefit of the Members if they had better accommodation in the Kitchen and Dining Room. They should adjourn the question for consideration.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he would point out the uselessness of adjourning the question. If they succeeded in discussing the matter on this Vote, as some hon. Members wished, they would be unable to deal with the matter of structural alterations.

*MR. S. HERBERT (Croydon) said, he was sorry the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) was not present. He said that the right hon. Gentleman's reply last night was somewhat sympathetic, for half a loaf was better than no bread. The question now raised was one of accommodation, and he thought it was clear that they were unable to give accommodation to all the Members who wished to dine unless they got better facilities both as to space and as to service. What the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said went some way to meet their views, and his statement had been endorsed by the Secretary to the Treasury or the Patronage Secretary. He should like to have had a more definite statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but as the right hon. Gentleman was not now present, he would press the Secretary to the Treasury to go a little further and say something more definite. They (the Kitchen Committee) had to make arrangements for the future, and it was but fair that they should know exactly how they would stand. He hoped, in the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. T. Hibbert) would not press the Vote through to-night.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, he would point out that, under the Resolution recently passed, no dilatory Motion was permissible unless proposed by a Minister of the Crown.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: Mr. Deputy Speaker, were not Wednesdays excluded?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! I had not the terms of the Resolution before me when I accepted the Motion for Adjournment to be discussed. The Motion of the hon. Member for Peterborough is clearly out of Order. It refers to a matter of Government Business.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said, he objected to the attitude of the Government on this question—[Cries of "Time!"] He was not going to occupy the time of the House—[Renewed cries of "Time!"]

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order!

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he merely wished to enter his objection to the attitude of the Government in refusing to adjourn this matter. He thought there was reasonable ground for complaint in the absence of a definite statement.

MR. ANSTRUTHER wished to know, on a point of Order, whether the Question of Adjournment could be out of Order, since the Motion for Adjournment had been put from the Chair?

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I proposed the Question from the Chair, but did not put it to the House.

MR. ANSTRUTHER said, with great respect, he would ask what question were they discussing—the Report of the Vote or the Question proposed from the Chair? [Cries of "Order!"]

The following is the Entry in the Votes:—

Notice taken, That the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate, not being moved by a Minister of the Crown, was contrary to the Order of the House of the 4th instant, and thereupon Mr. Deputy Speaker again proposed the Question, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

Question put, and agreed to.

Res. 5. "£52,458, to complete sum for Salaries and Expenses of Her Majesty's Treasury and Subordinate Departments."

Resolution agreed to.

Postponed Resolution to be taken into consideration To-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolution [5th September], reported;

"That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, the sum of £11,856,191 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

Resolution read a second time and amended by leaving out "£11,856,191," and inserting "£11,833,596."

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mellor, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir John Hibbert.

Bill presented, and read first time.

And, it being after Six of the clock, Mr. Deputy Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 7th September 1893.

Several Lords—Took the Oath.

SAT FIRST.

The Marquess of Normanby, after the death of his father.

GOVERNORSHIP OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW asked the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for the Colonies (having given him private notice of the question) whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to agree to the proposition which it was understood had been made by the Colony of South Australia, to the effect that no successor to the present Governor, the Earl of Kintore, should be appointed, but that the functions should be discharged by the Chief Justice of the Colony?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Marquess of Ripon): My noble Friend the Earl of Kintore, has, I am glad to say, consented to prolong his stay in South Australia. Some time ago I heard, to my surprise, that the Earl of Kintore thought his term of office was only five years, whereas, as the noble Earl knows, the office of Colonial Governor is held for six years. When I heard that I have communicated with my noble Friend, representing to him the strong desire of myself and the Government that he should remain the full term of six years, and assuring him of the confidence of Her Majesty's Government and of their recognition of the ability with which he has discharged his duties. I am happy to say that at considerable personal inconvenience the Earl of Kintore has consented to remain until the expiration of his full period of six years, and, in these circumstances, therefore, the proposition of the Government of the Colony falls to the ground.

VOL. XVII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

(No. 265.)

Order of the Day for resuming the Debate on the Amendment to the Motion for the Second Reading, read.

Debate resumed accordingly.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, in the observations which I mean to address to your Lordships on this occasion I shall endeavour to keep in mind that we are now concerned with the principles, and not with what may properly be called the details of this measure. But in this case the principles are very large and very far-reaching, and it might be possible sometimes in dealing with such a Bill as this to make a confusion between matters of principle and matters of detail. All I can say is that I will try to avoid this. The first observation which I think it right to make is that the title and the Preamble of this Bill are essentially misleading. The title is "An Act to Amend the Provision for the Government of Ireland." The Preamble is that "It is expedient that, without impairing or restricting the supreme authority of Parliament, an Irish Legislature should be created for such purposes in Ireland as in this Act mentioned."

It might be thought that we were dealing with a question of which the purview was confined to Ireland. That is very far from the case. The real nature of this Bill is to establish a brand-new Constitution of a kind for which no precedent is to be found in the history of this country, in the history of any of its Colonies, or, I believe, in the history of the world, not for Ireland only, but for both branches of the United Kingdom, on this side of St. George's Channel as well as upon the other. Nothing can be more puerile or more futile than to speak as if anyone could reasonably vote for the Second Reading of this Bill, as simply affirming some abstract notion or principle of giving some form or other of Local Government to Ireland, whether to a greater or less extent. When you have a new Constitution put before you, you should look round it and ascertain the true character and bearings of that Constitution, and examine everything which throws light on that question. I will first address myself to the question, what would be the effect of this Bill upon the Union between Great Britain and Ireland? Your Lordships will see delicate phrases employed, and the words "United Kingdom" occur not infrequently; but what is the United Kingdom which would be left if this Bill were passed? Let us look at both sides. In Ireland there will be, I will not say a new Queen, but our Queen in a new position and new capacity, as the head of a new and different system of Government from that of which she has been the head before—and a new Parliament—not, indeed, called by that name in the Bill. That is one of the disguises which we may perceive here; but if I may venture to prophesy—I will prophesy as little as I can—but I do prophesy, that when this scheme comes into operation, if ever it does, the form and style of the Acts of the new Legislature will run in this fashion—"Be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, with the assent and consent of the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of Ireland in Parliament assembled." There is not a word in the Bill to prevent it—there is every possible motive for doing it, and I am so bold as to prophesy that it would certainly be done. Well, after all, that may be matter of name and of form; but it would correctly represent the substance, and the distinctions of phraseology affected by the Bill make no difference in the substance of that which this Bill creates—a new Parliament of Ireland consisting of two Legislative Chambers, an imitation in form of this Legislature, of which your Lordships are part. Then there is to be an Irish Ministry, and all the Executive government in Ireland is to be handed over to that Ministry. What is left of the existing Union after that arrangement, except rags and tatters, to cloak the wrong which the provisions of the Bill would inflict on Great Britain? Well, my Lords, I will take first the effect of the provisions of this Bill, if it should be passed into law, upon Great Britain. In the new scheme there are to be 80 Irish Members in the British Parliament. That scheme in its working form in the Bill was, if, I am rightly informed, never discussed or considered, never resolved upon by any deliberate vote in the other House of Parliament. The Schedule which contains it is

among those parts of the Bill which were excluded from all debate and all consideration. What is the scheme? There are to be 80 Irish Members sent to the British Parliament, one or more of them from every Irish county or borough, even, as was noticed by my noble Friend Lord Camperdown last night, from Galway, Kilkenny, and Newry, not one of which three boroughs has as many as 2,000 electors. But the University of Dublin is struck out, I may safely say the most intelligent of all the Irish constituencies, and the best qualified to contribute wisdom and instruction to the deliberations of the British Parliament. Why is it left out? Is it from a preconceived opinion that Universities ought not to be represented in Parliament, and that an opportunity may be found in this Bill to put in the thin end of the wedge for that purpose? I should have suspected that, but for the fact that the University of Dublin is to have a place in the new Irish Legislative Assembly, where its wisdom perhaps may not be as fully appreciated as it has usually been in this country. Well, but I have not done with the scheme; because, though I do not attribute great importance to any details of the Bill in comparison with its principles, yet they throw some degree of light on the animus with which this part of the Bill has been conceived. What is the manner in which these 80 Representatives are to be chosen? At present every county in Ireland is so divided, that each elector has only one vote for one division, however many Members the county in the aggregate may return. That system of distribution was deliberately established, both for this country and for Ireland, as recently as 1885, with the full consent of the present Prime Minister and many of his colleagues. But under this new scheme that system of distribution is entirely reversed, and under this Schedule all those divisions of counties are swept away and abolished. In all the 22 counties which are now to return some three, some two Members each, the matter is so arranged that the aggregate of the whole representation is thrown into a single focus, so that one man is to have three votes in some counties and two in others; and that proceeding comes from a Government which, in the same

Session and in the Queen's Speech, among other measures, recommended for the consideration of Parliament a Bill for establishing equality of the franchise by the limitation of each elector to a single vote. I come to the principle of the retention, under the circumstances which this measure would create, of 80 or any other number of Irish Members in the British Parliament. I attribute so much importance to this, that perhaps I may be pardoned if I deal with it in some detail. I regard this question as vital, and so does the Home Secretary; for upon the Second Reading of the Bill, on April 14, he said—

"For my part I regard the question of the retention of the Irish Members as vital to the Bill."

He added that he did not think it signified much how it was done. My view, on both points, is opposite to his; but we agree in regarding the principle as vital. I observe that last night the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon), addressing the Opposition, said—

"You objected to the removal of the Irish Members in 1886, and now you object to their retention."

That is all he thought it worth while to say upon this subject. Whoever objected to the removal of the Irish Members in 1886, I certainly was not one of them; for, feeling then as I do now the enormous magnitude of the Constitutional principle and the practical consequences involved in the retention of the Irish Members under such circumstances as would be created in Ireland by this Bill, I publicly protested against it in the strongest possible terms, using words which I will now venture to quote. I pointed out the manner in which I conceived such an arrangement must work, and how the upshot of it would be to afford a chance to the Irish of becoming our masters as well as their own; concluding thus—

"That any ordinary Englishman or Scotchman with ordinary spirit and intelligence, and without any unpatriotic purposes, should wish or consent to bring about such a state of things as this, seems to me nothing short of political madness."

Those were my words addressed to the British public in May, 1886, and I repeat them now. Did I stand alone in that view? The Duke of Devonshire in more than one speech referred to those words, and said he saw no answer to them. What is the effect of this arrangement? Your Lordships all know it, but no harm can be done by bringing into prominence, over and over again, the importance of so vital a matter. I distinguish for the moment Imperial or quasi-Imperial from domestic affairs. As to Imperial or quasi-Imperial matters, this arrangement enables these 80 Irish Members, or a majority of them, in any case of political difficulty where Party feeling in England runs high, and in which the numbers which divide a majority from a minority are not overwhelming—in every such case it will give them a casting vote, and enable them to turn the scale and the balance, whether as to peace or war, as to foreign relations, as to naval or military establishments, or as to the constitution of the Administration which is to govern the affairs of this country. Have you given any such power over Imperial affairs to your great Colonies of Canada or Australia—Colonies which, without disrespect to Ireland, may be well excused if they think themselves not less important parts of the British Empire? If such a thing ought to be done on principle, how could it be refused to them? But neither they nor anyone else has ever supposed that any principle required it, and reasons of Constitutional importance have prevented it, with their full consent. Then with regard to domestic affairs, what is to become of the principle that taxation and representation go together? Under this Bill, as it stands, these 80 Irish Members—as to whom you will have renounced practically and for all purposes, except such as might occur in case of civil war or insurrection, the power of domestic government, the power of legislating for Ireland, and the power of taxing Ireland—are to come here and to tax the inhabitants of Great Britain with burdens in which they will have no share. They are to be brought in to turn minorities into majorities, for the overthrow or change of British Institutions from the greatest to the least, for the disestablishment of Churches, for changing the constitution of the British Parliament, for anything else which a party in this country, not being otherwise in a majority, may desire and demand, without having themselves any stake or direct interest in what is done. That is to establish a despotism and a tyranny in favour of British minorities over British majorities. Am I putting a case which could not occur? Do not the circumstances of the present moment furnish the best possible example of it? What is the majority upon which the Government are now living from day to day except an Irish majority? If the Irish Members were taken away would they be in a majority? I have tried to imagine either a practical reason or a reason of principle for this arrangement, but I can only think of one, which, if it be the true one, it would have been better candidly to avow. It is this—We cannot afford to do away with our majority, and we should be in a minority if the Irish Members were not here. It is no exaggeration to call such a scheme as that—in its effect, whether or not in its intention—a scheme for establishing the domination in Great Britain of a minority over a majority. Have you in the past done anything like it? Certainly not in Canada, not in Australia. And it seems to me that the thing has been done in a manner as remarkable as the thing is in itself. A sort of cynical humour seems to have dictated the phraseology of those who have been parties to it. They have talked of this measure as omnes omnia. Who are the omnes? The Irish; they are to have the omnia. But the Representatives of Great Britain are not to have in Ireland the powers which the Irish have, although the Irish here are to have the same powers that they have. This is as strange a form of omnes omnia as can be imagined. In 1886 the principle of the Irish Members ceasing to sit in the British Parliament for all ordinary purposes was effectually recognised; it was only to be an extraordinary and exceptional purpose, for some revision of the provisions of the Act itself, that they were to be called in and admitted to a share in the deliberations of this Parliament. That might, without difficulty, have been extended to any case of British legislation for altering or increasing the incidence of taxation in Ireland. Nothing could be easier to understand in principle than making an exception for such a Constitutional purpose. That was the proposition of 1886; but we are told that the country decided against it. I

deny the fact; but for the present I reserve that point. On February 13 of the present year this Bill was introduced in its original form, and it must have been the subject of careful consideration in the six or seven years during which it was not thought expedient to admit the public to a confidential knowledge of the things that were intended to be done. It must have been long considered. At all events, when the present Cabinet was formed, they at once proceeded to deliberate upon it, and the result of their wisdom was the plan of turning the British House of Commons into an Assembly for two distinct purposes, endeavouring to separate and define Imperial as distinct from local questions, and giving the Irish Members a place there to vote for Imperial purposes, and for those alone. I could never conceive why they, any more than Canada or Australia, should sit in the House of Commons for Imperial purposes, and I could see plainly the extraordinary deadlock to which such a mode of constituting a single Legislative Assembly might in some circumstances bring the affairs of this country. I cannot feel any surprise that that scheme should have been publicly condemned. But the scheme we have before us now is very much worse; and if it be proved that you cannot settle this matter upon any reasonable and Constitutional principle as long as the lines of the new Irish Constitution are such as they are in this Bill, then you must give up the attempt to give a new Constitution to Ireland on those lines, and not ruin our Constitution for the sake of dealing in that way with Ireland. What was done? The Bill went through several stages in another place. Early in July the Prime Minister was understood to state, in answer to a question, that the Government adhered to their plan, and would propose it for the acceptance or rejection of the House as it then stood in the 9th clause of the Bill. He may or he may not have been rightly understood. Later in the month, when that clause was reached and came under discussion, the Prime Minister suddenly sprung upon the House and the country by surprise the naked announcement that the arrangement which was called "in and out" was to be abandoned, and that the Irish Members were to sit in the House for all purposes whatever. Was it the deliberate conviction of the Government to whom the destinies of the country were committed that it was right or wise to make that change, or was it by some hole-and-corner process which no one knows that some people whom no one can name persuaded the Prime Minister that it was necessary so to alter the Bill without debate in the House, without explanation or reason, without anything to enlighten the mind of Parliament or the country? Was the Prime Minister himself convinced? He had on more than one occasion in 1886 nailed his colours to the mast: at one time he said he would never be a party to such a plan as that which is in the present Bill, and at another time, in a passage quoted last night by Lord Cross, he said it was "perfectly clear that such a plan as this could not be thought of." Does it appear that upon these points the Prime Minister has really changed his mind? I know that is a process of which he is not incapable; but on this particular subject I see no reason whatever for suspecting that it has taken place. Well, he made that sudden announcement, at a time when it could not be debated; for the Closure was applied to the whole discussion on that clause the very next day. And this change was effected by Irish votes. Now I should be the last person to deny that an Irish majority upon a merely Irish question is to be regarded with respect and is perfectly legitimate; but that our Constitution also should be altered by Irish votes against the sense of the British majority is a thing which seems to me, in the circumstances, and having regard to the nature of such a Bill as this, in the highest degree illegitimate and intolerable, and I hope the country thinks so too, and will show it. That they should not only obtain for themselves a Constitution separating their Government practically from ours, but also by their preponderating voices impose a new Constitution on us giving them a very large share of power here—one-ninth as near as possible, of the whole power of the House of Commons, seems to me to be a thing unprecedented, and nothing less than prodigious. A good many Liberal Members thought so too, probably more than we know. Mr. Labouchere was against it; so were Sir C. Dilke, Mr. Atherley-Jones, Mr. R. T. Reid, Sir E. Reed, Dr. Clark, Mr. Wallace, and Mr. Rathbone—the last named as honourable, fair-minded, and reasonable a man, and as loyal a Member of his Party as anyone that exists—and how many more I do not know. But the majority of these dissentients, for the sake of Party allegiance, or for the sake of whatever value they attached to other provisions of the Bill, voted for the Third Reading; though Mr. Wallace and Mr. Rathbone maintained the courage of their convictions and did not. I say there has not been any opportunity of taking the real sense of the House of Commons, under these circumstances, on that proposal. Before leaving that branch of the subject, I must ask your Lordships to allow me to read what, on the 31st of the same month, after the thing was done, Mr. Gladstone wrote to a gentleman in Edinburgh, Mr. Cowan. He said in that letter that the country was in favour of the retention of the Irish Members; and that assumption seems to be the reason which led him to act as he did; but I want your Lordships to note his testimony, which he gave after the thing had been done, as to the principle involved—

"It was impossible to regard Ireland as having a claim to vote upon questions of an exclusively British character while she was to be provided with a Legislature in Dublin to deal in an exclusive manner with Ireland's ordinary domestic affairs, subject only to the supremacy of Parliament. . . . The Cabinet made their proposal because they were unwilling to admit even the semblance of a right or claim on the part of Ireland to share in the management of English affairs while charged with the separate management of her own."

I must take it, therefore, from Mr. Gladstone himself, that Ireland not only had no claim, but not even the semblance of a right, to the power which the Bill, as it now stands, gives them; and yet this change has been made by Irish votes, by the votes of those who have not "even the semblance of a right or claim" to do it. What ground is there for the assertion that the country was against the exclusion of the Irish Members from the British Parliament? None whatever, except criticisms of the Bill of 1886, founded entirely on the feeling that the Act of Union should not be abrogated; and there is not the smallest justification for asserting that the country has declared itself in favour of the retention of the Irish Members in any form whatever consistent with a Bill upon the lines of the present Bill. It has been said that the Irish Members are in Parliament at the present time, and that, therefore, the Bill does not make any substantial change. But upon what grounds and what conditions are they there? As an integral constituent of a Body having universal authority, as much in Ireland as throughout Great Britain, in which every Member has equal power, equal duties, and equal rights, and, if they would but see the matter as it stands, in which every Member has an interest and a stake in all that is done for every part of the country. If taxes are to be borne, each has to bear his share; if anything else is done which is capable of being dealt with on the same principle throughout the United Kingdom, it is applicable to Ireland as well as here. It is an equal Parliament for all purposes all round, and for every part of the United Kingdom; and to say that it is the same thing to retain the Irish Members when you cut off Ireland and give her a separate autonomy, because the Irish Members are here already, is to contradict reason and common sense. The Constitutional principle involved is altogether different. A more absurd, a more ridiculous argument was never adduced than that of its being the same thing as is going on now. Then we are told by the Home Secretary that the change which has been made in the Bill is unimportant, because under its original form an Irish majority could have decided the fate of Ministries. I can only say that those who do not wish to see Churches disestablished and everything done which a British minority may happen to desire see a great deal of difference. It is bad enough to give Irish Members a voice in Imperial affairs; but why in the world you should also put us under their heel and enable them to govern, to rule us, and to domineer over us I cannot understand. Having no interest in British domestic affairs, when the Irish Members have any objects of their own to secure, that will determine their political alliances and political action with the view of gaining what they can in the direction they think desirable. The Attorney General tells us, that in British affairs British opinion will always prevail. That may be true when there is a great preponderance of British opinion on one side, but there will not always be such a preponderance. In the case of not very overpowering majorities on either side, the effect of the Bill as it stands would be to throw the balance of power into the hands of those who had become strangers to the interests of this country. Then there is another argument. When it is said that it is proposed to do these things against the will of the majority of the Representatives of Great Britain, and of a still greater majority of the Representatives of England, we are told that we ought not to dissect majorities. Well, if it were intended to go on as a Parliament of the United Kingdom on the footing of the contract and arrangement prevailing since the Act of Union, I could understand it. But to apply that argument to a Bill by which it is proposed to dissolve that contract and arrangement, and to separate Ireland for all the practical purposes of the Legislative Union from Great Britain—to say that you are not then to look at the sense of representatives of each of the parties to the contract seems to me perfectly ridiculous. When you are giving to the Irish Members, who are to have their own new Constitution, one-ninth of the power of the British House of Commons, to say that you are not then to look to the opinion of Great Britain as expressed by her Representatives is not an argument which can be seriously used by anyone, least of all by those who are continually telling us of questions upon which the majority of the Scotch or Welsh Representatives ought not to be overruled by the majority of the Representatives of Great Britain;—least of all when the whole argument for the Bill itself is founded on separating the opinion of Ireland as expressed by its Representatives from the aggregate opinion of the whole United Kingdom as expressed by its Representatives. If it is alleged, as an excuse for keeping 80 Irish Members for all purposes, that some of the arrangements of the Bill are provisional, the answer is, that the provisional character of those arrangements is the fault of the authors of the Bill, and is, in itself, a very grave objection to it. And the words “unless and until Parliament otherwise determines,” at the beginning of the 10th clause, do not in the same way make that clause temporary. I think it very likely indeed that if this Bill were passed by your Lordships it would be only the beginning of the destruction of the British Constitution, and that other claims would spring up in consequence. Should we not hear more about Scotch Home Rule and Welsh Home Rule? Could it lead to anything but attempts to substitute for our present system a Federal system, and further to disintegrate the Empire? The importance of this subject is in my eyes so vital, so extreme, that I will not apologise for the time which I may have occupied. But I should not discharge my duty if I said nothing about the effect this measure would have in Ireland. I take first the Land Question, and looking at what I find in the Bill, and to what has happened before, I must say I was much surprised at the speech which we heard from Lord Spencer. We know that for years the Land League and the National League have been agitating against landlords, and for the abolition of what they call landlordism in Ireland against the payment of rents, and against any settlement except by themselves of the rents to be paid by the tenants. In 1886 a Bill was introduced on the subject of the land, as well as for the government of Ireland. There were reasons which made that scheme practically impossible, and I cannot help thinking that they were from the beginning more or less understood, if not by all the Members of the Government, at least by the Prime Minister. That scheme fell to the ground, and what has happened since? Lord Spencer referred to the Land Purchase Acts, since passed, and now in force. But those Acts depend entirely upon voluntary agreements between landlords and tenants. They give no security. What guarantees are there in this Bill? I find none except the delay contemplated by Clause 34. For some reason not explained the powers of the new Irish Legislature to deal with Irish land and with the relations between landlord and tenant are to be held for three years in suspense; but at the end of those three years uncontrolled power to deal with the property of the landlords will belong to the Irish Legislature. It is true that in the 8th sub-section of the 4th clause the Irish Legislature is restrained from doing anything which might deny to any person the equal protection of the law, or by which private property might be taken away without just compensation. But new legislation makes new laws; and who is to decide the question of just compensation? It is certainly not a thing that the Privy Council or the Exchequer Judges could possibly decide; it is obviously meant to be left to the Irish Legislature; and exceptional taxation would also be completely in their power. What indications have you of the ideas of justice on this subject which would prevail among those who would have power in Ireland, or even with Her Majesty's Government? The only light derivable on that point is that which we have obtained from the Evicted Tenants Commission, and from the support given by the Government to a Bill to carry out the objects of that Commission. The expectations thus excited can only whet the appetite for the plunder of land wherever it exists in Ireland. It is a vital and a cardinal principle that the power of the British Parliament to protect minorities should never be parted with; and if there be any Party on whom that obligation is more incumbent than another, with reference to that loyal minority in Ireland whose rights of property are at stake, it is the Party which passed the Irish Land Acts, which in each successive stage professed, and were, in my belief, really intended to do justice to landlords as well as to tenants, and to create a tenure under which the rights of both should be vindicated and preserved. It would be the lowest depth of dishonour for any British Parliament not to fulfil that obligation, and yet it seems to me that under this Bill it would not and could not be fulfilled. So much for the Land Question. Now, my Lords, much has been said about the cardinal principle of Imperial supremacy; but the words on that subject of the Preamble and the 2nd clause are in themselves no more than chaff for birds willing to be caught by it; the question is, how is that supremacy to be maintained practically? The answer which anyone who reads and studies this Bill must give to that question is that by this Bill, if it were passed into law, all practical power to enforce that supremacy except by war is abandoned, and all practical power to resist it is conferred on the new Irish Legislature. What is the value of your exceptions and restrictions? Are they likely to conduce to a permanent and peaceful settlement? Are they sound in themselves? Have you anything like them in your self-governing Colonies? Some of the powers which are excepted in this Bill are expressly given by the Canadian and Australian Acts to the Canadian and Australian Legislatures. Are they really consistent with the professed principles of the Bill? Take the subjects of religion, education, and trade. How often have we been told that Ireland ought to be governed according to Irish and not according to English ideas? I ask, are the ideas contained in these exceptions and restrictions English or Irish? Beyond all question, English. It has often been argued that it is one of the greatest blots on the British administration of Ireland that there should have been no fulfilment of Mr. Pitt's intention to do something for the maintenance of the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland. Yet this Bill expressly prohibits everything of that kind, and the restriction cannot be said to be in accordance with Irish ideas. No; it is done to suit English ideas, and the very same persons who are responsible for this restriction are continually telling us that in Scotland and Wales there ought to be local option on the subject of religious establishments and endowments. In Ireland, however, there is to be no local option on that subject. Then it has been constantly said that we have not duly considered the wishes of the great majority of the Irish people as to University education; and one might have thought that the power of establishing or supporting out of public funds Roman Catholic Colleges, or a denominational Roman Catholic University, would be given to the Irish Parliament; but the power is withheld from them. There is also the question of trade and commercial relations. All the Colonies have the right to deal with that subject as they like, and is it not quite certain that according to Irish ideas Ireland ought to have the same power? Do you think that restrictions of this sort, which are contrary to colonial precedent and at variance with the fundamental principle upon which this measure is based, are likely to be maintained? But those who have thought it right to impose these restrictions have done a very curious thing; for these exceptions and restrictions relate only to legislation, and do not apply to Resolutions. Considering what might be done by way of Resolutions in critical and dangerous times, the reason of the limitation is not easy to find. Regency is among the subjects mentioned; but that is the very subject on which Grattan's Parliament proceeded, not by Bill, but by Resolution, in a manner involving conflict with the British Parliament—Volunteers also are mentioned. In the time of Grattan we know that there was a great body of Volunteers in Ireland, self-paid and self-equipped. What is there to prevent the Irish Legislature from passing a Resolution in encouragement of a similar body of Volunteers? What is there to prevent them from standing by while these Volunteers may be raised, and extending approval to their enrolment? As to the veto, I wish to ask, is it to be used, or is it not? Are you going to abide by, or depart from, the precedents afforded by the Colonies? I say deliberately that in our self-governing Colonies the veto is not used except for temporary and suspensory purposes, and that if a Colonial Legislature should persevere, even with a Bill to which grave objections might be made, and which would introduce anomalies which it would be very desirable to prevent, the veto after a time would be withdrawn and the Colonial Legislature would have its way. What reason is there to suppose that it will be otherwise in Ireland? And if it should be, what would be the consequences? Perpetual Motions in the House of Commons that the veto should be used, or that it should not be used, and intolerable friction between the Imperial and the Irish Parliament. The Lord Lieutenant would be the vehicle for conveying the opinion of British Ministers to his own Ministers; but I doubt greatly whether he would be able to do anything whatever proprio vigore in matters affected by the restrictions and limitations in this measure. Then as to the Exchequer Judges. In the United States the authority of the Federal Court is not merely a judicial authority, but it is armed with Executive powers, and the President has further Executive powers behind to support the Court and its officers. Here you have two Judges taken out of the general body of the Irish Bench, and appointed by the Ministers in England. What are they to do? They are only to have cognisance of and to regulate certain proceedings in the ordinary course of law, and if they make decrees in any of those proceedings which are not obeyed, they may appoint some person to carry them out; but, against popular opposition, and with support from the Executive Government, what could any person, who might be so appointed, do? What power will this country have, short of war, to compel the Irish Government to execute the Exchequer Judges' decrees? Resistance to judicial decrees is not an unheard-of thing. There was the case of the successful resistance of Georgia to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there is the recent case of the Corporation of Limerick, which has hitherto defied successfully the order of the Irish Courts that it should raise and pay certain sums for services rendered by the Constabulary. You may say that none of these things will occur. I should be equally entitled to say that they all will. It is not necessary, however, to go as far as that. We must remember that we are not legislating for to-day or to-morrow; we must consider what may happen in the course of time and in various contingencies—what might happen, for example, if we were embroiled with the United States, or with France, and engaged in controversies that might lead to war. In this Bill the dragon's teeth are sown in every clause. It is not a measure of finality, in the sense of a settlement, likely, in its general substance, not to be disturbed. The temporary and provisional character of its financial and other arrangements even invites disturbance. What are the means by which it has been obtained? They are written at large in the Report of the Special Commission of 1888-90. It has been practically a capitulation by the Government to a certain organisation in Ireland. We are told that when the wishes of Ireland are strongly expressed they ought to be considered, upon the principle of conciliation as against what is called coercion. Why that principle should be good for the purpose of forcing this Bill upon the country, and have no application to the natural consequences of the Bill, it is very difficult to see. If an Irish Legislature were set up, it would be filled by ambitious men seeking to gain power and popularity in the country, each Party by bidding the highest, and it is impossible to set bounds to their ambition. Mr. Parnell said, in 1885, that neither he nor his friends ever could or would attempt to set bounds to the national aspirations of Ireland; and nobody can pretend that this Bill fulfils, or nearly fulfils, those aspirations. It is said that the administration of the country by an Irish Parliament would add to the material comforts of Ireland; but I have never heard any man make an intelligible suggestion as to the way in which it would add to the material comforts of Ireland. But, my Lords, even if it did, the Nationalists would be encouraged by that very fact to demand that they should have freer play. On the other hand, if it should fail in producing that effect, discontent would be aroused, which would give an immediate impulse to the disposition to ask for larger powers. What has been the action of the Nationalist Party in the past? Have they ever contented themselves, in what they have said in past times, with asking for such a mongrel Constitution as this? The question with them has always been not how far they should go, but how far they could go, and now Mr. Redmond says expressly that this Bill is provisional, and can be accepted only as an instalment. There are, no doubt, others who now roar like sucking "doves": they may be sincere; but were they not equally sincere when they formerly spoke as Mr. Redmond does now? And what is to prevent their returning to their former state of mind? What does the National League say now? What do their American sympathisers say now? And in what direction do the voices of past Irish history, the voices and the examples of the great men of the past—of O'Connell and Mr. Grattan, and Mr. Gladstone's own denunciations of the Union lead them? Grattan used language as strong as language could be about the absolute right of equality, about going on to get more, about the folly of speaking of gratitude or ingratitude in these national matters, about making use of the opportunities arising out of foreign complications. And Grattan would take nothing less than the exclusive power of an Irish Legislature to make laws for Ireland on all subjects ; and he got from the British Parliament what he demanded. All these examples only point in one direction, the direction of going on and not being contented. Nor is there in this any reproach to anybody. In the circumstances in which Members of the Irish Legislature would be placed they would have a perfect right to pursue their ambition. We are asked to pass this Bill as an act of faith, but I prefer reason. And now, my Lords, I have only one other subject to touch upon, and that is the question, Has there been a mandate for this Bill from the country such as your Lordships ought to recognise ? Looking to Ireland, you find that the great majority of Ulster, by no means the least important and powerful among the constituent parts of Ireland, is entirely against it, so that it cannot be said that there is anything like a desire or mandate from a united Ireland ; and the majority in Great Britain shows that there is no mandate from that part of the United Kingdom. How has the question been brought to its present position ? Suddenly in 1885 the idea was taken up. In 1886 the Bills of that year were introduced. Parliament decided against them, and the country decided against them on a Dissolution. During the years of political agitation which followed nothing was more assiduously instilled into the minds of the people than the fact that that Bill was dead. Still, the agitation went on for two or three years, founded chiefly upon attempts to discredit all that was being done for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland. Then came a change. Mr. Atherley Jones, a Liberal Member of advanced opinions, and beyond doubt an honest man, wrote a paper in a certain periodical, in which he frankly stated that the English Liberals generally did not care about Home Rule for Ireland but wanted other things ; and that the only way towards success was to urge those other things forward. It was not long before his advice was taken. From about that time the Home Rule Question was presented, like Richard the Third, between the two Bishops ; but its sponsors were many more than two, and some of them, perhaps, not so good as they were represented to be. And when this Bill was announced in the Speech from the Throne it was with a bodyguard of 10 or more other measures, in defiance of the rule established by authority and experience, that many great things cannot be done in the same Session ; and obviously with a view to obtain sectional support for a Bill which could not otherwise be carried. And now that Bill is before your Lordships, passed in the House of Commons by a majority of the Irish Members against a majority of the Representatives of Great Britain ; and if there be any duty, the shrinking or retreating from which would be an act of the most abject meanness and cowardice, it is the duty of giving to the British people an opportunity of saying whether, upon this subject, they agree with the majority of their own Representatives or not.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Earl of ROSEBURY) : My Lords, I am quite sure I speak the feeling of everybody in this House when I say that we have heard the speech of the noble and illustrious Earl—an effort remarkable at any age, but much more remarkable when we consider the advanced age at which he has arrived—with the greatest satisfaction and admiration. I do not deny that on this side of the House at any rate that satisfaction is somewhat of a mingled kind. It has been our fate in the past to hear the noble and learned Earl speaking on the side of the House and on the side of the question which we ourselves espoused, but I can assure him that we take his rebukes patiently. They are not mingled with any of the venom of those which we sometimes receive, and we give him all the credit that we demand ourselves for conscientious opinion. The speech of the noble Earl, as I heard it, divided itself into two distinct parts. The last part was of a kind with which all readers of history are familiar, in which the word “capitulation” frequently occurred, and from which the phrase “unknown and rash experiments” was not absent ; exactly the type of speech, in fact, which has been made against every great reform of the century—Catholic Emancipation, the first Reform Bill, and the Repeal of the Corn Laws. The first part of the speech was of a more detailed character. I do not propose, and, indeed, I should not be competent, to follow the noble and learned Earl in that critical and legal examination of the Bill to which he subjected it with the arts of a great lawyer, the arts of a great Chancellor, but I hope he will not think me disrespectful if I say that that argument, elaborate and interesting as it was, only added to the unreality of the Debate in which we have been taking part. He supplied in one of his closing sentences the reason why it is unnecessary to discuss the criticisms which he has submitted to your Lordships, because, he said, "you are not legislating for to-day or for to-morrow." He was right. We are legislating for this day six months. This is not a dissecting room; it is the chamber of death itself. Somewhere in the passage, in that short Lobby that leads from the House of Commons to the House of Lords, this Bill caught its death of some passing chill; and it is, if I may say so humbly, an interesting but an academic discussion, unreal in every part and particle of it to which we have been listening for the last three days. If any Peer will say that he came here with his mind open to argument, prepared to consider the Bill on its merits, prepared, if necessary, listening either to the accents of noble Lords below the Gangway or to the accents of the noble Lords above, either to accept or to reject this Bill according to the arguments that were offered, I confess he will have made a very considerable breach in the opinion that I have formed of this Debate. Your Lordships observe that I have waited a moment for any noble Lord to rise and state that his mind was in that state of angelic candour, but as none has chosen to place himself in that position I may take it for granted that my opinion is correct, and that none of your Lordships has entered this House except with a preconceived resolution for or against the Bill. I think that from one or two noble Peers I did hear with a sort of blushing diffidence that they were of opinion that this Bill would ultimately be rejected. The other reason for which this discussion has been unreal and academical is that there is no equal division of Parties in this House. There is only one Party in this House and a percentage of another. I do not know what is the exact number of the legion which my noble Friend who leads this House with consummate ability professes to muster under his standard; but I venture to think it would be most fitly described by the couplet that Sidney Smith put into his description of the salad—

"Let onion atoms lurk within the bowl
And, half suspected, animate the whole."

Under the circumstances of this Debate it is scarcely remarkable that the speeches have divided themselves mainly into two categories and classes. There are the speeches of denunciation, and among these I will give a high and honoured rank to the speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), whom I do not see in his place, who told us with an engaging candour that he could not treat this subject with rosewater. I have nothing to say except in a spirit of gratitude of the noble Duke. He treated me in a spirit to which I am entirely unaccustomed from him, and, if I may reverse an expression in Scripture, I expected a stone and he gave me bread. He was good enough to praise a little book which I not long ago published. He read extracts from that little book, as if they were in any respect damaging to the position of the Government regarding Home Rule. From not one of the statements he read out, or from any of the statements in that little book, have I seen the slightest cause to recede; but at the same time, it does not in any degree impair my general loyalty to the course which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government. One of the great specialities of the noble Duke is this—that he is always going to make a speech about Home Rule on every subject which may present itself to your Lordships, but that he never gets to Home Rule. Just as he is approaching it, just as we think we are on the clue to the argument for which we have so long sought, he is seized by that fatal and malignant disease to which he is more subject, perhaps, than any other of the many invalids who suffer under it in both Houses of Parliament—lues Gladstoniana. He is led away by some morbid spirit to discuss and analyze the views and the speeches of the statesman whom he is proud and pleased to call, in every term of affection, his "right hon. Friend." I do not see why candour should not reign among friends, but I do think the noble Duke reads more into the character of my right hon. Friend than even his greatest admirers have been able to perceive. He reminds me of the lines in The Rejected Addresses—

“Who makes the quartern loaf and Luddites rise?”

Who fills the butchers' shops with large blue flies?”

I cannot help thinking that as my right hon. Friend and the noble Duke advanced along the vale of years, the flies perceived by the noble Duke get larger and bluer on every occasion. I know that we on this Bench are below his notice. We are merely Gladstonian items, blind tools of an imperious and, if I rightly understood him, a partially insane Prime Minister. It is some little comfort, under these circumstances, to find out that he had once been one of these Gladstonian items himself. I had almost forgotten the lapse of time since he left the Liberal Party, but he reminded us last night, with a good deal of expression and force, that he had been a Member of a Cabinet that had proposed a Bill which he considered eminently absurd—a confession which I do not suppose that any one of my colleagues on that Bench, who have been longer in Gladstonian Cabinets than I have been myself, has been able to make on this or any other occasion. I pass from the choice specimen of invective provided by the noble Duke to the more full-flavoured, and perhaps from my point of view equally interesting, specimen provided by the noble Marquess last night. It was one of the most interesting speeches I ever heard in my life. It was like a dictionary of animated quotations. He had an enormous mass of elegant extracts in his hand, and he read them out sometimes from Irish sources and sometimes from Ministerial sources. He is bitten by a disease parallel, but not exactly similar, to that under which the Duke of Argyll is suffering. His disease is the morbus Spenceranus. As I heard him, I began faintly to imagine the course of debate in an Irish Second Chamber when that Irish Second Chamber should come into being, because it was like a Cicero of Ulster denouncing a Cataline of Cork with outstretched fingers, piercing eyes, and quivering at every interruption; and I am glad to find that my noble Friend is able to be present on the Ministerial Bench this evening without any material deterioration of his health. I said there were two classes into which the speeches of this Debate divided themselves. One is mainly the speech of invective. That, I confess, is the speech I myself prefer, as being more lively. The other is the speech of detailed examination of the measure that you have determined to destroy. I do not know why noble Lords think it right to fire this sort of military salute over the grave of this Bill. Every one of their speeches is couched in the spirit of Marc Antony's speech in the Senate House—“I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him.” We do not expect praise of the Bill from noble Lords below the Gangway or from noble Lords opposite; but I think they might, under the very delicate circumstances of the case, spare us any detailed criticism, or, in fact, any detailed reasons founded on the Bill, when they have already made up their minds so completely upon what they are resolved to do with it. May I take three instances of what I mean? I will take the instance of the noble and learned Earl who has just sat down. He discussed at great length, and with every variety of treatment, the question of the retention of the Irish Members in Parliament. Now, I say that the retention of the Irish Members in Parliament, though a very important detail, though an organic detail, is only a detail still; and that if the noble and learned Earl had any genuine and sincere wish to discuss this Bill on its merits, he might perfectly well have voted for the Second Reading, reserving this point of the retention of the 80 Irish Members for a subsequent discussion in Committee. I think he might give us some credit for the fact that the retention or exclusion of the Irish Members is not a point unattended altogether by difficulty. In 1886 we proposed their entire exclusion. From what I understand to-night the noble and learned Earl has a preference for that course. I wish he had told us so in 1886.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I did.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I am greatly obliged to the noble and learned Earl; the circumstances escaped my recollection. What we did hear were much louder voices demanding the retention of the Irish Members as essential to the integrity and supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. If the noble and learned Earl prefers that course, I can tell him that, as far as I can gather from his public speeches, he has a very illustrious Colleague in that preference—no less than the Prime Minister himself. No one who read the speech of the Prime Minister on the Second Reading—no one who has read his speeches in the country, will doubt that it was owing to the overwhelming pressure of public opinion, both within and without his Party, that he gave way on that particular point to the wishes of those around him. And I must say this about the rather jaunty manner in which noble Lords opposite bestow their criticism on this Bill: They seem to think that any criticism is fatal to any clause; as if the Bills which they are in the habit of introducing are essentially perfect and unamendable; and that the subject with which we have had to deal, if properly dealt with, presented no difficulty at all. To-night I would ask to waive all discussion of the Bill, for the reason that in my opinion, first, that discussion is an unreal discussion; and, secondly, the point on which we are at issue to-night is much larger than this Bill, or than any Bill. It is the vast question of the policy which we propose for Ireland—a policy which, on the one side, is founded on the experience of the past, and which, on the other side, is in the womb of the future. I cannot help thinking that in taking this view of this discussion, and in making it a question of a policy and not of a Bill, we might do something to raise both the Debate and ourselves. We might do something better than chew the dry bones of the Bill, or what has been left of them, by the keen and unwearied teeth of the House of Commons, and we might at least desist from the petty and pitiful personal recrimination which has been too often indulged in. There is not one of you, my Lords, who in his heart believes that we are Separatist and traitors and place-hunters. There is not one sane Member of your Lordships' House who believes in the imputations which are made freely outside though not inside this House on the honesty of our motives. And we, on our side, do not believe that you are statesmen anxious to tyrannise and ride roughshod over the Irish people, and imbrue your hands in Irish gore. The truth is very simple: and if we were to open our eyes to and recognise that truth we should greatly facilitate discussion. We are two political Parties disagreeing as to the best practical method of governing and conciliating Ireland. That is a very great question in itself. No much greater question could occupy us. It is a question which has puzzled the wisest minds of ages past; and I do not believe that we, in attempting to arrive at an honest conclusion on this subject, will much further our purpose by blackening the political morality of a political Party. You may be certain, in regard to this controversy, of the infallibility of the course you have pursued or propose to pursue. I may frankly say that I am by no means sure of mine. I am not certain about anything with regard to Ireland. [Opposition cheers.] I was never more gratified than by those cheers. They show that there are some points, at least, on which noble Lords opposite have not yet made up their minds definitely. They are not quite certain about Ireland. That is, at least, a ray of hope. I say that I am not certain about Ireland; but I can at least say this—that I have come to the conclusion at which I have arrived after a long and painful study—that I have arrived at the convictions which I hold in the teeth of all, or almost all, that would tend to make me take the other side. We here have known the bitterest pang that can fall to public men to suffer. We have known the separation from colleagues and friends. We have known not merely separation from colleagues, but the bitterness of their denunciations of us; and I venture to say that if we had been anxious to lead a quiet life or a pleasant life, if we had been willing to sacrifice our convictions, as you think or assert that we have sacrificed them, it would not have been in the direction which we are pursuing that we should have gone. My Lords, I say, then, to-night that it is not the Bill but the policy which is at issue, and nobody knows that better than your Lordships who sit over against me. Your treatment of the Bill shows it both in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons. It seems to me that there were in the House of Commons two logical courses to pursue, and only two, with regard to the Bill. The first was to say that you could not touch it in any shape or form ; that you would have no dealings with the accursed thing ; that you would vote for its rejection on the Second Reading ; and that nothing would induce you to incur any responsibility for any detail of the Bill, of which you have so great a horror. The other course was this. Having accepted the Second Reading as the expression of the voice of Ireland on its own destiny, and the voice of the House of Commons as to what it thought best for Ireland, that you should endeavour at any rate to manipulate it in order to get it as much to your minds as possible. And I am perfectly certain of this—and I am speaking without consultation with, but in the hearing of, many of my colleagues—that if you had taken that second course, and frankly accepted the principle of some large measure of local legislation in Ireland, and had offered bonâ fide suggestions with a view of bringing that to pass in a manner consonant, as you believed, with the safety and the integrity of the Empire, we should have held out not one, but both, hands to welcome your assistance. My Lords, the Opposition in the House of Commons did not care to take either course. The course pursued reminded me of a very interesting national sport to which, perhaps, none of your Lordships are addicted—I mean the Spanish bull-fight. The bull-fight in Spain is a national and almost sacred institution. They have to kill the bull—that is the primary purpose. You had to kill the Bill—that was your primary purpose ; and you went about it very much in the same way. The first act of the drama is when the toreadors, or lance-bearers, attack the bull openly. The bull generally gets the better of them, and they are hurried from the scene. That stage is analogous to the Second Reading of our Bill. Then comes the stage when the light infantry of the bull-ring—I never can pronounce their name, but I could write it on paper—attempt to fix light darts into the bull, to prick it all over, and to annoy and exasperate it in every way, not for the purpose of killing it or wounding it seriously, but apparently out of general “cussedness.” That, I think, reflects not unfaithfully the Committee stage of the Bill. Then comes the last and most solemn process of all, when the matador comes into the ring. In one hand he holds the sword for the purpose of killing the bull, and in the other a cloak with which to mislead the bull as to his intentions. And I think I recognise in the noble Marquess opposite the features of the matador. The contrast in the treatment of the Bill by the two Houses is very remarkable. The House of Commons lingered over it with a sort of affectionate solicitude. If they saw the slightest danger of its departure they hastily pinned new sheets of Amendments to its wings, and it might be said almost that they viewed its appearance and disappearance with equal regret. I do not know of anything like it since the occasion when the well-known traveller, Herman Melville, was surrounded by almost every luxury and attention on the Island of Tahiti, when nothing was too good for him, and he enjoyed it all, till he found out that it was only preparing him for a meal that was subsequently to take place on his own fattened carcass. But the House of Lords treats this Bill in a very different spirit. It gives it a very short shrift indeed. Less than a week is sufficient from the time of its leaving the House of Commons for its destruction in the House of Lords. Here there are none of those little attentions which distinguished it in the House of Commons. There are no Amendments, no Instructions to the Committee, and no Committee to instruct. I do not know that there is anything which this Bill in its treatment so much resembles as the old recipe for cooking a pike. You fill the pike with everything that is most rich, rare, and toothsome in quality, and having done that you fling the pike out of the window as being of no value at all. This was very humorous behaviour of the Tory Party in the House of Commons, and it is not altogether without humour in the House of Lords. But surely your conduct is hardly respectful to your colleagues in the House of Commons. At what price do you value all their ability, their energy, and their time ? I know that they did not attempt obstruction ; such a course as that they would indignantly repudiate. But they did attempt legislation. They did succeed in introducing some clauses into the Bill ; and the result of all their efforts, of all their quips and cranks, of all their philippics, of all their physical and even pugilistic encounters is that at the moment the Bill arrives at the House of Lords you have nothing to say to it except to tell it to begone. I do not know whether we are to consider that the course of the House of Commons was entirely a matter of blowing soap bubbles; that it was merely a sham fight; that it was merely the playing of a big fish, while confident in the knowledge that the noble Duke was on the bank ready with the gaff for it. There was one very instructive illustration of the way in which this Bill was treated by the Conservative Party in the House of Commons. And when I say the Conservative Party, I do not mean the free and uncontrollable free-lances of the Conservative Party, but the solid and respectable and almost venerable occupants of the Front Bench. I will take the clause on which the noble and learned Earl has spent so much time to-night, the 9th clause—now, I think, the 10th. Let us apply to that the test of either not touching “the accursed thing,” or only touching the “accursed thing” in order to amend it in some given and fruitful direction. On July 10 the Front Conservative Bench voted in Committee for retaining the whole of the 103 Members instead of 80 to vote for Imperial purposes. That was a large and liberal allowance, even larger and more liberal than the noble and learned Earl would be inclined to concede. This was the way in which the Conservative Opposition in the House of Commons endeavoured to avoid the evil of too large an Irish mixture in the Imperial Parliament. The same day they voted on an Amendment by Mr. Heneage for the total exclusion of all the Irish Members. On July 11 an Amendment was proposed by Mr. Seton-Karr to reduce the number to 48; on July 13 they voted in favour of the “in-and-out” arrangement against Mr. Gladstone’s final proposal of 80 Members for all purposes; and, last, they voted to omit the clause together. [“Hear, hear!”] “Hear, hear,” says the noble Viscount opposite. Will the noble Viscount tell me the object of these tactics? Was it to bring Parliamentary Institutions into contempt? I do not credit the noble Viscount, one of the pillars of the Constitution, with any such nefarious design; but to the rank outsider, the arm-chair critic, it appears as if the real design was to bring Parliamentary Institutions into disrepute. It has had that effect; I do not know whether it was meant to bring them into disrepute and invite some Cromwell to put an end to them both for Imperial and Irish purposes. I say that, great as has been the responsibility of the House of Commons in this matter, your responsibility is ten-fold greater. You have undertaken a tremendous responsibility. I will not ask what means you have taken to fortify yourselves for the contest in which you are preparing to enter. I will say nothing as to the general position of this House. I have never concealed my opinion as to the unfortunate position of an unreformed House of Lords. On two occasions I have brought that subject before your Lordships. For any Peer holding the opinions that I do to bring any subject in any circumstances before this House is merely waste of time and breath. But I will say this, and I say it in sober seriousness, without any wish to say anything that could be disagreeable to the noble Marquess opposite, for whose abilities I entertain a sincere admiration. I do believe that perhaps the gravest reproach that posterity and history will bring against his six years of government is this—that he made no serious attempt to reform the Second Chamber, which, after all, is the pillar of the Conservative Party. I am sure that he himself will be the last to disclaim any such description for the little Bill which was being withdrawn by the late Mr. Smith in the House of Commons at the time he was about to explain it to us in the House of Lords. But, my Lords, I venture to think, with regard to this contest in which you are about to engage, there is a particular consideration which should have not much less weight with you than the general consideration which I have submitted to you. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Zetland) alluded the other night, in terms of some disparagement, to the fact that the Benches behind the Government were not swarming with Irish Peers. Well, they do not usually swarm with Peers of any kind, and I do not particularly know why on this occasion they should swarm with Irish Peers. There are, as I see from a Return recently issued, 113 Irish Peers who have seats, I think, in this House. I want to know—because it is an important fact, at least an important factor in fighting five-sixths of the popular representation of Ireland—how many of those Irish Peers can be said in any sense whatever to represent any part of Ireland, except that fraction of a Province which you choose for your own purposes to call the loyal Province of Ulster? I say it without the slightest desire to say anything that may be offensive to Irish Peers opposite; but, at the same time, it is true. The noble Lord (Lord Muskerry), who spoke with great vehemence from behind the Opposition Bench the other night, told us two or three times in the course of his speech that he knew all about Ireland. That is not the question. The question on this occasion is—I do not wish to put it offensively—what does Ireland know about him? Does he represent Ireland in any shape or form? Because, if this House is going with 113 Irish Peers—who, I venture to say, can only represent one class in Ireland—to enter into a contest with the House of Commons on a subject in which they are face to face with five-sixths of the Irish representation, on a subject which concerns all and every class in Ireland, then I say they are very insufficiently equipped for the battle. My Lords, that was a digression about the House of Lords. But, with regard to your responsibility, I repeat that, in my opinion, your responsibility with regard to this Bill is infinitely greater than that of the House of Commons. I will tell you why. It is because you are masters of the situation, and you have the power absolutely in your hands. The noble Duke who moved the rejection of this Bill, and whose speech I had the misfortune not to hear, at Ilkley recently spoke of the reasons which made him desirous to move the rejection of this Bill. One of the reasons he gave was that the Bill has not had adequate opportunity of discussion. Now, I say, you are in the position of being able to give it the fullest and freest opportunities of discussion. If your objection to this Bill was really on the ground that it had not had sufficient discussion, you could in a moment put an end to that complaint, and give it more discussion than any Bill ever received. You could, if you have any wish to settle this Irish Question in a way in which I have sometimes felt it will be settled—by an agreement between both the political Parties—you have an opportunity on this occasion, which I suppose you are going to throw away, of obtaining adequate discussion, and of having a Conference which should settle the terms on which Ireland should have self-government in the future—a Conference not less elaborate, not less important, and not less representative than that which met in May, 1787, to settle the matchless Constitution of the United States. You may say that you do not wish to have anything to do with any form of Home Rule. But that is not the case. I do not know what it may be with noble Lords opposite; but, after all, noble Lords must remember that many of the reforms they have opposed with the greatest ferocity they have come to propose themselves in course of time; and, therefore, they must not be too absolutely certain that this is the course they are always likely to pursue on this question. But with regard to the Liberal Unionist Leaders the case is very different indeed. We have the election addresses of Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Hartington in 1886, in which they plainly state and lay down the fact that after all Home Rule is mainly a question of degree, and they state the limitations succinctly and definitely within which they may be prepared to grant Home Rule. Are they of that opinion now? If so, the noble Duke was singularly ill-advised in moving the rejection of this Bill, because what might you have done? You might have allowed the Second Reading to pass sub silentio, or have carried it with any form of protest which your Lordships chose; but when you got into Committee you might have modelled the Bill to your liking. You might have struck out every clause you disliked—perhaps you will say that would be every clause—then it would have been open to you to substitute what clauses you preferred. You might have had an opportunity—which, of course, you are not going to take—of declaring and defining your policy with regard to this great question of Ireland. Your Bill might then have gone down to the House of Commons, where it would have met, no doubt, with a stout resistance. But what would ultimately have come about, what would have happened if you and they had both insisted on the mass of your Amendments? A Conference would have taken place between the two Houses which might have led to a fruitful result ; and I say that the patriotic course for your Lordships to have taken, unless you have determined never to devolve any local business to Ireland, was to give this Bill a Second Reading, and take an opportunity of settling with the other House. I find that suggestion receives very little favour from noble Lords opposite. I can quite understand the prospect of spending laborious days and nights in Committee right through September, far into October, with, perhaps, a Conference in November, is not particularly inviting ; but I am not sure, according to the precedent we have before us, that we are not likely to spend a great deal more time in other ways if some such course as this is not adopted. We have been constantly taunted by noble Lords opposite with changing our minds in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the bidding of a scarcely responsible politician. For us, after all, knowing what our fate in the Division is likely to be, this is the main question :—"How did it come about that in the year 1886 a great English Party, comprising responsible men—an ex-Viceroy of Ireland and an ex-Chief Secretary—deliberately proposed a measure of Home Rule, a measure which they resisted for 80 years ?" The noble Earl has given his history ; and I should like, on the other hand, to be allowed to give mine, because, after all, it is a point on which our characters are at stake, and I think we ought to be heard. I speak as a witness, but not as an enthusiastic witness, in favour of Home Rule. With me, at any rate, if I may speak for one moment of myself, Home Rule is not a fanaticism ; it is not a question of sentiment ; it is scarcely even a question of history. It is not a counsel of perfection ; but it is, on the whole, the best of our courses to be pursued in dealing with a highly critical and complex subject. With me, at any rate, it is merely a question of policy politic, and as such alone I argue it. I argue it simply as a question of policy, and I take it no higher and no lower than that. It seems to me that the function of any one who pretends to be a statesman is to attempt to sever what is really wheat from what is really chaff. It is a long and laborious process, and it is attempting to do that with regard to the Irish Question that I have become a supporter of Home Rule. I will go one step further. I say that I am not an enthusiastic witness on this subject, and I will make one or two other admissions. The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) spoke strongly last night about the Union ; he said it was a matter of necessity, and I entirely agree with the noble Duke. I believe that there is scarcely any statesman who, if he had been in Mr. Pitt's place, confronted with such a war as that which he had to face, confronted with the Rebellion of 1798, would not have sought in that remedy a refuge and a guarantee against Irish disaffection. But I must also add this—the Union was only a portion of Mr. Pitt's policy. I believe that if the whole of his policy has been adopted ; if the payment of the Catholic clergy, if Catholic Emancipation, if the abolition of tithes had all been carried concurrently with the Act of Union, we should not now be discussing a Home Rule Bill. So far we seem to be in some measure of accord. But, unfortunately, much has happened since the Union. The Duke of Argyll said that the last utterance of Grattan was in favour of the Union. Well, I think the most striking sentence in all Grattan's speeches occurs in the last of those speeches ; and it is not favourable to the Union. It is this—"The ocean protests against separation, and the sea against the Union." What he meant, I take it, was this—that while separation from the Imperial control of Great Britain was impossible because of the ocean which surrounds these islands, it was equally impossible, because of the sea that separated them, to attempt to administer Irish local affairs at Westminster. That is all the admission I have to make with regard to the history of the question. I had some other quotations from Mr. Barton and Mr. Lecky with regard to it, but it is not necessary to labour it further. Our views of Home Rule are founded upon history ; but they are founded on a history somewhat more recent than that of the Union—on very recent history indeed. The noble and learned Earl said, very truly, that the departure in favour of Home Rule was taken in 1885. Now,

I am going to approach a subject on which the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition is extremely sensitive, and I shall be greatly surprised if I get to the end of my few sentences without an interruption or interpellation from him. What occurred in 1885 to make this charge in our course? It was simply this. We left Office upon a side issue; I think it was a vote with regard to the Beer Duties.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The Budget.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: It is a matter of perfect indifference. We went out prepared to renew certain clauses of the Coercion Act, certain clauses which we thought necessary with our detailed knowledge of Irish administration and affairs. The noble Marquess came in. Last night the noble Marquess said he was most unwilling to come in—that he was forced to come in. That is very much at variance with my recollection. I do not, of course, know what the internal feelings of the noble Marquess were; that no one can judge but himself. If he means that he was obliged to come in because his followers wished him to come in, I believe that what he says is strictly and accurately true. But if he says he was in any sense forced to come in by our Government his memory is playing him a trick. What occurred was this: I remember perfectly well. The noble Marquess entered into some negotiations with the outgoing Government as to the measure of support he would receive if he was prepared to take Office.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Only between and during the interval that was to elapse before the General Election.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: Of course. The noble Lord did not ask for a blind support for his policy for ever. He would have asked for too much if he had. What he did ask for was the support of the Government until the General Election took place, and he said that without that support he would not take Office. We were unable to give him that support; we told him so; and yet he took Office. Therefore I am under the impression that if there was any compulsion on the noble Marquess to take Office it was not, as he implied, from this side of the House, but it was from his own side. What happened? The noble Marquess without the slightest examination into the facts of the case, without even the 24 hours he thought necessary in 1886 to examine the state of Ireland, without any possible examination of the state of the case, said he was determined to try the experiment of governing Ireland without what was called coercion. That was a very grave announcement, because it cut altogether the ground from beneath the feet of the Liberal Party. Coercion is a valuable instrument, but coercion demands continuity. If either Party is prepared, as a matter of Party politics, to abandon any idea of administering coercion without regard to the circumstances of the case, from that time coercion becomes impossible. I will give an illustration, but I will not give it as from myself; it would not be proper to do so, because of the office I have the honour to hold. I remember that Mr. Chamberlain, in a famous and much-quoted speech, said that the rule of England in Ireland was parallel to that of Russia in Poland or of Austria in Venice. I do not know what takes place in Poland now. Therefore I would rather take the case of Austria in Venice, which is now merely matter of history. Austria held Venice entirely by coercion. Would Austria have been able to hold Venice if every four or five years a Party was to come in and announce that it had not examined the case, but was prepared to drop coercion? Does it stand to common sense? The Venetians might have been better off, but the rule of Austria as described by Mr. Chamberlain would have come to an end, and that is important. The Liberal Party, forced, and I think happily forced, from coercion, was obliged to try a new experiment and a new departure. We were face to face not merely with the abandonment of coercion by the Party opposite, but we were also face to face with the moral and material failure of the Act of Union to secure prosperity to Ireland. What was the proof of the moral failure? It was that 80 or 90 Members out of 100 came back from Ireland prepared to strike a mortal blow at that Union. The proof of the material failure was given last night, copiously and with much wealth of statistics, by Lord Playfair in his extremely interesting speech. The late Lord Chancellor of Ireland cast a good deal of ridicule upon statistics of potatoes grown to the acre now as compared with former days, and seemed to think these details were beneath the notice of a statesman; but I venture to think that, if the proverb correctly describes as the greatest benefactor of his species the man who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before, it is not unnatural to take the correlative view, and say that that Government is not the greatest benefactor of its species that makes one blade grow where two grew before. We then were driven, and not unwillingly driven, to the policy of Home Rule; all other policies we had tried and failed; this alone remained, and we tried it. The Bill of 1886 was introduced with a burst of enthusiasm, and rejected by a considerable majority in the House of Commons, and at the polls by an overwhelming majority. I do not regret that defeat, and I am sure noble Lords opposite will not regret it either. I do not regret it, because it was good for the Liberal Party to have a full experience in opposition of the advantage of the measure they had proposed in 1886 by contrast with the policy proposed by their successors. It was good also, because it made the Irish Party more known to the Liberal Party; and, in the third place, because it tested the professions of the Government and of their Liberal Unionist supporters. The professions of the Liberal Unionists were to have no coercion and no land purchase. Since that time circumstances have widely changed. There has been a Land Purchase Bill involving an expenditure of £10,000,000, and there has been a Coercion Bill accompanied by the curt instruction—"Do not hesitate, if necessary, to shoot." And this confirms our view, that the course we had chosen was the one and only alternative to coercion. After that experience we came to this Bill. But we have also other motives besides history for coming to this conclusion. We have, in the first place, an Irish representation which is almost unanimously in favour of it. We have also the difficulty of understanding Ireland in England, which seems to me to be as great now as it was when we first began to govern her. I do not suppose that all wedded unions of over the year old are in the precise position to gain the historic fitch of bacon at the end of 12 months, but even then they are not always considered a failure. But what is to be held of a couple who, after a silver or a golden wedding, come to the Divorce Court on the ground of incompatibility of temper? That is the case with regard to Ireland. We had, besides that, the necessity of devolution on both Imperial and local considerations. We were sick of always voting Bills that the Irish always opposed, and we were sick of voting money that the Irish always disregarded. I myself would have preferred some scheme of devolution which would have been applicable to all countries alike in the United Kingdom, such as that I indicated in that speech at Paisley, which has formed so favourite a theme with the Opposition. But you cannot get all you want. There is a fatal objection to an equal scheme of devolution. The maximum you want for England would not be the minimum you want for Ireland, and so you would cause discontent to both parties without achieving your object. And we had, further, this object, that we wanted to get Ireland out of the way. We want to get Ireland out of the way in order that the time and energy that it engrossed in our Parliament might be better given to other purposes. There is another motive that I would wish to give for this Home Rule policy, and it is perhaps a more homely one. It is to some extent a feeling of mortified pride that makes the Liberal Party take up Home Rule. No one can doubt that if you could set Ireland afloat at this moment and float her across the ocean till she reached the shores of America, within 10 years, as a State of the Union, she would be as prosperous and contented as any other State of the Union. I say it is a reproach to our Empire, to our Government, and to our Parliament that, while we covet every square inch of unoccupied ground that we can administer of the world, right at the core of our Empire there is, and there has been for seven or eight centuries, a difficulty, we openly confess, but with which we are hopelessly unable to deal. May I give two other reasons—reasons which are usually given as arguments against Home Rule, but which make me a Home Ruler at this time? The first is the phrase that is constantly used—the “dismemberment of the Empire.” A more meaningless phrase was never invented. It is because I wish to avert a practical dismemberment of the Empire that I stand before your Lordships as a supporter of Home Rule to-night. There has only been one great dismemberment of the Empire. That occurred about a century ago. It was when the United States broke off from their allegiance and set up as a separate State across the Atlantic. What was the cause of that dismemberment? Was it because of too great a respect for their local aspirations? No, it was your insisting on establishing your own views of law and order in that country, in disregard of the wishes of the colonists. And what I fear is this—that if we do not arrive at some such scheme as we propose, and I do not pledge myself to the details of the scheme, we shall have that practical dismemberment, which is implied by Ireland sullen, discontented, and rebellious, always at our side. There is another ground on which I am a supporter of Home Rule. It is constantly urged as an objection to any such Bill. It is on the ground of foreign policy. I am not at all sure that the Opposition are not right in saying that foreign Governments distrust the proposals for establishing a Home Rule Parliament in Ireland. But I put that down, with all respect to any distinguished Representatives of Foreign Powers who may be here, rather to that ignorance which all nations have of other nations than as a deadly argument against our proposal. But what is the case? At present we have from 25,000 to 30,000 troops in Ireland in times of peace. What force would you want in time of war? I would ask one more question. If you were engaged in a European war, what would be the first point at which your enemy would attempt to reach you? What would be your most vulnerable point? It would, of course, be Ireland. I do not know whether they would be successful in establishing themselves there—they have made many attempts; but if, with the gigantic Armies of the Continent, anything were to happen to your Fleet, not 25,000, nor 30,000, nor 100,000 men would prevent the invasion of Ireland, and the invasion by a foreign force would find many friends on its shores. The true defence of Ireland from the point of view of foreign policy is to give Ireland something worth defending, to give her something that no liberating nation could offer, to give her institutions which she would value as much as we value ours, and, in fine, to set up that spirit of contentment which is so sadly lacking at the present moment. I pass by the question of Ulster, because I have too long trespassed upon your time. But I would venture to say that while these are positive arguments in favour of the proposal, there is an overwhelming negative argument. What do you propose? Have you any scheme—any such scheme as the noble Duke adumbrated in his election address of 1886, any such scheme as Mr. Chamberlain suggested in his election address of the same year? If you had such a scheme I venture to say it would find no unfriendly reception on these Benches. We are only too anxious to get the Irish question out of the way in order to make way for English, Scotch, and Welsh reforms. Have you any such policy? You must have. But we know enough of what has occurred in the past to feel no great hopes of the future. You must have a scheme. When we go out the 80 Irish Members will not go out too. They will remain with you. You may reduce them by a small percentage, and I believe that is part of your scheme, but that will not alter five-sixths of the representation of Ireland. You will not get rid of the 80 Irish Members; they will remain as a clot, a calculus, and an aneurism in the middle of your body politic, which you will have to take some drastic measure to remove. I remember what was the former policy of the noble Marquess—I do not know whether it remains the same—20 years of resolute government and free emigration. How are you to get your 20 years of resolute government? Twenty years means three Parliaments. Will you get three Parliaments to give you carte blanche to administer resolute government in Ireland? You have not so far been able to get more than one. I do not think we are prepared to give a perpetual dictatorship; but, on the other hand, there is a difficulty in any 20 years of resolute government. The democracy cannot govern, and will not govern, in the way you wish them to govern. You may have your Coercion Bills; you may have your "Do not hesitate to shoot" policy if you will, but you will also have incidents inseparable from coercion; you will have regrettable incidents which will inspire the whole country with a horror and hatred of your policy such as existed three or four years before the General Election. Is emigration any better remedy or more practicable than 20 years of resolute government? Emigration greatly increases the difficulty with which you have to deal, if you send out discontented instead of contented emigrants. If you are merely going to pour into the United States or Australia Irish peasants torn from their homes by the impossibility of living there, going with a burning hatred of your institutions and your Monarchy, you will raise up ten evils for one you are laying. Who were the best emigrants who were ever sent out? They were the Pilgrim Fathers who went out in the May Flower. And you will find there was difficulty with them, and in their distant New England home, the Government said that they were a peevish and discontented people. You have tried your policy and failed. It has already reduced your British majority, and it has produced no effect on the Irish Members in the House of Commons against you. I think that you have but three choices left, and they are all of considerable complexity. The first is the disfranchisement of Ireland and the conversion of it into a Crown Colony; the second is your former policy, which is, if I may so, both expensive and ineffective; and the third is some form of Home Rule. The first is impossible, and the third you have not come to yet, but you may not be long in coming. But what will happen if you pursue the policy you adopted in the last Parliament? We shall have Ireland always on our back, that incubus that we have been so anxious to shake off by Home Rule. The noble Marquess, in 1887, said, "The politics of the present are all summed up in the word 'Ireland,'" and he was perfectly right, but we should be entitled to expect, from his utterances as to resolute government and emigration, that we should have had some time for English and Scotch legislation. But how was the time occupied in the House of Commons? In 1887 there were 39 private Irish Bills and eight Government Bills, occupying 96 days. In 1888 there were 43 Private Bills and 13 Government Bills, taking 63 days. In 1889 there were 32 Private Bills and nine Government Bills—total, 41—occupying 52 days; and so we go on with an equal story all through those six years, though you promised us that we should discharge that burden of English legislation and Irish business by your resolute government; but it was found equally as heavy, as obnoxious, and as encumbering as it had ever been in any previous Parliament. I put aside the expense with which this policy is accompanied, the £1,000,000 or so spent on light railways and sops to feed the Cerberus of Irish discontent, which you are unable by any means to allay. But in pursuing the policy of Irish Home Rule we are guided quite as much by discontent and dread of what you propose as by any special content with what we have proposed ourselves. We see in the future that if your policy be pursued we shall have all those secret societies of assassination and outrage once more brought to work their way in Ireland, because the one hope which inspires the Irish people to withstand the incentives to rebellion and outrage will then disappear. We see Parliament encumbered, we see great expense, we see great waste of time; and we know that, whether you plaster Ireland with your garrisons or with your gold, the end of it by some devious path or other will be only some form of Home Rule. It is animated by these considerations, both positive and negative, that we have adopted the course which has brought so much obloquy upon us both from our open foes opposite and our open friends on my right. We propose this Bill in the sense so much decried by the noble Earl as an experiment. I grant that it is an experiment. All legislation is experimental, and all Irish legislation is necessarily experimental. But it is at least a large and a generous experiment. I remember only two experiments of equal magnitude—I think they were of greater magnitude—that have ever been proposed to Parliament in my time. They both struck deep at the Conservative institutions of this country, and they both menaced all that I conceive that the Party opposite holds dear, and they were both, I need hardly say, proposed by a Tory Government. One was the establishment of the London County Council—an infinitely more perilous experiment than the establishment of an Irish Parliament could ever be, where you focussed into one small body all the social, all the revolutionary elements, all the discontent, and all the poverty of an unprecedented aggregation of 5,000,000 people. The second was the Reform Bill of 1867. I well remember the introduction of that Bill, which was brought in by the noble and brilliant Prime Minister of that time—Lord Derby—who tossed it on the Table with the exclamation, “My Lords, I bring you this. This is, after all, but a leap in the dark.” We claim that this Bill is not a leap in the dark. We claim that it is a leap towards the light, a leap and a long stride towards a more generous Irish policy, towards the reconciliation of two great nations, too long connected and too long divided, and, furthermore, a considerable stride towards that adjustment and devolution of local business which will alone enable the British people to support the vast and various burdens of their Empire.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said, he must ask for the sympathy and the indulgence of their Lordships when he rose to follow two such speakers as those whom it had just been the privilege of their Lordships to listen to. He would merely say the first speech was full of argument and full of detail, and was a most clear and incisive declaration of the legislative proposals that were before them. The second also was an able and eloquent speech, and he would hesitate to say that it was not full of argument; but at first it appeared to him to be full of chaff, but not of the chaff which had been referred to by the noble Lord. From first to last he (the Earl of Rosebery) did not adduce a single argument for a Second Reading of the Bill. He had listened to a sick child who had caught a cold coming through the Lobbies, but a chill was not always fatal. But the noble Earl had stated that he would waive all discussion about the Bill. Until he said that, he (Lord Burleigh) was under the impression that they were there only for the purpose for learning what was for and against the measure. He would call their attention to the position in which they were placed. They had entered into a phase of a long controversy. How could they deal with it effectually, when they could not attach any distinct understanding to it? He had hoped that they would have had no more speculations about the principles of Home Rule. He thought they had got it in the Bill, and that they were in a different position to what they had been before, because they would be able to discuss it in a concrete form, and see whether it would be accepted by the country. In the case of the Bill of 1886 all sorts of excuses were made by its framers for its defects. They were told that it had been got up in a hurry, and therefore it was not perfect, but that if its authors were put back into Office again it would be seen what they would do. Well, they had been seven years about it, and there was some right to assume that the great abilities of the 17 cleverest men of the Liberal Party had been applied to shape the form in which the Bill was presented. But now, on the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill in their Lordships' House, they were told that they were to have no argument about it, and no assistance from noble Lords opposite in discussing it. It seemed to him that, whether they had made up their minds or not upon that subject, the promoters of the Bill ought to have advanced some argument in its favour, in order that they might have had the opportunity of discussing the principles of that Bill on intelligible lines, but the noble Earl had given them no such assistance. The noble Earl would admit that the Bill would make the greatest change ever proposed in our Constitution. It was practically a new Constitution, not only for Ireland, but still more for the United Kingdom. He accepted the fact that the Government had changed their policy with regard to Ireland, but he might be permitted to say that if the reasons they had given satisfied themselves, to those who differed from the Government they were ridiculously inadequate. The Government were bound to show not only that some change in the policy of this country with regard to Ireland was necessary, but that this particular change was the best that could, in the circumstances, be proposed. If they suggested that the speeches made to the country did not represent the real opinions of those who represented them he would give up his point at once. But he must assume that when a public man went on to a public platform—he must assume that he did mean what he said to the people before him. He could not see one trace in the measure proposed bearing out the promises and professions which Her Majesty's Government had made to the country. The Prime Minister, in moving the First Reading of the Bill in another place, said there were five conditions which must be observed; but, in order to make those conditions square with the Bill, they ought to put the word "not" before each of them. He would venture to say that in this measure there was no special provision made for the protection of minorities, such as there should have been, and there was no finality, and no promise whatever of its being a real and perpetual settlement. The noble Lord who spoke to-night has disposed once and for all of Imperial unity and Imperial supremacy. If you attempted to enforce the veto the Irish Ministers would resign, and you would find no other Member of the Irish Party to take up the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and Constitutional methods would be brought to an end. There is no equality in a Bill which provides that the Irish Party shall be dominant in the affairs of this country, while they would have nothing to do with Irish affairs. In 1886 the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon) attempted to fix a charge of inconsistency upon the Opposition with regard to the exclusion or retention of the Irish Members. He denied that there had been any inconsistency in the attitude of the Opposition on the subject of the exclusion or retention of the Irish Members. Under the Bill of 1886 the larger Island was put into a position of supremacy over the smaller one; but the position was now changed, and under the present Bill the smaller Island was put into the position of supremacy. That, in itself, would make a great difference. He would venture to say he did not think that noble Lords opposite could know how great the difference was; he did not think that they could realise the objection that could be taken by the Irish Members. It was all very well to say that they made it no worse than it was before. But they did. They prevented the representation of Great Britain having any control whatever; and, if he might borrow a not very elegant but very expressive phrase, they had a right to object to be under the hoof of Ireland. He did not think he was going too far when he said that in this matter there had been deliberate, organised, long-maintained concealment of the intentions of the Government. The original proposals of the Bill were never seriously meant; and, in his opinion, the Government had deliberately abstained from giving any information to the Representatives of the country. In another place Mr. Chamberlain complained of the Prime Minister's intentions to the House, and said that Government had always avoided the questions put to them, or refused to answer them, and Mr. Gladstone confessed it. He promptly replied that he quite understood the object of the questions, and was determined to defeat it. If there was nothing else, that fact alone would justify their Lordships in refusing its consent to the Bill. He was not surprised, under the circumstances, Lord Rosebery had declined to be drawn into a discussion of the provisions of the Bill, because if he had defended them out and out he would have given his influence in Scotland such a blow that it would take a very long time to recover. The real object of the retention of the Irish Members had been disclosed in the other House by the hon. Member for Govan, when he said he wanted to retain the Irish Members in order to use their votes for English reforms. That candid avowal went far to show the danger and the immorality of the policy which was being pressed upon the House for acceptance. He now turned to the financial aspect of the question as affecting Scotland. At present Scotland contributed to Imperial purposes £6,526,000, and Ireland £2,103,000. But when the sums which this Bill proposed should be spent by the country on the Irish Constabulary and in defraying the cost of Revenue collection in Ireland were deducted from the gross amount of Ireland's contribution, the net amount which would come into the Imperial Exchequer from that country would be only £1,552,000. Was this a fair payment from the Scotch point of view? Adopting the tests of the Prime Minister, he found that if Ireland were to be assessed, for the purpose of Imperial contribution, in proportion to the Income Tax paid in that country, she would contribute £2,500,000 instead of £1,550,000, and that if the assessment were made in proportion to the amount paid in Death Duties, the sum which Ireland would have to pay would be £2,816,000. He would take another criterion. Ireland at present paid 13·35 per cent. of the taxation raised in the United Kingdom on tea, tobacco, and wine. If she were to contribute to Imperial purposes in proportion she would pay £8,086,000. If the financial provisions of this Bill were agreed to an Irishman would only contribute for Imperial purposes the sum of 6s. 7d., whereas the amount taken from every Scotchman would be £1 12s. 10d. But the point which influenced him chiefly in his opposition to this Bill was the inadequate protection of the minority in Ireland. In the working of legislation of this kind everything depended upon the character of the men who would govern Ireland under it. Noble Lords opposite tried to get out of the difficulty by saying that they were not selecting the men who would govern, and that they hoped that the Irish people would select the right men. But that would not avail as an argument, for it was certain, as far as anything in human affairs could be certain, that the men who would form the new Irish Executive, if this Bill were to pass, would be the present Leaders of the Nationalist Party in the House of Commons. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had asked them to pass the measure as an experiment. What an experiment! It involved the lives, liberty, and property of those who had been most loyal to the British connection. It was an experiment which would be made at the expense of men who said plainly that they dreaded nothing on earth so much as this legislation; and, in order that this experiment might be made, they were asked to trust the men who, the noble Earl opposite had told them, might in case of war take the side of our foes.

EARL SPENCER: Under present conditions.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: But those conditions, he believed, had had a great effect in Scotland, where the Prime Minister would do wisely not to rely on the support which he had hitherto received. That the views of large numbers of Scotch influential electors had undergone a change since the introduction of this Bill was shown by the great meeting held in Edinburgh in April. The minority in Ireland were one-third of the population; they represented the greater part of the education and industrial energy of the country; and yet their Lordships were solemnly asked to hand them over to the tender mercies of those whom they so much distrusted. He would not say anything against the Roman Catholic Church generally. In this country it commanded respect; but they had had glimpses of the priesthood in Ireland in magisterial inquiries and political battles and in the revelations of the Meath Election Petitions. Their Lordships were asked to hand over the minority to those who had been advocates of deliberate robbery and breach of contract, and had preached the gospel of revenge; but before they passed a Bill of this kind they would ask for a check, not only on rash and Party legislation, but for a real check, on those men who had started and worked the Land League and the Plan of Campaign. Noble Lords opposite hoped that the Irish Members would keep within the Bill, but there was only too much evidence that the sham safeguards imposed by the Bill were not loyally accepted by those who would have to work it. They were told that to enforce the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament would lead to nothing but irritation. There could be no hope of a continuing settlement. The Government had either done too much or not enough. They had taken a most dangerous step in attempting to set up a Federal Constitution. They had weakened the United Kingdom for defence in a way most dangerous to the smaller countries embraced in it. He was convinced that, in any breaking up of the Imperial Parliament, Scotland and Ireland would lose more than they would gain. It was said that Parliament was overburdened, but, in his humble opinion, much that was said on that subject was grossly exaggerated. There was, he admitted, a substratum of truth in the saying; but surely a remedy could be found for it without separating the Executive Authority, and without taking the Constitution to pieces. Such a remedy could easily have been found if the market had not been spoiled by the hasty way in which Home Rule was swallowed by the Party opposite. Speaking as a pure Scotchman, he could say that they were proud of their history, proud of their struggle for independence, proud of their former separate existence. Their union with England was not popular for something like three-quarters of a century, but now they entertained a loyalty, not only to Scotland, but to the Empire, and he believed the enormous majority of his fellow-countrymen would now feel that it was as great a lapse in their patriotism to be disloyal to the Empire as to be disloyal to Scotland. He honestly believed that Ireland at no long distance of time would have been brought to the same feeling had not her hopes been excited by the Party opposite. Until the deliberate judgment of the country in the light of clear and unmistakable knowledge had been obtained on this question he maintained that their Lordships had no right to accept the Bill. Before they were asked to violate their consciences and to stultify their reason they had a right to know that the mass of the people unmistakably desired this measure, and he should certainly vote against it, because he believed it involved considerations not only of national safety, but of national honour and probably of national life; and he supported the Motion for the rejection of the Bill.

LORD THRING said, he was under the impression that a mist of exaggeration pervaded everything Irish. Facts had been misrepresented and distorted, and impossible conclusions had been drawn from improbable premises. In the few words he would address to their Lordships' House he would endeavour to show that the Bill was founded on well-established precedents, and that the fears of its opponents were either simulated or based on imperfect knowledge. It was said that the measure would lead to the dismemberment of the Empire. What was the Empire? It covered a fifth of the habitable globe, and it contained men of every creed and language, living under diverse local Governments. The common tie that bound these people together was Her Majesty and the prerogatives of the Crown. These prerogatives were the power to make peace and war, the control of the Army and Navy, and the right to make Treaties with foreign nations. How did the Bill affect any one of these privileges? How could it possibly disturb the Empire. The Bill was really a Colonial Bill, and could not disturb the unity of the Empire in the slightest degree. If the Empire was to be shaken in such a manner it would have long since been shattered. It was contrary to their common intelligence to say that this measure would in any way affect the unity of the Empire. The Duke of Devonshire had drawn a great distinction between the unity of the Empire and the unity of the Kingdom. Since Irish Members were retained in the Imperial Parliament in reduced numbers, but with the same rights as they possessed now, it would be quite as sensible to say that if they altered the franchise in Ireland or the number of its Members that they affected the unity of the Kingdom. Some noble Lords were greatly exercised about the supremacy of Parliament. But Parliament remained as before. Not one single Parliamentary power had been affected. Indeed, over-precautions had been taken to secure the supremacy of Parliament. It was a doctrine of the Common Law that Parliament could not if it would abrogate its supremacy. And in the Colonial Acts nothing was said about the supremacy of Parliament, it was assumed. But in this Bill there was a declaration of it in the Preamble, and an enactment in the body of the measure. Then there was the Imperial veto, which had always been applied in Colonial Constitutions to prevent gross injustice. He did not see how any injustice could be done or the minority be injured in any way when they had 80 Irish Members sitting in the Imperial Parliament who could be called to account for their misdeeds. The unity of the Empire, the unity of the Kingdom, and the supremacy of Parliament would be as safe after this Bill as they were now. The Bill was an ordinary Colonial Bill, adapted to the peculiar circumstances which existed between Great Britain and Ireland. There were two forms of a Bill of this kind. The old Colonial Bill was always in this form, it delegated powers to the subordinate Government to make laws for the peace, good order, and good government of the country; it dispensed with all restrictions, and left the Colony to do the best thing they could. They had been told the Bill was crude, and crazy, and revolutionary, and all sorts of bad things. He was bound to admit that during his 25 years of office; he never knew of a Bill which was not crude and crazy in the opinion of the Opposition. He challenged any noble Lord who understood Colonial legislation to point out any single clause which went beyond the ordinary Colonial limit. On the contrary, this was a more restricted Bill. When they were told that great wrong would be done under it he asked whether great wrong had been done in any of the 15 self-governing Colonies. Why was it supposed that under a Constitution more restricted than those of the Colonies the unfortunate Irish were to commit wrongs which the Colonies had not committed? It was said that the Irish Parliament would be composed of rebels and murderers, but precisely the same thing was said when a Constitution was granted to Canada. But the experience of history showed that the weight of responsibility made men abandon their former methods and settle down to the work of government. Then as to the everlasting accusation of a conspiracy of secrecy, everyone had known for the last eight years that when the present Government came into Office they would bring in a Bill to give local government to Ireland, and a Local Government Bill could only contain certain definite proposals contained in every Colonial Bill. The employment of the Closure in the Commons could not be avoided in the face of the tactics of the Opposition. He did not blame them, but the Government could not do otherwise than apply the Closure. Everybody knew that the Colonial Bills and the Irish Bill involved great changes in the administration of the country, but that was the object for which the power was given that they might manage their own affairs. If Amendments had been moved to every delegated power in the Canadian Bill, for example, the end would not have been reached till the Judgment Day. The real question was whether Parliament did or did not intend to give local government to Ireland. It mattered little what the details were, but it mattered very much if they were prepared to give local government to Ireland or not. It was said that there was no argument in its favour. All history and experience taught that where countries or communities with peculiarities of race or creed or language were united by an incorporating union the result was not successful, but where they were united by a federal union national feeling was satisfied. He would only quote the one case of Austria-Hungary as that was the most apposite instance. Hungary had been discontented for centuries. Then within our own time it broke into rebellion, which was crushed with the assistance of Russia, and Hungary was incorporated with Austria. After the battle of Sadowa, Hungary's opportunity came Austria was prostrate, and Count Beust, to restore the Empire, dissolved the Incorporating Union and substituted a Federal Union. He was perfectly aware there had been differences, but on the whole Hungary became contented. If they looked at Canada they found that rebellion had been quelled by the grant of self-government, a Federal Union had since been established, and that Canada was now one of the most loyal portions of the British Empire. He did not say that those instances were necessarily conclusive, but still they demonstrated the general principle that to give self-government to a discontented community was the easiest way of conciliation. One-fifth of the habitable globe rested content under the rule of Great Britain, with only one exception. That exception was one of the smallest of our dependencies—Ireland—and it possessed no local government. The Marquess of Salisbury has said that the term “national aspirations,” as applied to Ireland, was merely “modern jargon.” It might be jargon, but it was the jargon of Swift, of Flood, of Grattan, of O’Connell, of Burke, and of Lord John Russell. He was not ashamed to think that National sentiment and National aspirations were very good grounds for giving local government to Ireland; and he thought that our Colonial Institutions proved that the risk was almost infinitesimal. Above all these pleas there was a greater and nobler plea for giving Home Rule to Ireland. The honour of the Empire and of England demanded that justice and self-government should be given to Ireland. It was time to put an end to the taunts thrown in our teeth by every foreign nation that while we preached the gospel of liberty throughout the world Ireland was oppressed and denied even a small part of the privileges which we granted so liberally and freely, and almost without solicitation, to our most distant dependencies. That, he thought, was a very clear reason for giving self-government to Ireland. He knew that the opinion of an old and feeble man would avail nothing; but he was unwilling to remain silent in the Debate, because for 15 years he had been behind the scenes of Irish Government; and they were dark and dreary and ghastly scenes. He had also closely studied the Colonial Empire; and, before the Government of which he was a subordinate, he came to the conclusion that Home Rule was the only remedy which offered any chance of success in Ireland. He held that opinion strongly then, and he held it strongly now.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, with regard to the reasons given for introducing the Bill, he traversed the statement most distinctly that there was any ground for urging that Ireland, in the period since the Union, had not steadily prospered to a greater degree probably than any other civilised country, America alone excepted. Showing the state of Ireland immediately preceding the Union, quotations had been given from the speech of Lord Clare bearing on the question. A steady improvement took place down to the time of the great famine of 1846. On that point he could speak from experience. He remembered that terrible visitation, having traversed at the time the districts in the South and West of Ireland. At that time artisans were employed at 2s. a day wages, and labourers could be obtained in any numbers for 6d. a day; whereas now men could not be got for less than four times that sum. So much for labour. The deposits in the Bank, which in 1850 were certainly below £8,000,000, were now £32,000,000. Large sums were now invested by the tenant farmers and small traders in securities. The whole railroad system of Ireland, for which England had contributed largely at the beginning, had passed gradually and imperceptibly into the hands of Irish proprietors; and the same might be said of the shipping and other great industries. Originally established with English capital, the shares in those undertakings had now very properly drifted across the Channel, and were now held almost exclusively in Ireland. Within his own knowledge some years ago a project was started which required a 10 per cent. deposit of £120,000. Applications were received in three days to the amount of nearly £130,000, so that the capital was subscribed more than ten times over. Those were not signs of decaying trade, or that the country was not prospering; and those results had been achieved in the face of agitation, of occasional failures of harvest, and of various other disturbing causes well known to those interested in Ireland. The only class in the community which could not be said to have prospered were the landlords—there was no mistake at all about that. No landlord in Ireland was now getting the rent he received 40 or 50 years ago; and although rents had rarely on the old estates been raised since the commencement of the century, they had, in most instances, been considerably cut down by the operation of successive enactments which had passed through their Lordships' House. Ireland, no doubt, was not as prosperous as she might be; but it was the merest moonshine to put a lack of prosperity forward as the reason for introducing this measure. Ireland had not been stagnant in commerce and industry. She had, in fact, progressed steadily; and in those parts of the country where free scope had been given to the development of native industry, as in Ulster, the progress had been more remarkable, perhaps, than in any other part of Her Majesty's dominions. He would proceed to state the objections to the principle—not to the details of the Bill, which would induce him unhesitatingly to vote against the measure. In the first place, the safeguard of the veto was worth nothing. It was a mere nominal veto which the experience of the Colonies showed to be worth precisely the paper on which it was written. When any Constitutional strain occurred he did not envy the post of the first Viceroy of Ireland, should that Bill, unhappily, pass into law. He would have three masters to deal with, and it would be very difficult for him to determine to which of them he should turn for advice and guidance as each emergency arose—or, as might be the case, two or three emergencies together, which often happened in Ireland. So long as that remained undefined that was not a Bill, which, in principle, their Lordships would be justified in passing. Coming to the well-known 9th clause, the proposition in 1885 was that no Irish Member should appear at Westminster; and in this Bill, as originally introduced, they were to appear and disappear upon "the in-and-out system," as it was called—they were to appear on certain occasions, and then disappear into space when the occasion had passed away, and re-appear when necessity arose. That proposal was abandoned. A third proposal was now made. The Irish Members were not only to pass laws in their own country, but to assist in the legislation on this side of the Channel. The latter arrangement was a serious inconvenience at present, for English, Scotch, and Welsh measures were opposed, apparently, out of spite by different Irish Members who were not concerned in them in the slightest degree. Of course, that was a serious obstacle to all useful legislation. It was a problem which he believed to be utterly insoluble, and the objection to each of the three methods of dealing with the question seemed to be about equally strong. Then, coming to the financial part of the Bill, that was not a part of it with which their Lordships' House was specially entitled to deal; but, having given some attention to the matter, all he could say was that in the crude and immature financial proposals, which had been altered two or three times, he could see no ground for satisfaction. Great Britain was to be taxed for Ireland; but not only that—Ireland would probably soon have to face bankruptcy. In the absence of Imperial credit, through which so much good work had been done in the country, a far higher rate of interest would have to be made for money required for public works. The country would then suffer from chronic impecuniosity. Unless some wiser measure of finance could be proposed, their Lordships would certainly be justified in rejecting the Bill. This was not merely a matter of detail, but was essentially a question of principle. The provisions of the Bill were only to stand for six years, and then the whole controversy would have to be gone through afresh. As to the question of security to the minority, more than one noble Lord in the Government stood pledged by his own promise; and it had been distinctly stated that such securities should be inserted in the Bill as would reasonably satisfy the minority, especially in Ulster. Not for a moment could it be said that Ulster had been in any way satisfied. He did not wonder that Ulster felt aggrieved that Wales should be about to receive consideration at the hands of the Government; while that Province, with a larger population, larger area, and far more wealth, was not to receive any separate consideration from the rest of Ireland. That, again, was a question of principle. As to the Land Question, their Lordships, undoubtedly, stood in a somewhat delicate position. He could honestly say for himself, and for noble Lords connected with Ireland, that if he could see in that measure any hope of permanent benefit to Ireland, no personal interests would prevent him crossing the House to support it. But he could not understand what the Government proposed to do. The noble Earl (Earl Spencer) said he had always been in favour of dealing with the Land Question; and it was not easy to see how the latest measure that had been passed absolved the Members of the Government from the pledges they had given. Some Member of the Government ought to give the House an indication of what their policy was to be in reference to the land if that Bill was passed. The condition of such a measure should be that it would settle the question for at least a generation; but there was no prospect of this Bill doing that. The Leaders of the Nationalist Party were not agreed upon the point. Mr. Justin M'Carthy might accept it in good faith; but what authority had he behind him? The Parnellite Leader, Mr. J. Redmond, declared that the word "provisional" was stamped on every line of the measure. Mr. Parnell, who, with all his faults was head and shoulders above the Leaders who had succeeded him, could probably have enforced discipline in the Party; but it was doubtful whether he ever intended to fulfil the pledges he had given. According to his own last speech in Committee Room No. 15, he accepted the Bill only pro tanto; but with whom was Parliament now dealing? Who were these Leaders? Where were the worthy successors of the galaxy of talent which made the closing days of the last Irish Parliament so memorable and so glorious for that country? Where were the Floods, Grattans, Ponsonbys, and Plunkets? Upon whom had their mantle fallen? The present Leaders must be judged by their own acts as summed up on the finding of the Commission—that they had been guilty of criminal conspiracy upon this Land Question. That finding applied to 36 of them—the exact majority by which the Bill was carried in the other House. The Irish Leaders had achieved no success in any other walk of life; and, looking to their own utterances, it was doubtful whether any bargain entered into with them would be honestly kept. They were now at the parting of two ways—one the path of political expediency, which the Government invited them to follow, and along which a child might tread with ease, and the other the steep and uphill track of duty and principle, which it might tax all the energy and ability of full-grown statesmen to climb. On the choice which they made, whether the evil be selected and good refused, was likely to turn the future not only of Ireland, but of this country for many a long year to come. He trusted their Lordships would pause before they sanctioned any such course—before they forgot that the nation had inherited that which was not to be manufactured in a day, and which ought not to be taken to pieces in a single Session. They had inherited a Constitution from their forefathers under which they had lived and flourished as no other nation in the world had ever done, and which, if possible, they ought to hand down unimpaired in all its brightness and lustre to their children and their children's children.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI said, that ever since the first faint rumours were put about that a measure of this kind was about to be introduced by a great political Party he had taken a share, both inside and outside the House, in organising resistance to it. The noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had alluded to the unreality of the Debate. He agreed that there was unreality in it, because to all the thrusts and cuts delivered by the opponents of the measure there had not been on the part of the Government an attempt to parry, or at a real defence. The noble Earl himself, even in his admirable and most amusing speech, had not gone into the details of the Bill, but likened the Debate to the bull-fighting of Spain. He did not, however, attempt to stir up the Bill; he did not stop one moment—to use a vulgar expression—to give the bull one twist of his tail. The First Lord of the Admiralty, in introducing the Bill, was put in a position of great difficulty, which entitled him to the sincere sympathy of the House. He performed the task with admirable dignity and moderation; but he told their Lordships really nothing about the Bill. He gave a long catalogue of crimes and misdemeanours; but he did not, as he ought to have done, attempt to forestall, to some extent, the arguments which had been brought against the details of the Bill, for he must have known, from what had happened outside that House and in another place, what would certainly be advanced against the Bill in Debate. Lord Brassey, in his speech, gave some reasons why all other noble Lords in the House save himself should vote in favour of the measure. Lord Ribblesdale also spoke in its favour with his accustomed ability, and gave most excellent reasons for the course he had taken; but he told their Lordships nothing about the Bill, and, having explained his own change of opinions, stood on the penitential stool with all his accustomed grace. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for the Colonies, speaking in defence of the Bill last night, did not attempt to meet Viscount Cross's criticisms on the financial sections of the Bill. The notice he took of those criticisms was very cursory. He reproached the Conservative Party with having a share in granting the franchise to the Irish in 1884; he used it almost as a taunt against them that they had done so, and asked why the Conservatives had not continued that policy in the direction of Home Rule. It was not his duty to defend the Conservative Party; but he submitted that that argument really fell to the ground. The opposition to the Bill in that House must be mainly on its principles; and although it was difficult to avoid allusions to clauses and details, its provisions involved gross injustice in some cases, and in others were so imperfect in affording protection to the minority as to be merely a hollow mockery. There was no doubt whatever that noble Lords in that part of the House would vote in favour of the Amendment of the noble Duke (the Duke of Devonshire) for the rejection of the Bill; and he submitted it was their duty to vote for its rejection, and it would be again their duty to do so should it be forced once more through the other House, until its supporters fulfilled their obvious obligation of submitting it, with all its details, to the verdict of the country. It had often been pointed out how studiously the electorate had been kept in ignorance by the present Government ever since the defeat of their Bill in 1886; and only at the last General Election was the name alone of Home Rule before the country, and only so far as it furthered the interests of other proposals, which were sufficiently important in themselves, but had not been sufficiently submitted to public consideration, to really come within the sphere of practical politics. It could not be denied that every detail of this Bill was in any way understood by the people at the last General Election. In a speech delivered in Dublin on the 24th of August, after the election, Mr. Dillon, the Member for East Mayo, said—

"The Irish Party would not give Mr. Gladstone their support in the House of Commons unless he satisfied them on all the details of the Bill; had they been given before the election took place, the verdict of England would probably have been given not for, but against, Home Rule."

That was the opinion of Mr. Dillon. He went on—

"As far as my poor political knowledge carries me, the first thing to do is to secure your hare, and then you will see how you will cook it."

That was not a very civil way of talking about the Prime Minister. He went on to say—

"First get a great English Minister, and the House of Commons, and the electorate of Great Britain to pronounce in favour of Irish liberty, and we shall know how to deal with the details of the Home Rule Bill afterwards."

He would remind their Lordships that Mr. Dillon was a person of great eminence in the Irish Party, with a great knowledge of English affairs, and he most probably knew what was proposed. Who could pretend now that the electors of Great Britain voted with a full knowledge of what was proposed? Ever since the Bill of 1886 was defeated, it was announced that that measure was dead; and that the Prime Minister and his Irish colleagues and advisers were perfectly free to recast their scheme in every detail, but no one outside the inner circle knew anything about it. It was certain that the English electorate were kept purposely in ignorance of it. It was only charitable to suppose that what had been called "the conspiracy of silence" on the part of many supporters of the measure in that House, at all events, was due to absolute ignorance. Every appeal for details of the policy of noble Lords opposite had been met with an absolute refusal; and it was hard to believe they really knew what was proposed. The noble Marquess, in a speech he lately delivered outside the walls of Parliament, called attention to the critical state of political affairs, and expressed his opinion that it might be necessary if measures of such a far-reaching and revolutionary character were proposed to discuss some system of referendum. The noble Marquess did not apparently expressly advocate a system of referendum, but only intended to convey a warning. Our present means of taking the opinion of the electorate were sufficient, provided always that the electors voted untrammelled by official interference or the intimidation of political agencies. One aspect of the 11th clause had not yet been touched upon. By that clause the Government had withdrawn the question of Irish representation from the consideration of Parliament. It was now proposed that on all questions of Imperial policy—on all questions, English, Scotch, and Welsh—the 80 Members should vote in the Imperial Parliament. The Schedule of the Bill had already been dealt with by noble Lords who had preceded him. An almost scandalous attempt had been made to manipulate the constituencies in Ireland; but as long as one portion of the United Kingdom was extravagantly over-represented and another equally under-represented, it was impossible to say that any measure of this kind which came before their Lordships was really backed by a majority of the electors of the United Kingdom. He wished that the question of redistribution were seriously taken up, and a Bill on the subject carried through Parliament; if that were done the result would be to remove all idea of competition between the different parts of the United Kingdom. It was proposed to pass this Bill irrespective of the opinions and feelings of that large minority which represented one-third of the population and two-thirds of the intelligence, industry, and commerce of Ireland. It was said that there was no demand for County Government in Ireland, but he believed that there was; and he was confident from his own experience that if rural Municipalities were once created in Ireland their administration would be conducted with the same regard to economy and efficiency as prevailed in English and Scotch counties. They would not be managed by the same class of men as would be sent to the Irish Legislature. Would it not be better, with the co-operation of all sides, to pass a measure of that kind, and to watch its operation before they attempted to pass a Home Rule Bill? His noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs alluded to the question of the possible invasion of Ireland. The South-Western Coasts offered the same attractions to the foreign invader as they had done before. What would be the consequence if at such a time the Irish Legislature passed Resolutions professing neutrality, or even condemning the Imperial policy, and the Irish Executive set recruiting on foot to afford assistance to an invader who had once landed on Irish soil. The answer had been hitherto—"Oh, this is contrary to human nature," and people talked of the Union of Hearts; but there was no security that the Irish Legislature would give even a moderate support to Imperial policy. Then he wished to ask by what moral right the services of the Imperial Civil servants were to be transferred to another Executive? He would ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he gave his cordial assent to the 34th clause, which included the moratorium of three years during which the Irish Parliament might not deal with the question. In conclusion, he contended that those who lived in Ulster and in other Provinces had a right to speak for all classes of the Irish people, and in their behalf he claimed justice. He was not speaking in the interests of one class solely, and certainly not in the interests of the Irish landlords alone. The noble Earl said there were 113 Irish Peers in that House who had little or no right to speak on behalf of any interest out of Ulster. Many of their Lordships did not live in that Province, but were connected with people of the other three Provinces whose interests were bound up with theirs, notwithstanding this miserable political struggle. He maintained that they had a right to speak for all classes. There were thousands in the West and South of Ireland who were anxious to perform their honest obligations. Who did not know what the life of those men had been? They were constantly exposed to insult and danger to themselves and families in the House of God and on the public roads. Who would be in the position of such a man sitting in his cabin at night when every sound—the wind in the chimney, or the rattle of a latch—might be the harbinger of death? The existence of these men was one long agony. They were adscripti glebæ in the fullest sense of the term. Others whose horizon of life was wider could leave the country, and they did leave it for ever. They were the kind of men who were the Pilgrim Fathers of the Mayflower. They left Ireland with a burning sentiment of passionate resentment in their breast, and that sentiment would go far to alienate the minds of men in our Colonies and in the United States against the Empire of Great Britain. On behalf of those men who were anxious to perform their honest obligations he claimed everything that was embraced under the name of justice.

LORD SWANSEA said, that, although he addressed their Lordships practically for the first time, he was an old Parliamentary hand, having had a seat in the other House for 41 years. Approaching this question in a judicial and unimpassioned manner, he had arrived at the conclusion that the time had come when this momentous question must be dealt with, in order that they might remove the chronic discontent from which Ireland suffered. Everybody, he thought, would admit that something must be done. What did the terrible condition of things in Ireland arise from? They had only to look to the history of that unhappy country. In 1800 the population of Ireland was 33 per cent. of the whole United Kingdom; the population of England being 9,000,000, of Ireland over 5,000,000, and of Scotland 1,600,000. Now, Ireland's proportion was only 12½ per cent. There were some 25,000 troops in Ireland, besides an armed police, to control the population; while, in contrast, Scotland had but 5,000 troops. Many measures had been introduced in times past for the pacification of Ireland, but they had been absolutely useless. What was the alternative to this policy? None had yet been proposed. The only proposal was another 20 years of resolute government and coercion. But that policy had recently been tried for seven years, and was Ireland any nearer to pacification and contentment at the end of those seven years than at the beginning? The people, no doubt, were kept down with a strong hand, and there was less agrarian crime. But that was not enough. What a Government should aim at was the contentment of the people, and that Ireland was not contented with the present state of things was proved by the fact that at the last General Election four-fifths of the Irish Members returned to Parliament were Home Rulers. The Duke of Devonshire the other night had hinted feebly at some extension of the County Council system as an alternative. The noble Duke appeared to think that County Councils possessed extensive executive powers, but, as the Chairman of a very large County Council, he could inform the noble Duke that they possessed no executive powers. They could not even originate a Bill in Parliament. The smallest borough in the country had more extensive powers than they. To attempt to satisfy Ireland by the creation of a glorified County Council would be foolish and puerile, for Ireland would never be contented until she had a National Council. The Irish claimed to be a nation. ["Hear, hear!"] They were a nation, and he hardly knew how to interpret those cheers. Were they, or were they not, a nation? [The Marquess of SALISBURY: No.] Then what were they? Would the noble marques define what the Irish people were, if they were not a nation. [The Marquess of SALISBURY: Two nations.] For his part, he thought it must be admitted that they were a nation, and certainly until they were accorded the rights of a nation they would not be contented. This measure, he believed, would content them. It was the 80 Nationalist Representatives in the House of Commons who had a right to express the views of Ireland, and not noble Lords in that House who represented their own interests, but not those of the Irish people. He had had a long experience of the Irish Members in the House of Commons, and he declared that a more able body of men did not exist. At first he felt strong prejudice against them, because they interfered so largely with the business of the House. He felt intense resentment, hardly realising that it was the beginning of a civil war, as it were, in the House of Commons. But gradually the enormous power of the Irish Representatives forced itself upon him. They were men of great intellect and determination and were true patriots. No doubt the course they took in the House of Commons was most disagreeable to English, Scotch, and Welsh Members, but it was the only course they could take to bring home to the House and the country the strong National desire for self-government. It was very easy to discredit and disbelieve the Irish

Members, but he had faith in them, and believed that when they had accepted this measure they had accepted it loyally and honestly. [Laughter.] It was easy for noble Lords to laugh, but they did not know these men as he did. [A noble LORD: We know Mr. Redmond.] Let them take the lowest view. These men would hold high Office, and the Opposition imputed to them the folly of lightly throwing away that position for which they had struggled for so many years. Their Lordships might depend upon it that they knew too well where their interests lay, and when responsibility was thrown upon them they would be found as able to conduct the affairs of their country as any men who ever sat in the House of Commons. They knew they were weak and that Great Britain was strong, and they were aware that if they abused their power they would have the power of this country against them. Was it not unworthy that a nation of 33,000,000 people should fear a nation of, deducting 1,500,000 "Loyalists," 3,000,000? Did not this Bill enact the absolute supremacy of the Imperial Parliament? ["No, no!"] It did so distinctly, not only in the Preamble, but in distinct words. But no such enactment was really wanted, because the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was not touched. If the Irish Parliament enacted any unjust law their Lordships might be sure that the Imperial Parliament would immediately override it. He, for one, would never assent to any Act of the Irish Parliament which caused spoliation. The Irish leaders knew full well how far they could go. They knew that the English people were essentially a just people, and that any action of theirs which might be unjust to the landlords or anyone else would not pass muster in this country. He had never supported the Bills which had been introduced for the purchase of land, but so far as defending the property of the Irish landlords was concerned there was no man in the House who would go further than he. He believed that the veto of the Lord Lieutenant would be actively employed should occasion arise; but he would strongly deprecate any peddling interference with the affairs of Ireland. He had always favoured the retention of the Irish Members as a sign and symbol of the unity of the Empire; but he rather regretted that the Government had departed from the in-and-out method. One of the strongest reasons for the Bill was that it would remove Irish questions from the House of Commons, where they had been a curse and an impediment to the effective discharge of the duties of that Assembly. He recognised that there must ultimately be an appeal to the country. He did not, however, admit that the Liberal Party had no mandate. Home Rule was the primary, though not the only, question at the last Election. At the next Election the details of the Bill would be before the country, and he believed they would be accepted by the electors, and that all the visionary Unionist bugbears would be blown to the four winds of heaven by the knowledge which the country would have of the exact provisions of the scheme. The country would see that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was guarded in the strictest manner, and that none of the evils prophesied could possibly arise. His firm conviction was that when another appeal was made to the country an enormous majority would declare in favour of Home Rule. That Members of the House of Commons had voted for the Bill because they knew it would be rejected by the House of Lords, he did not believe, and the suggestion contained a grave imputation. The Liberal Party had created our Constitution, and desired by every means in their power to uphold it; but the course taken lately in the House of Commons had shaken our Constitution more, perhaps, than anything that had taken place for many long years. If the Closure were not applied a Bill of this kind would never be passed. Their Lordships were going on very dangerous lines. It would be very much wiser to deal with this great question in a different manner from that which their Lordships had adopted. His prophecy in regard to the result of any future appeal to the country would undoubtedly come true, and then their Lordships would not be able to deal with the Bill so calmly, or be so able to modify its conditions as they might now if they chose.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that none of the noble Lords who had supported the measure had said a single word about the Bill. As far as he could understand, Lord Swansea had been brought over to Home Rule because he discovered that Ireland was declining in population, and therefore in prosperity. But the noble Lord compared the time before the famine with the time after the famine. Ireland, as a matter of fact, had increased in prosperity by leaps and bounds since the Union, and, as the country had been over-populated, the decline in the population had been one of the reasons of the increased prosperity. Lord Rosebery had made a very witty and clever speech. The early part of it was full of jokes and chaff; but this Bill was not a matter to joke about. The noble Earl joked about a policy which, if it were made effective, would indubitably produce a terrible tragedy in Ireland. It would bring ruin, despair, and possible death to hundreds of thousands of strong men, weak women, and little children in Ireland, and yet the noble Earl thought it was a good thing to joke about. He, on the contrary, did not think it was a subject for joking; neither did the Loyalists of Ireland. It was most unseemly of the noble Earl to make a joke out of the prospective misery of thousands of his fellow-subjects. The noble Earl refused to answer the criticisms of the noble and learned Earl who opened the Debate that evening. Why? Because they were unanswerable. The noble Earl made an uncalled-for and wholly unjustifiable attack on his noble Friend (Lord Muskerry), who was asked by the noble Earl whom he represented in Ireland. He would tell the noble Earl whom his noble Friend represented. His noble Friend was one of those who represented the loyal minority in the South and West of Ireland, a constituency which was increasing in volume in opposition to this measure in a different manner from another constituency with which the noble Earl was acquainted, and which was not far from his own doors in Scotland. He maintained that the noble Earl gave a very lukewarm support to Home Rule in the speech which he delivered earlier in the evening. Up to the present time the Foreign Secretary had been very reticent on the subject of Home Rule; he had never thoroughly explained himself, and he was sure that their Lordships were very anxious to hear the explanation of his attitude that evening; but, strange to say, he was again equally reticent. The noble Earl had every reason not to commit himself in favour of this policy, because there were certain remarks of his which needed elucidation, which showed that the noble Earl must have found great difficulty in changing his opinions. In 1885, referring to a supposed alliance between Mr. Parnell and the Conservatives—an alliance which only existed in Gladstonian brains—the noble Earl described identically the present position of affairs, and described the consequences, the only difference being that it was a different company that was on the stage. He said on October 15, 1885—

“Now if the Tory Government remains able, with the 80 or 90 followers of Mr. Parnell, to hold its own, the future of the next House of Commons will rest, not with Lord Salisbury or Lord Randolph Churchill, but with Mr. Parnell. He, and not Lord Salisbury, will be the master of the situation; he, and not Sir M. Hicks-Beach, will be the Leader of the House of Commons. He will sit enthroned with Lord Randolph Churchill on his right and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach on his left, like Chiefs in Israel, with 80 Parnellite Members behind them who have signed the blind pledge of his followers.”

That was a pretty strong statement, but he had even a stronger one. The noble Earl went on to say—

“Though it has its comic side, I think this prospect is a tragic one.”

Possibly the noble Earl little thought that he would be turned himself into an actor of tragedy and comedy combined. Again, he said—

“But I go further, and I say that this alliance of the Tory and the Irish vote is a new and very dangerous feature in our politics”;

and again—

“because it is an alliance which has not merely struck a mortal stab at political principles, but it involves a danger to the Empire itself.”

The noble Earl had never explained one word of that speech. He was for a long time entirely silent, but in 1892 he did make a speech adopting Home Rule. He would ask the noble Lord whether a mortal stab had now been given to the political principles of himself and the Party he belonged to; and whether his prophecy had proved correct, and the Empire was involved in serious danger?

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: It was explained at some length in my speech at Leeds, and I shall be happy to send a copy of it to the noble Marquess to-morrow morning.

The Marquess of Waterford

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD proceeded to say that the noble Earl (Earl Spencer) who moved the Second Reading of the Bill had enumerated all the Land Acts passed since the famine, though he failed to understand how they applied to this Bill except as an argument against it, and he did not explain one of the safeguards of the measure. All the explanation vouchsafed was an expression of belief on the part of the noble Earl as to what those safeguards would effect, and that he believed they would have the effect of protecting the minority. Their Lordships remembered, however, when the noble Earl was Viceroy of Ireland, and that at that time he acted as if he believed the reverse of what he told their Lordships the other evening. Was it possible the noble Earl's views had changed in consequence of the necessity for obtaining votes? In his able speech Lord Ribblesdale explained how he had come to change his opinions in consequence of an Irish majority having been returned twice or thrice in support of Home Rule. The same argument would apply to a Separatist majority returned for Yorkshire or Northumberland. But the noble Lord did not stop to ascertain how that majority was obtained or what it represented. Would the noble Lord be astonished if he heard that a very large number of people who voted for Home Rule in Ireland did so for the same reason that a number of the majority voted for this Bill in the House of Commons—namely, that they knew it would not pass? But in the South and West of Ireland he heard that farmers were terribly frightened at the prospect of the Bill passing, and many of them earnestly hoped this House would throw it out. A Roman Catholic tenant farmer had said to him that he did not believe there were many men in Ireland who had £20 to lose who were in favour of the Bill. The Earl of Rosebery stated his views of what Home Rule should be at Glasgow, on June 17, 1886, and he laid down certain conditions, but were they carried out by this Bill? He said, first, that Home Rule should be based on Imperial unity; second, political equality of the three nations; third, there should be an equal distribution of burdens; fourth, that there should be safeguards for the minority; and, fifth, that it should be in the nature of a settlement, not a mere provocation for fresh demands. He would like to know whether the noble Earl thought those conditions had been carried out in this Bill? It was said that it did not destroy Imperial unity, but it certainly threatened the unity of the United Kingdom by involving the risk of separation or civil war. There could not be equality or equal distribution of burdens when Ireland governed herself and England as well, and Ireland gained £500,000 a year, which was offered on the Second Reading of the Bill by Mr. Gladstone, and which was certain to be a very great deal more. Then Lord Selborne had shown there was no machinery to enable this Parliament to exercise its supremacy. The only machinery that had been named were the armed forces of the Crown, and the employment of those meant nothing short of civil war. All safeguards for the minority would be evaded by men who, as Mr. Gladstone said, were wading through rapine to the dismemberment of the Empire. They had evaded the law under the British Government, and would do so very much more easily with the Executive power in their own hands. The Irish Members might well have accepted many of the Amendments that had been proposed to the Bill, because they well understood how to evade every safeguard intended to have been provided by those Amendments. What were the safeguards in the Bill? He could only make out nine, and some of them were an insult in their absurdity to the loyal minority, and, more than that, they were an insult to the understanding of the British people, and he hoped that the British people would appreciate the insult. They consisted—two of the supremacy of Parliament, two to prevent the endowment of Religious Bodies and interference with education, two for the protection of the property of Religious Bodies and Corporations, the Lord Lieutenant's veto, the Legislative Council, and the Land Question not to be legislated on for three years. With regard to the veto, Earl Spencer rather took credit for this being a great safeguard. It had, however, been shown that if the Lord Lieutenant attempted to veto Bills they had only to be tacked on to the Appropriation Bill, and Mr. Gladstone had himself admitted that the Lord Lieutenant would not then be able to exercise his veto. What, then, was the value of this veto? Suppose the Irish Government was to pass some Bill which confiscated the property of the landlords or of some other unpopular class, which Bill was supported in the country, and the Lord Lieutenant was able to exercise the veto. The Government, of course, would resign; a Dissolution would follow, and a larger majority would be returned in favour of the measure. What could the Lord Lieutenant do? He must either withdraw his veto or allow the whole Government of Ireland to remain in abeyance. The noble Lord had alluded to the safeguards of the Upper House. That House was to be elected on a franchise of £20, a franchise the noble Lord who spoke last night had shown that it was impossible to get a respectable jury in Ireland under. He wished to know what safeguard there would be if the Upper House consisted of identically the same class as the Lower House—almost all of the same religion—and with the same deadly antagonism to the loyal minority, and the same intense desire to plunder them, and drive them naked and penniless from the country? and yet this House was put forward as a protection of the minority. With that he need not deal further. The Opposition were told they showed a want of trust in the Irish people. He should like to know why the whole nature of the Irish was to be changed? They had declared what they were going to do with landlords, land-grabbers, and the police. Even if these declarations were mere vapourings, every temptation was held out under this Bill to the Irish people to prove their patriotism by fighting the safeguards of what would virtually be a Foreign State. Her Majesty's Government had shown that they did not trust the Irish Parliament a bit more than the Opposition, because they had deprived them of many rights that every civilised nation in the world possesses. Why should the Government do this if the whole nature of the Irish is changed? The noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had laid down as necessary that this measure should be permanent. The Prime Minister concurred in that. Mr. Gladstone said that this Bill was to be a permanent and continuous settlement; but Mr. Gladstone, whenever he came to a difficulty, either declared it was not vital to the Bill or left it to posterity to settle, and the settlement might come at a time when England was least capable of dealing with the difficulty. Mr. Gladstone owed nothing to posterity, at present; but was it possible that he looked forward and already owed a grudge to posterity for what they would think and say of his outrageous attempt to produce anarchy in Ireland, to destroy the British Parliament, and endanger the British Empire, and was prepared to throw every difficulty on its shoulders in consequence? There was one question upon which the whole of this proposed legislation depended, and that was the agrarian question. He did not know whether their Lordships had heard of a very clever man—Finton Lalor—who in 1848 wrote very able articles in The Irish Felon newspaper. He said that it was impossible to carry Repeal unless they linked it to the question of the land, as you would a railway carriage to an engine. Mr. Davitt, Mr. Parnell, and the Nationalists generally had acted on that advice, and if it were not for that advice their Lordships would never have seen the disgraceful surrender of 1886, nor would this outrageous and absurd Bill have been ever brought before their Lordships' House. The noble Duke quoted a passage from a speech of Mr. Gladstone's in which he said that it was an obligation of honour, duty, and prudence not to leave the Irish Land Question to the Irish Legislature. But was that obligation satisfied by putting off its solution for three years? Another quotation had been made from a speech of Lord Spencer's, in which he spoke of a certain action as "mean and treacherous." That was referred to by the noble Duke, and again by Lord Ashbourne. The point of the remark was that it was made by the noble Earl about himself and the Government of which he was a Member. But if it were mean and treacherous in 1886 to leave the Irish landlords to the mercies of the Irish Parliament, what had rendered it less mean and treacherous now? For the first time he agreed with the noble Earl it was the height of meanness and treachery to leave the landlords to the mercy of an Irish Parliament, knowing with certainty that they would be ruined. Their Lordships had heard the noble Lord explaining his reasons for changing his mind — namely, that the Land Purchase Acts had already settled the Land Question. Could a more miserable excuse be made? He did not believe that Lord Spencer could convince his own conscience any more than their Lordships' House that this was a sufficient excuse for such conduct. The noble Earl knew that the Act of 1891 was not a success; very few sales had taken place under it, and those few would be stopped at once if this Bill passed, because the tenants would not buy their land if they thought they could get it for nothing. Between the Acts of 1891 and the Bill of 1886 there was a marked difference. Under the Bill of 1886 it was compulsory on the State to buy, while under the Act of 1891 it was rightly left between the parties whether they would do so or not. Many Members of the Government, from their intense ignorance of Ireland and everything Irish, had no idea of the enormity they were supporting; but Lord Spencer knew Ireland as well as, or better than, himself. The noble Earl knew the cruelty, misery, and destruction this Bill would produce. Now, could he be prepared to hand over the many friends he had made in Ireland—men who supported and assisted him in the government of the country, and from whom he had accepted hospitality—to ruin and despair? It was impossible to understand how the noble Earl could introduce such a Bill—a Bill in which the Land Question had been entirely shirked. Their Lordships had seen the "No Rent" Manifesto and the Plan of Campaign. They had read the Report of the Special Commission, in which it was pointed out that the very men who would form the Executive Government in Ireland were those who "Had combined together to carry out a system of intimidation to promote an agrarian agitation against the payment of agricultural rents, for the purpose of impoverishing and expelling from the country Irish landlords."

Mr. Gladstone stated on the Report stage that the Irish people could not confiscate the landlords' property without the fact being noticed by the House of Commons; but what could the House of Commons do — what power had it left itself under this Bill? Absolutely none, except the power of re-conquest. The noble Lord predicted the difficulties which the Irish landlords would have to face at the hands of the new Irish Legislature when they sought to enforce the payment of rent, and said, suppose the bulk of the tenants refused to pay rent and the landlords issued ejectments, the Judges had power under the Act of 1887 to stay execution as long as the Court thought reasonable. How long would a Judge appointed, and removable by both Houses of the Irish Legislature, think it reasonable to stay execution? But supposing the landlord was able to get possession of the farm, what was to prevent the ex-tenant re-taking possession? It had been done often under the British Government. What would the Irish Government do? Would it be prepared to punish a man who could prove, as every evicted tenant has been able to prove to the satisfaction of the National League, that he had been unjustly evicted? If the landlord got a new tenant he would be what is called a land-grabber. Would the parents of the Evicted Tenants Bill grant much protection to the life and property of a land-grabber? He declared that not one farmer in the world would be mad enough to take a position which would certainly lead to a cruel death. And it would be absolutely impossible that the landlord could work the land himself. There was another great danger he wished to refer to, and that was the Sub-Commissioners. They had seen tenants' valuers giving evidence as to the value they placed on the land, often less than a third of the judicial rent afterwards fixed. Well, he believed these valuations would be enormously high compared to the rents which would be fixed by the Sub-Commissioners appointed by the Irish Executive. Then after three years there would be nothing to prevent the Irish Executive from passing an Act reducing the judicial rents which were in existence. What was the use of the clause in the Bill which said that no one was to be deprived of life and property except by due process of law when no process of law was required to take away every particle of property in Ireland from its present possessors if the Executive Government were handed over to their deadliest enemies? What had the landlords of Ireland done? Their only crime appeared to be that they had been loyal and true to England, and had assisted, as the English garrison, in preserving Ireland to the British Crown. What would be the position of the landlords who sold under the Ashbourne Acts and had left large sums amounting to £2,000,000 out as guarantee deposits, trusting to the honour of the Imperial Government? As far as he could understand, the Irish Executive were to pay to the English Exchequer the interest and principal by a Sinking Fund of 4 per cent. upon the £10,000,000 advanced under the Ashbourne Acts. But only £8,000,000 had been actually paid: £2,000,000 were still retained by the National Debt Commissioners for the guarantee deposits. What was to happen to these £2,000,000? The Irish Government were to pay the principal and interest on the whole £10,000,000, and, therefore, he supposed that these £2,000,000, which belonged of right to the vendors, would be paid over to the Irish Government, who would be responsible for collecting the instalments. He feared that if the Irish Government obtained control over these £2,000,000 the money would probably be made use of to pay the first debts that would be due by the Irish to the English Exchequer. It was an outrageous thing, money having been lent, as this had been, on certain conditions upon Imperial security, that the security should be transferred to what would be a bankrupt State, and one which would have every inducement to withhold both interest and principal from its owners. Was it likely that the purchasers would continue to pay those instalments to the very men who had all along been telling them that they were paying too much for the purchase of their land? He had only dealt with one point in this awful Bill, and had limited his remarks to the effect of it upon holders of land in Ireland. He had not dealt with the expressed intention to tax absentees, of which Mr. Gladstone approved, because he thought it a perfectly immaterial matter, as there would be no property to tax. He thought he had shown their Lordships that it was an absolute certainty that every particle of property in land might be confiscated in four or five different ways, and he had only taken the most prominent ones; but there were many other provisions in the Bill which might be almost as effective for the purpose. He had not dealt with the thousand and one other terrible effects which this Bill would have if it became law. He had not mentioned its effects upon England and the British Empire. He had not mentioned its effect upon Ulster or upon various other classes in Ireland who would be almost equally betrayed and destroyed. He had not dealt with the Exchequer Judges, who were to enforce their decrees against a hostile State without any machinery whatever, nor with the other untold absurdities with which the Bill teemed. Not one argument had been brought forward in favour of such a frightful measure, and not one argument had been produced to prove the necessity of it. It would cause the ruin of thousands upon thousands of almost every class in Ireland. It would steep the country from end to end in ruin, bloodshed, anarchy, and despair, and would undoubtedly cause the most terrible civil war. The Irish Question had always been a difficulty to England, but if this Bill passed it would become ten times the difficulty that it ever was before. But, what was a thousand-fold worse than that, Ireland would for the first time become a terrible danger to the Empire. He did not believe for a moment that the right-thinking British people would ever consent to such a frightful iniquity being perpetrated, and he hoped and believed that their Lordships would throw this Bill out by the largest majority that had ever voted against a measure in their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, that the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs asked their Lordships—he was not quite sure whether he asked it seriously, or as a riddle or conundrum to amuse their Lordships—whether the Irish Peers represented in any way that part of the United Kingdom. If the question were asked as a riddle he would give it up at once; but if it were asked seriously, he confessed that it was difficult to give a distinct answer. It was the first time that Irish Peers had been asked to prove that Irish Peers represented Ireland any more than the noble Earl the Leader of the House represented noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition, or even Lord Rosebery himself, represented that portion of the United Kingdom in which they lived. If, however, he was asked his opinion, he should say distinctly that the Irish Peers did represent a considerable portion of opinion in Ireland. Lord Rosebery, remarking that Lord Muskerry had said that he knew Ireland, asked whether Ireland knew Lord Muskerry. He could not see that the question had any relevance to the subject, but it seemed to him that if Lord Muskerry knew Ireland he was perfectly entitled to give an opinion of a proposal affecting the government of Ireland. He thought that if the noble Earl had reflected a little more he would not have spoken as he did. He was inclined to think that the Duke of Abercorn and the Marquess of Waterford represented a large body of people in Ireland, and his own views coincided with those of the Protestant farmers and labourers, the great bulk of the well-to-do Catholics, and the entire gentry in that part of Ireland in which he lived. The noble Earl said the Debate was useless, because the result was a foregone conclusion. Their Lordships would remember that, so far as the Irish Peers were concerned, the question had been before them for many years. He had not considered this question for 8, 18, or 28 years, but as long as he had been able to consider anything. It was a great mistake to suppose that the owners of landed property in Ireland objected to Home Rule from interested motives or because of racial or religious prejudices. So far as he was concerned, his sympathies were entirely with the people of Ireland. He was inclined, if anything, to be too much attached to the romantic side of the past of Ireland, and he could assure their Lordships that, if with a clear conscience he could identify himself with anything that was a popular movement in Ireland, he should be only too glad to do so. But he objected to Home Rule from conscientious motives, because they knew and understood the country, and knew the ruin it would bring about. Lord Rosebery made a most instructive speech, but it was rather disappointing, for in it he said not a single word about the Bill. He had looked forward to that speech to explain the Bill, and possibly to convert him to the noble Earl's views. The noble Earl said the Bill was of no importance; and what was of importance was the policy, but he forgot to explain the policy. He knew what was the noble Earl's policy with respect to Ireland in 1885, for he then said—

“We ought to govern Ireland and to legislate for Ireland without reference to the Irish vote. To my mind, there is only one policy to be pursued towards Ireland, and it is to treat her exactly, as far as may be, as you would treat any other portion of the United Kingdom.”

He gathered nothing from the speech of the noble Earl, except that he told them it was the duty of a statesman to shift the weight and responsibility from his Chief, and to sift the wheat from the chaff. He gave up all hopes of being a statesman if that were so, because it was absolutely impossible to sift the wheat from the chaff in Lord Rosebery's speech. That was an excellent policy, but it was not the policy of the Bill. He dared say the rejection of the Bill in that House was as much a foregone conclusion for certain reasons as the passing of the Bill by the other House was a foregone conclusion for certain other and totally different reasons. But if the House of Lords did reject the Bill that decision would be the collective result of the well-thought-out and perfectly matured, totally independent, and individual opinion of the Members of the House. With regard to the provisions of the Bill, he did not propose to go into that, but he wished to address himself in trying to discover what were the reasonable grounds for the rosy view of the situation taken by Lord Spencer in introducing the Bill. It was difficult to consider the Bill for this reason, in his opinion: Because they had postponed the Financial Clauses, the Land Question, and the right of Ireland over their own taxes, but he would take the Bill as well as he could. There was one thing that they had all agreed on, and that was the transient nature of the measure. No Representative of the Government had yet answered the very pertinent question put by the Duke of Devonshire—whether, in speaking of supremacy and unity, the Government used the words in the sense in which they were applied to the Empire, or in the sense in which they were applied to the United Kingdom. But, at any rate, the Bill contained provisions by which Ireland would soon make the terms applicable only as they were applicable to the self-governing Colonies. When it was proposed to set up a practically independent State the first thing should be to form an estimate of the feelings of the population towards the measure. Of course, the Bill would be received with acclamation by the professional agitator, who would see a long vista of place and emolument before him. It would also please the mistaken enthusiasts, who believed in the reality of what was only a dream—the prosperity of an independent Ireland. The Bill would also raise immense expectations and hopes doomed to bitter disappointment in the minds of the great bulk of the people, chiefly the more uneducated and ignorant part of the population, who knew nothing of Home Rule or repeal, but who only knew what they were told—that Home Rule would by some mysterious process of political alchemy change the whole condition of Ireland, and with that view they would be temporarily satisfied. And he admitted that the Bill would be popular with those classes—the agitator, the enthusiast, and the ignorant people. On the other side, the Bill broke faith with the highly educated and intelligent classes—the Imperial Civil servants, to whom it would mean ruin, and it also broke faith with that highly educated and highly trained body of men, the Irish Constabulary. Then the class of landowners, though not large and important, must be counted in. For many years the landlords had been subjected to a process of vivisection, and before each operation they had been assured that they were compensated by the additional security given to their body. In 1886 Land Purchase was declared an essential condition of Home Rule, and £115,000,000 was allocated for the purchase of land. Every Party in the State had admitted that the Land Question should be fairly settled; but now, after a respite of three years, the Irish landlords were to be handed over to the tender mercies of the Irish Legislature, to men who had waged war against them, to politicians who over and over again had declared that the value of the landlords' interest in the land in Ireland was the value before a tree was felled, a swamp drained, or before a sod was turned. The landlord was to be taxed to death if he remained in Ireland, and out of existence if he remained out of the country. He did not suppose that this treatment was one likely to cause this class in Ireland to look with favour on the Bill. The noble Earl (Lord Spencer) said that they were secured by the veto; but he did not think it was a very valuable security. Again, the whole of the population in the North of Ireland had demonstrated in the clearest way their utter abhorrence of the measure; so had the great bulk of the more educated Roman Catholics. Nearly the whole of the wealth and practically the whole of the manufacturing industry of the country had all opposed the Bill. In all seriousness he asked noble Lords opposite whether it was wise, politic, or safe, whether it was not an act almost of insanity to start a community on practically a separate and independent career with all the wealth, nearly all the manufacturing industry, and the greater part of the intelligence of the country all bitterly opposed to the new order of things? It might be difficult for their Lordships to realise the state of things in the same way as he understood them; he thought they would change their opinions if they did. He supposed it was no use trying to change the opinion of any noble Lord; but he would appeal to their Lordships, for the sake of the country he was born in and loved, not to inflict this cruel blow upon it. Under just and impartial laws and Executive Ireland was perfectly free. There was no privilege; there was no ascendancy of any person, class, or creed; but, if you removed the balance that was kept by a just and impartial Imperial Parliament, there were forces of disorder—old race animosities, old religious jealousies in the process of becoming extinct—that were still ready to be fanned into flame. If you withdrew the protection enjoyed for nearly 100 years the country must become a prey to social disorder of the worst kind, the battlefield of the rivalry between socialists and priests. It did not matter who was to blame—Catholic or Protestant, Celts or English—we had to look at things as they were. Earl Spencer did not apprehend anything like religious intolerance, and said that it did not initiate popular movements, but glided on the stream ; but the earthen vessel suffered if it came in contact with the iron pot ; and the small farmers of the North would get the worst of it if they came into collision with Archbishop Walsh. He objected to the whole position assumed by the Roman Catholic hierarchy. It was shown in connection with the Meath Election Petitions that it was allowable and even the duty of the priesthood to influence by spiritual means the electors of the country in the way they should vote. On principle he objected to the ministers of any religion interfering in that way in a purely secular duty of the people. He ridiculed the angelic theory in relation to the Irish Nationalist Representatives, whose sudden conversion, by a curious coincidence, occurred, like that of the present Government, precisely at the moment when conversion was necessary in order to attain their ends. Even if the theory were true, it would be impossible for the Irish Legislature, even with the best intentions, to evolve order out of the chaos that must inevitably ensue in Ireland on the withdrawal of the even balance maintained by the active supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. What had been the value of the Union to Ireland ? The Union had converted the Northern Protestant population from being the most disloyal in the two Islands to being probably the most loyal. If the Union had done nothing but that, it would have done a great and useful work. What had it not done for the South and West of Ireland ? If Ireland had been in the position in which she would be placed by this Bill she would have been absolutely ruined in times of famine and agricultural depression, and it was only by the great assistance and the active co-partnership with the United Kingdom and her liberality that she was. There were portions of the country still who looked in bad times to the richer country for support, and they would get it so long as they formed part of the United Kingdom, but what would become of those portions of the country when they were no longer a part of it. Nothing could compensate Ireland for the loss of the Union. There was not an industry in the country which would not suffer from the withdrawal of English capital and credit. Ireland herself had got no capital and no credit ; she had not natural resources to enable her to obtain a loan, unless it was, as it was said in another place, under the altered circumstances she would have a plethora of wealth. They would do the greatest injury that mortal man could devise to Ireland if they passed this Bill, and Ireland had done nothing to deserve it. It had been said that the other House had received a mandate to pass this Bill. He utterly and entirely denied that this Bill was before the country at the last General Election. They had been told that the Labour Members had voted for Home Rule, but they had not been told that the Prime Minister had received a deputation of the Labour Members, and they had pressed him for an answer to certain categorical questions and had got an answer from him. They asked him, if they could show him that the Eight Hours Bill was more important than Home Rule, whether he could modify his views upon it. And Mr. Gladstone for some time said that he could not change his opinion, and he could not do anything to help them until Home Rule was satisfied. Of course, under the circumstances, Labour was content to put Home Rule on its programme. If they looked at the speeches and addresses of many of the Gladstonian candidates at the last General Election, a considerable number contained no allusion whatever to Home Rule, others mentioned it vaguely, and some supported it on three grounds—that it would relieve taxation, that it would be a final and permanent settlement of the Irish Question, and that it would enable Parliament to attend to legislation for England and Scotland. Not one of those conditions were fulfilled in this Bill. The noble Earl (Earl Spencer) had admitted it himself in his speech that the only way that the provisions of a Bill like this could be forced was by military force superseding the statutory government by Martial Law.

EARL SPENCER : I did not say Martial Law ; I said military force.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN asked how he was going to draw a distinction between military force and Martial Law ? It should not be forgotten that England's weakness was Ireland's opportunity, and he would be a bold man who should prophesy that this country would never be at war again. But if she were to, what would be the position of Ireland then. They would not have a friend in Ireland. In five years they would have estranged all the educated people in the country, and have made enemies of those classes who had been disappointed and found their hopes blighted. They would have found an Executive Government hostile to them, Parliament hostile to them, and a people hostile to them. If this nation surrendered a great strategical position like Ireland, it must safeguard itself against the possible consequences of making a large increase to the Army and Navy, and this would necessitate a great pecuniary sacrifice. What possible chance or sign was there that this measure would be a permanent settlement of the Irish Question? The Land Question was still unsettled, and the financial arrangement was unsettled. It was perfectly true that the other day Mr. J. M'Carthy was put up in the House of Commons to say grace for the Bill, and very nicely he said it; but little, if any, importance could be attached to that, for up to the present hour no recognised Leader of the Nationalist Party had declared that that Party would be satisfied with this measure. The postponed subjects must give rise to endless Debates in Parliament before they were settled, and did they think that there would be no more active obstruction on behalf of the Irish Members who were retained, and who were not satisfied with the Bill? Moreover, Ireland would be obliged in her own self-interest to obtain help from Great Britain in a variety of ways, and the obstruction of the Irish Members in Parliament must become more extensive. The Bill sacrificed British interests in every way. Nothing could be done to protect British labour against the dire effect of the influx of Irish labourers that must follow upon the destruction of Irish industries by the withdrawal of British capital. Differences of opinion on questions of war and neutrality, on questions of actual legislation in matters of divorce, the hours of work, and factory legislation generally, must create immense frictions between the two countries. It was proposed by this Bill to set up within sight of Britain a practically independent community—a State absolutely honeycombed with the germs of civil disorder; a State that must be bankrupt from the commencement of its being, and which would be bound to look to some extraordinary source for the means of conducting its industries and commerce; and you would endow this State with innumerable means of harassing the trade and commerce of Great Britain and jeopardising her neutrality in case of war, and endangering her position in time of war. Not content to impose a measure fraught with such dangers to Great Britain, the Government had the effrontery to ask Great Britain to pay for it. From the very conduct of the Bill by the Government the absurdity of it was demonstrated. Let them look at the question of finance. First of all, the contribution of Ireland to Imperial taxation was to be 1-15th. Then that was changed to 1-26th, and that was changed to 1-40th, and then it was given up in despair, and the whole question was relegated to a distant future. So with the Irish representation. The Government first proposed exclusion, then the in-and-out plan, and now they sought to perpetrate the greatest absurdity that ever emanated from the mind of man. The truth was the principle of Home Rule collapsed the moment they tried to put it into practice. It was well enough to take it as an ideal, and as in the main perfect, but they could not put it into practice. What was this change to do for them? They had heard that it was to give satisfaction to Ireland, but they must not forget that Ireland was not going to be satisfied as they wished it to be. It had been said that the Irish were contented in the United States and the Colonies. What difference was there between the Common Law of those countries and the Common Law of the United Kingdom? What greater share had Irishmen in America in the making of the laws than Irishmen in the United Kingdom? Not one word of proof had been given that the Bill would do any good to Ireland. The Bill would not satisfy the aspirations of the Nationalist Party, and it would dissatisfy everyone else. The only thing the Irish people cared for was to get their land cheaply, and for nothing if possible. The Bill was not an advance. It was not the result of any natural growth or demand. It was not a matter of federation. It was not the relaxation of tutelage, the granting of the rights of manhood to growing and expanding communities, as in the case of self-governing colonies. It was not the result of a natural, national demand in Ireland constitutionally expressed for local self-government as could be given with real and effective security for the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament and the unity of the Kingdoms. The Government were acting in compliance with the demand of men whose real objects, they must know, were the absolute independence of Ireland and the encompassing of the ruin of Great Britain. They had told the electors that the Union had been accomplished by fraud and force, and that it had been detrimental to Ireland. That was a delusion. They had been told also that a measure of this kind would satisfy to the full the aspirations and the demands of the Nationalist Party. That was a gross delusion. For the civil and religious liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland, for the effective supremacy of the British Parliament, for the maintenance of the unity of the Kingdom and of the Empire, the Government relied entirely on the most precarious security—the power and the goodwill and intention of men whose public career was perfectly well known to all. This House would only be doing its Constitutional duty in rejecting the Bill, while it was also its duty to stand up in such a case for free speech, and to stand between the people and tyranny. He had given as shortly as possible the reasons why he should go into the Lobby and vote for the Amendment of the Duke of Devonshire, acting under his sense of duty, and believing the course which he adopted was the true course towards his beloved country.

LORD SANDHURST said, that he would put before their Lordships the reasons which induced him to support this Bill. He must crave their indulgence for the few remarks he was about to make. The Bill had been debated by a large number of speakers—noble Lords who had held high administrative Offices in the service of the Crown. Now, the noble Marquess of Londonderry had wondered what the effect would be in the Colonies if this Bill were passed. Well, he was in the Australian Colonies after the rejection of the Bill of 1886, and on all sides he was met with this question—Why on earth has Home Rule been refused? The supporters of the Government were taunted with following their Leader. Well, they had a Leader they were proud to follow; and the noble Marquess had a Leader, or, perhaps, two, for he spoke about the noble Duke as one to whom he owed allegiance. In Ulster did they have leaders, or was every man his own leader, on the principle of every man his own lawyer, with the same distinction as the clients? It was said there were thousands of Protestants and tens of thousands of Catholics opposed to Home Rule; but the assertion could not be accepted whilst four-fifths of the Irish people were represented by Home Rulers in the House of Commons. The noble Marquess uttered a threat last night in describing the action of his Ulster friends in view of Home Rule.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: I uttered no threat whatever.

LORD SANDHURST retorted that of course the noble Marquess could put his own construction on his own words, but his opponents were at liberty to place their own construction upon them, and in his opinion the words conveyed a threat of a most distinct character. In regard to threats, and in regard to some of those itinerant orators who had been to the North of Ireland using language which certainly would not have the effect of quelling but rather of promoting disturbance, he would quote a passage from a speech delivered by a learned lawyer in this country after a statement had been made by Lord R. Churchill—

“We ought all of us to condemn these foolish, these wicked rumours that are made about Ulster—that the minority in Ireland will find resort to arms, and that they will be right in doing so. Unreservedly I declare that any man who by word or act encourages such an idea is at heart a traitor.”

These were the words of Sir H. James, a close colleague of the noble Duke. For noble Lords to say that there was no mandate from the country and that the question of Home Rule was not before it at the General Election was playing with words. Had there been a single meeting of the Conservative Party where it had not been put before the labourers that if Home Rule were passed England would be flooded with Irish, who would take away their work? The first and foremost part of every speech had been this question of Home Rule. It had been said by the noble Duke that this Bill had been forced through the House of Commons, and that if it had not been for the knowledge that it would be thrown out in their Lordships' House a great many Members would not have voted for it. He would like to know whether in the ranks of the Liberal Party or the Nationalist Party the noble Duke had a confidant? But if he had not it was unworthy of the noble Duke to speak thus of a Party of which he was once a Member. It had been said that capital was leaving Ireland in consequence of the introduction of this Bill, but the Stock of the Bank of Ireland stood to-day very nearly as high as it did last year, and there was hardly an Irish Railway Company whose dividend had fallen, while in some cases their dividends had increased, and he had been told there were large operations on the Stock Exchange and speculations. Had the old system of coercion and occasional conciliatory measures promoted harmony between the British Government and the Irish people? Everyone, he thought, must agree that it had not. The impoverished condition of the people in many parts of Ireland surely proved that something was amiss with the system of administration. For 93 years the plan of governing Ireland from England had been tried, and there were clear indications that it had failed. The Government had endeavoured to put before Parliament a Home Rule Bill which satisfied the aspirations of the Nationalists, by whom it had been accepted. It was said that there had been no discussion of the Bill in the House of Commons, but he maintained that its main points had been discussed in another place, and the retention of the Irish Members had been fully discussed. With regard to safeguards he would suggest that they should all be considered together. He looked at them, not only from an Imperial point of view, but from the point of view of common sense, and he could not believe that the Irish Council would engage at once in an internecine struggle to gain a separation which they had affirmed that they did not require, and which they knew perfectly well it would be impossible for them to get. Nor did he believe that on the morrow of their emancipation they would prove themselves so unpractical, intolerant, and unjust as to stamp their proceedings with the verdict that they were incapable and ought not to be trusted of themselves and their country. He thought it would be found to be the ambition of the Irish Leaders to prove themselves capable men, and that their policy would be actuated, not by greed or religious oppression, but by a singleness of purpose and a love of their country. Lord Cadogan had put a question to him with regard to the troops in Ireland, and had expressed the opinion that it would be extremely undesirable that the troops should be under the new Irish Cabinet. The Home Rule Cabinet would have no control over the Military Forces for the purpose of obtaining their aid to repress disturbances. If for that purpose they required the assistance of the troops they must apply to the Lord Lieutenant, who would either apply to the Secretary for War or, as an officer of the Crown, himself request the commander of the troops to send the necessary force. The local Magistrates would have the same power to call upon the troops to aid in suppressing, neither more nor less than they possessed now. This power was dependent on the obligation of every citizen to aid the Magistrate in suppressing riot. It was, therefore, quite independent of the Irish Cabinet. The demand for Home Rule arose from a deeply-rooted national sentiment. Those who had doubts as to the Home Rule policy need only study Mr. Lecky's history—second only to Mr. Chamberlain's speeches of seven years ago—to be at once converted. He quite agreed there were two Irelands. Reference had been made to America, and he quite agreed there was the Ireland that was beyond the sphere of that House in the various Colonies; but he believed this measure would turn every Irishman in America and the Colonies from hostile critics into active agents for Great Britain. Of course, the Bill would be rejected; but he should follow his noble Leader into the Lobby with the most sincere and absolute conviction that the Bill was not only politic, but right and just.

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, that he shared the regret which the Foreign Secretary had expressed on account of being separated from his former Colleagues. But he admired the noble Earl's adroitness. Though he held the attention of the House for an hour and a half, in no part of his speech did he endeavour to meet the objections urged against the Bill. Nor did he in any part of his speech express his own approval of any portion of the Bill. The noble Earl attacked the Opposition because they were not prepared to read the Bill a second time, and go into Committee for the purpose of discussing the details of the Bill, and, indeed, of framing some new plan for settling the Irish Question. The responsibility of framing such a measure as this must rest with Her Majesty's Government, and not with the Opposition, however strong they might be. The speech of the noble Earl was obviously too late. It was a speech which might have been made with perfect propriety in support of an abstract Resolution in favour of Home Rule; but it was different in the present position of affairs, when the noble Earl was bound to give his reasons for supporting a measure which, after seven years' consideration, was introduced by a Government of which he was a Member, and, as far as could be seen, of which he did not express approval. The noble Earl said he was in favour of some measure of Home Rule, and it appeared to him that both the noble Earl and Lord Brassey would be glad to see this Bill defeated, or at least pulled to pieces if they saw the opportunity to do so. The last speaker referred to the measure of Local Government for Ireland introduced by the Opposition, but that reminded him of a remark made by the noble Earl which struck him as a very remarkable one. The noble Earl praised the London County Council Bill as one of the most revolutionary measures he recollected. The Unionist Government introduced a Bill for Ireland founded on precisely the same principles and dealing with similar affairs. But why was that measure denounced by the noble Earl and his friends? If the House of Lords considered it their duty to reject a Bill on the Second Reading it was their duty to give their reasons for doing so, particularly when, as in this case, the Bill had not been adequately discussed in the other House. Even if Home Rule were right, did the financial clauses meet the essential provisions of such a Bill as laid down by the Prime Minister? These were equitable distribution of Imperial charges, some reasonable prospect of finality, and the assent of Ireland. Only one of the Financial Clauses had been discussed in the other House, and yet these clauses affected the interest of the taxpayers of the United Kingdom. Their Lordships were unable to amend these clauses, but they had the right to discuss them. The Irish contribution to Imperial charges in 1892-93 was estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be £2,300,000, and under the Bill the contribution to be paid was £2,276,000, from which certain deductions had to be made, and the net result of the financial arrangement was that Great Britain would have to pay more than £500,000 a year during six years in order to carry Home Rule. The Prime Minister had said that the taxpayers of England and Scotland must contribute something towards the Irish surplus. His noble Friend, Lord Spencer, said that if England desired to carry this measure she would not wish to treat Ireland "in a niggardly manner." Now, generosity was a feeling congenial to Englishmen, but in a matter of business those representing the taxpayers of England must look ahead. Home Rule for Scotland loomed in the future; the English taxpayer would be asked to give a contribution "in no niggardly manner" to provide a surplus for Scotland. The English and Welsh taxpayers would then suffer. Something had been heard about Home Rule for Wales. If that should come, and nothing was improbable after what they had seen with respect to the Irish Question, the English taxpayer would have to contribute "in no niggardly manner" a surplus to support the new Welsh Government. And then they came to Home Rule for poor England, and who was to make a contribution "in no niggardly manner" to England? It was necessary for the English taxpayer to take care he did not allow the first beginning of a principle of that kind to separate the finance of the United Kingdom, and at once to place this matter not upon generosity alone, but upon a fair and equitable distribution of the Imperial charges of the United Kingdom.

EARL SPENCER (interposing) explained that, while he spoke of dealing with Ireland in no niggardly spirit, he added arguments to show that the arrangement would be a very good bargain for England.

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, that his noble Friend stated that it was not a bad bargain for England, because we had from time to time to assist Ireland in public works, light railways, and so on. But in the calculation of £2,300,000 was included a large sum for those light railways and public works, and therefore the consideration which his noble Friend had brought forward had been discounted. The financial plan of the Government in this Bill was based upon the Estimates of one year, and what reliance could be placed on such a calculation? Notwithstanding the great ability and care of the officers of the Inland Revenue a mistake of some £350,000 had been made this very year, and that mistake had invalidated altogether the first calculations laid before Parliament by Mr. Gladstone. How did they know that as large a mistake might not have been made in the present calculations? Their Lordships were asked to pass this Bill before they had the least idea upon what basis this arrangement stood. Whether they looked at the plan with reference to the Chancellor of the Exchequer of Ireland or the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the United Kingdom, it was open to the most serious objection. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of the United Kingdom would never be able to consider his Budget without at the same time considering what would be its effect upon the Revenue of the Irish Government. The proposed arrangement would remove all inducement to economy on the part of the new Irish Legislature, and the main part of the Irish Revenue would depend on the duties from alcoholic liquor. Mr. Parnell said the first action of an Irish Government would be to restrict the consumption of alcoholic liquor, but it would be impossible for them to do so, because if they did their Revenue would diminish and their finances would be disturbed. The proposal was, therefore, inequitable to Great Britain and embarrassing to both Exchequers. Mr. Gladstone told a deputation from the Belfast Chamber of Commerce that after the Bill passed there would be a plethora of wealth in Ireland; but the deputation had supplied information to the right hon. Gentleman which entirely demolished his statistics, and no reply had since been given to the Chamber, although it seemed to have influenced some of the colleagues of the Prime Minister, for Mr. Fowler said that it would be impossible for the Irish Government to make any large reduction in expenditure. The Provost of Trinity College had said with truth that the proposed contribution was "a great deal too much for England to give and not half enough for Ireland to get." To establish a new Government must cost a considerable amount of money, and thus this new Legislature would find itself in great straits, even with the surplus, inequitable to England, which it was proposed to supply. The plan of the Government was on the face of it merely temporary. That was especially true now of the financial scheme, and thus one of the essential conditions laid down by Mr. Gladstone—namely, that the arrangement ought not to be "in the nature of a mere provocation to the revival of fresh demands," had been abandoned at the bidding of the Irish Party, by whom the Bill was viewed as a mere instalment. In conclusion, he hoped that he had proved to their Lordships, although he could have done it at greater length, that the Bill did not give "an equitable distribution for Imperial charges;" that it did not "promise to be a real settlement;" that it had not received the assent of Ireland; and that it must produce embarrassment in the future to both countries. He declared his belief that the country would support their Lordships in their rejection of this measure.

Further Debate adjourned till Tomorrow.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCHOOL ATTENDANCE) BILL.

Read 3^a (according to Order), with the Amendment, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

PUBLIC HEALTH (LONDON) ACT, 1891, AMENDMENT BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order): Bill reported without Amendment: Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a To-morrow.

House adjourned at Two o'clock a.m. till Eleven o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 7th September 1893.

QUESTIONS.

SHEFFIELD UNION.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he has any objection to communicating to the Guardians, or the Sheffield Press, the Report of the Inspector as to the division of the township into wards for the election of Guardians of the Poor, for the satisfaction of the ratepayers concerned?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The Reports made to the Local Government Board by their Inspectors in cases such as that referred to are confidential, and I cannot furnish copies to the Guardians or the Press. The responsibility for the decision in cases like the present one rests exclusively with the Local Government Board.

CUSTOMS BOATMEN.

MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the cause of the delay in announcing to the Customs boatmen the promised information of the decision of the Treasury as to their improved pay; whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the employment of some of their number for over 100 hours a week, taking into account the time necessary for clearing, leaving for the night, or being relieved; and is it the fact that a man entering the service at 20 years of age cannot attain 30s. a-week until he is 45 years of age?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The delay is due to some necessary correspondence between the Treasury and the Board of Customs as to minor details; but the delay will not affect the men prejudicially, as the improvements now sanctioned will take effect retrospectively from 1st April, 1891. The second paragraph is assumed to refer to boatmen in London assigned to boarding duty. I am informed that no such officer has been employed for over 100 hours per week; the average attendance per week is from 80 to 90 hours, but for 20 to 25 hours of this time the men are only kept within call, and may devote the time to reading, sleeping, or recreation, as they please. The statement in the last paragraph is not correct even at the old rate of increment, and under the new rate of increment a boatman will reach 30s. a week still earlier than at present.

VACCINATION PROSECUTIONS.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that, despite the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission on Vaccination, the vaccination officer of the Uppingham Union is again instituting proceedings against persons who have already been convicted and punished for not having their children vaccinated; and if he will direct such officers in the Uppingham and other Unions to discontinue prosecuting persons who have previously suffered the penalties for the same offence in regard to the same children?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Local Government Board have no information as to the case referred to. The opinion which the Board have held as to repeated prosecutions was expressed in what is known as the Evesham letter, and they still hold the same view. I am not empowered to give the directions which my hon. Friend suggests.

MR. LOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that Ernest Ambrose Adams, residing at Bingham, in the Harborough Division of Leicestershire, was in October last proceeded against for not having his three children vaccinated, and then paid fines and costs amounting to 30s. or thereabouts; and was on Tuesday the 5th instant again prosecuted before the Uppingham Justices on account of the same offence in regard to the same children, and, although not fined, was again ordered to pay costs amounting to 10s. 6d.; and if, having regard to the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission on Vaccination, he will order the costs in this case to be remitted?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): As I have frequently been obliged to say in answer to similar questions, I cannot give effect to the recommendation of the Royal Commission until Parliament sees fit to alter the law.

THE GWYLWYR SETT QUARRY.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Crown Quarry, called the Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, Carnarvonshire, is being worked by the lessee; and, if not, will he explain why; whether there is any, and, if so, what provision in the lease to compel the lessee to work it; and why that provision is not enforced?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Gwylwyr Sett Quarry is being worked, and there are five men at present employed there. The provisions in the lease for compelling the lessees to work are a certain or dead rent of £50 per annum, and a covenant requiring the lessees to work continuously with at least two able-bodied quarrymen. These provisions are being complied with.

THE WATERFORD AND LIMERICK RAILWAY.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been drawn to the resolutions passed at the last half-yearly meeting of the shareholders of the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company on 31st ultimo, stating that they considered the action of the Board of Trade, in limiting the number of mixed trains on their service, as interfering with the interests of the company, the convenience of the public, and the progress of local business; and whether he can advise that this resolution will be favourably considered?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Brightside): The Board of Trade have not received the resolution referred to; but while I can promise that such a Memorial would have careful consideration, I must remind the hon. Member that the Legislature has imposed statutory duties on the Board of Trade, in the interest of public safety, which it is not possible for me to disregard.

TORY ISLAND.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any communication has been made to him by the Committee of Lloyds with regard to the maintenance of cable communication between Tory Island and the mainland?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes; my attention has been called to this matter by the Committee of Lloyds, whose letters on the subject have been referred for the consideration of the Royal Commission on Electrical Communication.

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this matter on Supply.

EXAMINATION IN SEAMANSHIP.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, during the examinations in seamanship on the Britannia, the instructors in seamanship are allowed to be present; and whether he will consider the advisability of excluding the instructors from these examinations, and leaving the cadets alone with the examining officers?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The answer to the first paragraph is that it is under orders of the examiners that the instructors attend during the examination; and to the second paragraph, that no reason is known for their exclusion.

LIGHT VESSELS AND LIGHTHOUSES.

MR. LODER (Brighton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what light vessels have been or are being connected with the land by telegraph or telephone; whether all the shore, island, and pile lighthouses recommended by the Royal Commission on Electrical Communication have been so connected; and whether the experiment of connecting the Fastnet lighthouse with Crookhaven by a non-continuous cable has yet been carried out?

MR. MUNDELLA: The work of connecting the Kentish Knock light vessel with the shore by telephone is now in progress. Lundy Island has been connected. Either the Tuskar or Gunfleet lighthouse will be put in hand at once, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has also authorised the connection of the Goodwin (North Sand Head) light vessel; all the shore lighthouses recommended except that at the Needles, which is now in hand, have been already telephonically connected with the land. The experiment of connecting the Fastnet lighthouse with Crookhaven by a non-continuous cable has not yet been carried out.

POSTMEN'S VACANCIES.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can state approximately the number of vacancies for established postmen which occurred in the Metropolitan district and in the Provinces respectively in the years 1892-3, and the number of telegraph messengers who were eligible for such vacancies; and whether the preference of soldiers over telegraph messengers and outsiders had come into operation within the Metropolitan District in the said year?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): I have the figures for the year ended August, 1892, and perhaps my right hon. Friend will be satisfied with those. They are as follows:—Number of postmen's vacancies filled in London during the year, 522; in the rest of the United Kingdom, 1,478. For these vacancies, there were in London 245 telegraph messengers eligible, and in the rest of the Kingdom 543. The policy of giving preference to soldiers over telegraph messengers has never come into operation, because the list of those with claims was not exhausted when the rule was altered. The preference to soldiers over outsiders in those cases in which there are no telegraph messengers with claims was made effective in November, 1891, and is still in force.

ABERDARE JUNCTION STATION.

MR. A. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, in view of the fact that General Hutchinson, in a Report dated 17th June, 1893, to the Board of Trade, stated that to enter the Aberdare Junction Station by the existing approach is a most dangerous proceeding and one that ought to be put a stop to without unnecessary loss of time, will he explain why no steps have been taken to render the approach to the station such as could be used with safety?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Railway Company have constructed a footbridge over the main line, and they contend that an improved access to the station should be constructed by the property owners or the inhabitants at large. General Hutchinson reported that it was reasonable that a fair share of the expense of improving the means of access should be borne by the property owners and the Local Authority, and the Board of Trade will be glad to use their best endeavours to arrange a settlement. The hon. Member will, however, understand that the Board have no power to use compulsion in the matter.

WALNEY LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the charges now made on all shipping entering the Port of Barrow for the Walney Lighthouse dues, a light which is reported by shipmasters entering that port as useless and not required, he will take steps to enforce the powers the Board of Trade possess, and call upon the proper authorities to inspect this light and report if the light is required, and whether it should not be abolished; and whether he will obtain a Return of the receipts and expenditure of the Walney Light, and the application of the surplus revenue reported to amount to several thousand pounds yearly, which, contrary to the Local Lighthouse Act, is applied by the Lancaster Harbour Commissioners and Furness Railway Company to other purposes than maintenance of the light?

MR. MUNDELLA: Walney Island Light was not established merely as a harbour light leading vessels to the Port of Barrow, but for the benefit of all vessels navigating Morecambe Bay. Light dues in connection with it are chargeable under Statute on all vessels trading to the several ports in the district. No complaint has reached the Board of Trade as to its inefficiency for the purpose for which it was instituted. As regards the latter part of the hon. Member's question, the Board are already engaged in collecting the information asked for from the different authorities concerned.

PAYMENTS FOR MAIL SERVICES.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what sums were paid in the last financial year for mail services or otherwise by the Post Office to each of the following Companies:—Cunard Company, Royal Mail Company, Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company, New Zealand Shipping Company, Union Company (African), Castle Packets Company, Orient Steam Navigation Company, and Pacific Mail Steam Ship Company; and whether any subsidies or payments for mail services were received by the same companies from any Colonial or Foreign Governments; and, if so, how much?

MR. A. MORLEY: The amounts paid by the Post Office in the last financial year to the Companies named were as follows:—Cunard Company, £49,399; Royal Mail Company, £92,855; Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company, £49; New Zealand Shipping Company, £99; Union Company, £424; Castle Packets Company, £528; Orient Steam Navigation Company, £85,738; Pacific Steam Navigation Company, £20,114. I am not in a position to say what subsidies or payments for mail services were made to these Companies by Colonial or Foreign Governments.

MONEY LENDING IN THE DOCKYARDS.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the remarks of the County Court Judge at Sheerness as to money-lending in the dockyards; and whether he will put a stop to such practices, in the interest of the men and officers in the employment of the Government?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): My hon. Friend has not supplied me with a report of the learned Judge's observations, and I have not been able to obtain one. I am informed that the money-lending transaction in question took place outside the yard, and, therefore, beyond the jurisdiction of the superintendent. In such a case, I do not see how the authorities could interfere without unduly trenching upon the personal freedom of the men.

NAVAL OFFICERS' LEAVE.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether there has been any exceptional advantage, as regards leave granted to the men, as compared with the officers engaged in the past Naval Manœuvres; and, if so, why?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: No such comparison as the question suggests can fairly be made. I informed the hon. Gentleman on Friday last what leave had, in the usual course, been granted to officers who served in the Naval Manœuvres. To the men seven days' leave has been given.

LARNE AND STRANRAER MAIL SERVICE.

MR. YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that there is no mail boat service on Sundays between Larne and Stranraer, although the line is subsidised by Government; and will he take steps to remedy this state of things in the interest of the public?

MR. A. MORLEY: I am aware that the mail boats between Stranraer and Larne do not run on Sundays. The improved service on weekdays not long since afforded involved a very large additional expenditure, and further outlay for the purpose of establishing a Sunday service would not be warranted.

VOLUNTEER EQUIPMENT.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if, having regard to the heavy expense entailed upon Volunteer corps, and especially upon the officers, to provide the equipment necessary to earn the capitation grant, if by their exertions the strength of a battalion largely increases, it is possible to make a grant per head in respect of such equipment as was done two years ago for the Volunteers then serving?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The special issue of 1890-1 was made under exceptional circumstances, and it is not proposed to further supplement the regulated allowances of Volunteer corps. For an explanation of the practice in this matter, I would refer the hon. and gallant Member to my answers to him on February 27, 1893, and to the hon. Member for Preston on May 1, 1893.

VOLUNTEER DECORATIONS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Volunteer Decoration is still conferred by Parcel Post; and whether he will consider the advisability of conferring this decoration in some more formal manner?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Volunteer Officers' Decoration is usually presented at a parade or other suitable assembly of Volunteers; but in cases where officers, owing to ill-health or on account of distance, are unable to attend such parade, the post is obviously the best means of transmitting the decoration. I may add that officers of the Regular Army, under similar circumstances, receive their "orders" and medals in the same way.

THE QUEEN'S BUCKHOUNDS.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government intend to do away with the Royal Buckhounds?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): My hon. Friend has asked me a very difficult question indeed; but, of course, I do not know whether he is aware of the difficulties of it. The Government have had the matter in view; but they found so many difficulties surrounding it that they have not been able to arrive at a conclusion with regard to it. I hope that on more mature deliberation I shall be able to give my hon. Friend a more satisfactory answer.

MR. A. C. MORTON: In the Autumn Session?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am afraid that this can scarcely be regarded as a "non-controversial subject."

MR. DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government will in this case adopt the process which has been followed with regard to the Welsh Suspensory Bill?

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is a matter that will require consideration.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, instead of doing away with the Royal Buckhounds by a suspensory process, the right hon. Gentleman will consider the propriety of poisoning them?

SIR. W. HARCOURT: No.

THE IMPORTATION OF RAGS.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether cholera is now prevalent in Smyrna; and whether he is aware that one of the largest importers of rags in England has received a telegram, dated September 2, offering 800 bales of cotton rags to be delivered forthwith in Liverpool; and, if this be so, what steps the Government propose to take to prevent so serious a risk and danger to the lives of so largely a populated place as Liverpool?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am aware that cholera is prevalent in Smyrna. The Medical Officer of Health of Liverpool has informed the Medical Department of the Local Government Board that no difficulty has arisen there in connection with the regulations as to the importation of rags packed in bales and imported as merchandise, and no difficulty is anticipated by him. The hon. Member, on September 1, asked me whether I was aware that there were lying in the wharves at London Bridge over 300 tons of rags imported from cholera-stricken places in Europe which the rag merchants in London refused to touch or take from the fear of introducing cholera. As I was unable to obtain any information which supported this statement in the question, the hon. Member subsequently informed me that the 300 tons of rags were then lying at Cotton's Wharf, London Bridge. An Inspector of the Local Government Board immediately visited that wharf; he found no rags there, and he was assured by the superintendent that there had not been any rags at the wharf which the merchants had refused to take.

MR. MACDONA asked whether it was true, as stated in The Globe of yesterday, that 400 bales of rags, weighing 200 tons, were despatched from St. Katherine's Dock, the destination of the greater part being Yorkshire, and thousands of tons of rags, which had been imported from Turkey and the Eastern ports of Europe were stored in the different docks and warehouses on the Thames, and that these rags were in a foul and filthy condition?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I cannot answer for the accuracy of a newspaper paragraph. I have already explained that the importation of filthy and infected rags is absolutely prohibited. What were described at the recent Congress at Dresden as "rags of merchandise" which have been collected over a long series of years, packed by hydraulic pressure, bound round by iron bands, and having the name of the place of origin marked upon them, are held by medical authorities at home and abroad to be rags that ought not to be prohibited. Under these circumstances, acting upon the advice of the Medical Department of the Local Government Board, and with the full knowledge that by prohibiting the importation of these rags I should be putting a stop to many important industries and putting a large number of people out of employment, I have not felt justified in prohibiting the importation of these rags, and in acting in direct violation of the Resolutions that were passed by the Dresden Congress, and which were signed on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. It is the opinion of the Government that no risk or danger will be incurred through the importation of these rags of merchandise.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST CHOLERA IN IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Local Government Board has lately issued any instructions to rural Boards of Guardians with respect to the course to be adopted in case cholera should break out; if the Local Government Board possesses any temporary hospitals or huts which can be at once furnished on an outburst of cholera to any locality; and has it made any provisions for an immediate supply of nurses for first cases?

MR. ASQUITH (who replied) said: The Local Government Board have issued full instructions to all Sanitary Authorities, including Boards of Guardians, as to the course to be adopted in case cholera should break out in Ireland; and during the present year the Board have been in frequent communication with Sanitary Authorities on the subject, both by correspondence and by personal conference between the Authorities and the Board's Inspectors. It is believed the Authorities are now fully alive to their duties and responsibilities in the matter. The Board have no hospitals or huts which could be furnished for the use of Local Authorities, but they have prepared plans and specifications for an inexpensive form of temporary hospital, particulars of which have been communicated to the Authorities, and will be found in the Board's last Annual Report lately presented to Parliament. I may also observe that an Act has been passed this Session enabling Sanitary Authorities to take possession of land for the erection of cholera hospitals. With regard to the last paragraph of the question, it is the duty of the Local Authorities to provide nurses; and the Board, through their Medical Inspectors, as well as by a recent Circular Letter, have impressed upon the Local Authorities the importance of this matter, and pointed out how the object in view can be attained.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has succeeded in drafting a clause to deal with sub-contracting; and, if so, whether he will place it upon the Paper in the course of the present Sittings, in order that there may be time for the consideration of it in the country by those interested before the Employers' Liability Bill is brought forward on Report?

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir; I have not been able, up to the present moment, to devise a satisfactory solution of this difficult problem. If I am able to do so, there will be no delay in putting down the clause.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): Will the right hon. Gentleman do the same in regard to any Amendments which he may have to propose to the new clause standing in the name of the hon. Member for Crewe in reference to insurance?

MR. ASQUITH: The Government have no intention of proposing any Amendments to that clause.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the unanimous Resolution passed by the Trades Congress calling upon him and the Government to stand by the clause of the Bill preventing contracting out of the Act?

MR. ASQUITH: My attention has been called to the proceedings at the Trades Union Congress; but the Government never had any intention of making any alteration in the clause as to "contracting out."

CAMPS OF EXERCISE.

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any arrangement has yet been arrived at with regard to the acquisition of the deer park in Antrim Castle demesne as a camp of exercise?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir; no arrangement has been arrived between the General Officer commanding in Ireland and Lord Massereene as to the use of the deer park of Antrim Castle.

THE IRISH EVICTED TENANTS.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now state, with any degree of definition, when he intends to introduce his promised Bill with regard to the evicted tenants?

MR. ASQUITH: The Government will not be in a position to make any statement on this subject before the Adjournment, nor until they have viewed the legislative business of next Session as a whole.

THE CONVICT DALY.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Daly, a convict, is being punished for statements alleged to have been made without his knowledge at a distance of some hundred miles from his prison; and whether Daly is now prevented from receiving visits?

MR. ASQUITH: The answer to both questions is in the negative. Daly will, in the course of a few days, be visited by a relative.

FOLKESTONE CASUALS.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the decision of the Elham Guardians to increase the existing accommodation for casuals at the Union workhouse, instead of providing a casual ward at Folkestone, from which a large number of casuals have to walk; and whether, in view of the fact that Elham Union is over five miles distant from Folkestone, it is intended, during the coming winter, to subject applicants for relief in Folkestone, men, women, and children, to the necessity of walking over five miles before they obtain that relief?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I understand that the Guardians of the Elham Union have had under consideration the provision of additional casual wards, and that they resolved that these wards should be erected at Elham, and not at Folkestone. I have not, however, as yet received any application from the Guardians on the subject. When that is received it will be my duty to give the proposals of the Guardians my most careful consideration. Since the previous question of the hon. Member as to the casual ward arrangements of the Union was put to me, the Local Government Board directed the Inspector of the district to visit the wards and report fully on the subject. The facts are these:—The casual wards of the Union were erected in 1886, and are about the best wards in the County of Kent. They are built on the cellular system, and accommodate 20 men and 10 women. Each cell is warmed by a hot-water pipe and fitted with a bell. The beds are straw mattresses and rugs on a wooden platform. There are day rooms, and a disinfecting and drying room. This is the only building which has been certified by the Local Government Board as the casual wards for the Union. There have, however, during the present year frequently been a larger number of male casuals than could be accommodated in the certified wards. Temporary accommodation has in these cases been provided in a building containing two rooms, which, prior to the erection of the new wards, was used as the casual ward. This building is used once a fortnight as a temporary stable. To provide sleeping berths on the occasions when there has been an overflow wooden platforms raised from the ground have been fixed, the bedding being a straw mattress with two rugs. The provision for women and children in the certified casual ward is four single and six double cells. When the number of women has exceeded the accommodation in the certified wards it is the practice to provide for the surplus in the receiving ward. On three occasions during the year when there was a small excess in the number of women the receiving wards happened to be occupied by cases which had not been examined by the Medical Officer, and then the overflow was provided for in one of the two rooms of the old building, but, of course, not in one which was occupied by men. As to the situation of the proposed new wards, I may observe that casual wards are not intended for residents in Folkestone, but for vagrants moving across the county, and that as regards several workhouses a casual ward at Elham is on a more direct route than wards at Folkestone would be. As I have already stated, the Guardians have informed me that the relieving officer has instructions to make provision for the conveyance by train of persons who, in consequence of age or infirmity, should not be subjected to a journey on foot to Elham, and in cases of illness he is also instructed to find the applicant a home at one of the common lodging-houses at Folkestone. With reference to a statement which I believe has been made that tramps of both sexes have been put into one room, I can only say that if any workhouse master is guilty of such a course he will be instantly dismissed.

EXTRA CUSTOMS OFFICIALS.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is in contemplation by the Government to improve in any way the pay or position of extra outdoor officers of Customs in the Port of London?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The pay and conditions of employment of extra outdoor officers of Customs in the Port of London have been recently improved under Treasury authority dated June 16 last.

MR. DARLING: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there is any intention to further improve the conditions under which those men are employed?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The conditions under which these men were employed were very fully considered, and it was felt that a great improvement in their behalf was effected by placing a large number on weekly instead of daily employment and wages.

OUTDOOR DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in view of the fact that the Treasury Minute of 24th March, 1891, relative to an inquiry into the administration of the Outdoor Department of Customs, states that the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been directed to the success which elsewhere in the Public Service has attended Departmental examinations held to gauge the qualifications of officers at certain stages of their career, whether he can say if this statement refers to the Excise Department; and, if not, to which Department of the Public Service it does refer; and whether he can say what is intended to be conveyed by the words certain stages in their career?

*SIR W. HARCOURT: The Minute was issued before I went to the Exchequer, and I am unable to give a more exact interpretation of the meaning of the passage referred to than that which appears from its wording. If the hon. Member desires more detailed information he should apply to my predecessor.

THE AMERICAN MAIL SERVICE.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to a letter from a firm of merchants in the City, stating that their American correspondence, ex Etruria, was not delivered at their office until after 1 p.m. on Saturday, the 2nd instant; whether these letters reached London ready sorted shortly after 10 a.m. on that day; and whether steps will be taken to insure a speedy delivery of the American mail viâ Queenstown, upon arrival in London?

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that on Saturday last the American mails, ex Etruria, which left South Kingstown by the 12.57 train, and which reached Holyhead at 4.31 and London 10.17 a.m. with the mails fully sorted and ready for immediate delivery, did not reach leading firms in the City until after 1 o'clock that day; and whether this period of three hours between arrival and delivery is within or beyond the average time considered necessary for such delivery ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I have seen the letter referred to. The first van conveying from Euston Station the American mails brought by the Etruria reached the General Post Office at 10.41 a.m. on the 2nd instant. The letters, although sorted in the usual manner for the various London districts, had to undergo some further preparation before they could be sent out for delivery by postmen. They just missed the delivery in the City commencing soon after 11, and could not be sent out until noon. Every endeavour will be made to insure a speedy delivery of the letters as far as possible.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General at what hour the Teutonic, which left New York on Wednesday, 30th August, at 10 o'clock a.m., reached Queenstown on Tuesday last, and at what hour the New York, which left at 8.45 a.m. on the same date, arrived at Southampton; and when were the mails conveyed per Teutonic and per New York delivered in London ?

*MR. A. MORLEY : The Teutonic arrived off Queenstown at 3.10 p.m. on the 5th instant, and the New York arrived at Southampton at 7.20 a.m. on the 6th. The correspondence for the City brought by the Teutonic was sent out by the delivery commencing at 2.5 p.m. p.m. on the 6th. That brought by the New York had already been delivered, having been received in time to be included in the delivery commencing at 11.5 a.m.

MR. MACARTNEY : Were the mails which arrived by the New York taken on by ordinary or special train ?

MR. A. MORLEY : Not by special train. It was not a case in which a special train was required.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : Was there a special service from Queenstown for the Teutonic ?

MR. A. MORLEY : No ; there was not—the full mail came by Southampton.

MR. SEXTON : If there had been a full mail, would there have been a special service from Queenstown ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I cannot answer that, but I will make inquiry.

MR. SEXTON : I understand that this was one of the cases where, the mails arriving on Tuesday, a special service would be given to insure that merchants in London and other large towns would be enabled to forward their replies by the mails going out to-day.

MR. A. MORLEY : I believe that is the case, but I will inquire about the matter.

MR. MACARTNEY : Can the right hon. Gentleman explain how it was that the mails which arrived by the New York at Southampton at 7.20 a.m. were delivered before the specially addressed letters by the Teutonic, these letters having arrived in London between 6 and 7 a.m. ?

MR. A. MORLEY : They arrived off Queenstown at 3.10 p.m. on the 5th, and in time to be sent out by the delivery commencing at 2.5 p.m. on the 6th.

TRALEE AND DINGLE RAILWAY.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Kerry, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will inform the House what steps have been taken with reference to the promised inquiry into the circumstances of the Tralee and Dingle Railway, the nature and scope of the proposed inquiry, and the name of the official who has been appointed to conduct it ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The Treasury has written to the Board of Public Works expressing the opinion that an inquiry should be held by an expert as to the actual condition of the Tralee and Dingle Line, and the outlay on alterations and rolling stock necessary for safe working, and asking the Board to suggest an engineer to whom the inquiry might be entrusted. I have not yet received the Board's reply.

MR. SEXTON : I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will agree to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of any Correspondence, or of any facts that may be ascertained by the inquiry ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I will consider the matter.

SIR T. ESMONDE : Will the right hon. Gentleman hurry up the Board of Works ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I have already done so.

DRUMCONDRA TRAINING COLLEGE.

MR. MACARTNEY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland communicate the results of the examination held in July of candidates for the Training Colleges to them or any other persons; and, if not, whether he can state why not; and whether there is any objection to publishing a Return of the names of the candidates admitted to Drumcondra and the other Training Colleges, with the percentage of their answering as well as that of the rejected candidates?

MR. ASQUITH (who replied) said: The Chief Secretary is in communication with the Commissioners of National Education with reference to this question, and will be glad if the hon. Member will repeat the question next week.

KILDYSART PETTY SESSIONS CLERK.

MR. MAGUIRE (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the appointment of Head Constable Crosby as Petty Sessions Clerk at Kildysart; whether Constable Crosby has yet served his time for a pension; and whether, as he was not retired, he is eligible for the appointment?

MR. ASQUITH (who replied) said: The name of the Head Constable is Cromley, not Crosby. He received the permission of the Inspector General to become a candidate for the post, and was appointed by the Magistrate. He was entitled to a pension on his retirement from the force. The matter is now under the consideration of the Irish Government.

THE COAL CRISIS.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any information as to the serious rioting in various colliery districts?

MR. ASQUITH: I have telegraphed to the Chief Constable of the West Riding for a full Report. I regret to say that very serious disturbances are reported to have taken place at Knottingley; but I am not able to give the House any information.

SUSPICIOUS DEATH.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is true that one of the female cleaners on the establishment of the House of Commons was taken ill on Tuesday last and died this morning of Asiatic cholera?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The hon. Member has not given me notice of the question. I am aware that a fatal case of a very suspicious character has taken place this morning of one of the cleaners of this House. The question is receiving the most complete examination by the Medical Department of the Local Government Board; and, although I am sorry to say that all the indications are very suspicious, I am not prepared to say that it is a case of Asiatic cholera.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): A promise was given recently that a statement should be made on behalf of the Government with regard to the future progress of business. I think it would be for the convenience of hon. Members if I were to mention, in the first instance, that the Army Estimates will be taken on Monday next.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): The War Office Votes first?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes. With regard to the Bills the Government desire to keep on the Paper, I prefer to mention the names of those which we hope may live rather than those which we fear may die. I would divide those Bills into several sections. The first section I would call Bills that we must pass, I think. These necessary Bills are three—the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, the Statute Law Revision Bill, and I must also reserve power to bring in occasioned Financial Bills that may arise out of the circumstances of the time. Then I come to the second class, which are Bills of an extremely useful and non-contentious character, mostly Consolidation Bills, which are of immense convenience to all classes of the community. They have been prepared with great care, and, as they merely re-enact the present law, I hope the House will allow them to be taken in the interstices of business. They are the Sale of Goods Bill, the Trustee Consolidation Bill, the Merchant Shipping Bill, and one that does not belong entirely to this category

Mr. Macartney

—namely, the Public Authorities Protection Bill. Then I come to the third and last class of what class of what the Government hope may be regarded and accepted by both sides of the House as non-controversial. The first is the Naval Defence Amendment Bill, which is necessary in consequence of certain difficulties that have arisen in the winding up of the Naval Defence Act. Then there is a Bill mentioned the other day by the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean, the Madras and Bombay Army Bill, and there is the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill. Then I come to another Bill, which I hope will be accepted as non-controversial, the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Bill. That has been agreed to in all its main particulars by the Scotch Members, and is identical in principle and similar in its provisions to the Bill introduced by the late Government. Its provisions have been recommended by a unanimous Report on Sea Fisheries this Session. Then there is the Bill of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, the Pistols Bill. I hope that Bill may be accepted as non-controversial. [Mr. HOPWOOD: No.] I understand that my hon. Friend is the only opponent of the measure, and I hope that he will withdraw his opposition, in order that the very general sense of the House may be carried out. Though it is difficult to call a Pistols Bill a non-controversial Bill, I hope it may so be treated. Then there is a Bill which comes down from the Lords, called the Law of Commons Amendment Bill. I hope that may be put in the same category. Another Bill of great importance is the Savings Bank Bill; and although the banking interest is offering considerable opposition to it, I understand from my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General that negotiations are taking place with a view to a compromise. I should, therefore, hope that the Bill would be kept on the Paper. Coming to the last Bill upon which a good deal was said the other day—I mean the Equalisation of Rates (London) Bill—I would make a very earnest appeal to gentlemen on both sides of the House to allow this measure to be placed in the non-controversial category. The opinion of London is very strong in favour of this measure, the London Members are almost unanimous upon the subject, and there is no opposition to the principle involved. I hope the late Chancellor of the Exchequer will allow the Bill to be kept upon the Paper, and to be treated as a non-controversial one. If great conflict of opinion should be found with regard to it, it could then be dropped. It is a great disappointment to the Government that the circumstances will not permit of these Bills being more numerous. I hardly think it necessary to state that the Employers' Liability Bill and the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill will be kept upon the Paper as the principal Bills to be dealt with during the Autumn Sittings; and I should hope, if the right hon. Gentleman is able to state that he agrees with the list I have mentioned, that the proceedings may be shortened, and we may have an early holiday.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I think the House will agree that while the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made a most conciliatory speech, the list of Bills which are still to be retained on the Order Paper, and which he hopes will be discussed, is rather a long one. There are 14, which the right hon. Gentleman has divided into three categories—the necessary Bills, the Consolidation Bills, and other Bills. With regard to the necessary Bills—the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, the Statute Law Revision Bill, and the Occasional Finance Bill—I have only two remarks to make. Of course they are necessary Bills, but I am under the impression that there are matters in connection with the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill which will lead to some discussion. That has to be taken into consideration when we are discussing the distribution of the time of the House. About the Statute Law Revision Bill I presume there will be no difficulty. As to the Consolidation Bills, I have no authority to say how they will be dealt with by the House; and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will feel that it would be impossible for me to give a definite answer without consultation with the Leader of the Opposition and Members interested. I see no objection to the Naval Defence Act Amendment Bill passing; but I can give no answer to the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Bill, the Pistols Bill, or the Law of Commons Amendment Bill. I believe the Savings Bank Bill is the same measure as was introduced by the predecessor of the present Postmaster General, with this difference—that the limit of the amount of deposits is raised from £50 to £100. I understand that there is a possibility of a compromise with the bankers, and if the latter are contented we shall be prepared to see the Bill pass. Of course, I cannot speak for the bankers without consultation, but I can undertake that there will be no Party objection to the Bill. Then I come to the last Bill mentioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the London Equalisation of Rates Bill. I must say I was rather astonished at the manner in which it was dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman; and I think it is scarcely fair, after the previous declarations which the right hon. Gentleman himself has made, to re-introduce this question. The right hon. Gentleman has been, no, doubt, under considerable pressure, but with that the House really has nothing to do. The right hon. Gentleman said that if it was treated as controversial it would be dropped. Certainly, there are large questions of controversy in the Bill; it is not, however, a question of the Members of this House only, but of the Local Authorities in London, and it would be unfair to the Local Authorities to call upon them at this period of the Session to present their case before the House. The Bill involves considerable difference of opinion, and I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will adhere to the declaration with regard to it that he made upon a previous occasion. It is highly probable that Members may have left London under the distinct impression that the right hon. Gentleman's decision was final. I do not feel that I am in a position to give any answer as to other Bills, though personally I think the Bombay Army Bill is a good one, and should not be treated as a matter of controversy, and that the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill might be passed.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean), on a point of Order, asked whether it would be in Order for anyone to make observations going beyond those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Leader of the Opposition, or whether questions only could be put?

MR. SPEAKER ruled that questions only could be put.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) asked whether the Government intended to do anything in the way of legislation on behalf of the Highland Crofters?

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford) asked whether, as the Law of Commons Amendment Bill and the Sale of Goods Bill were likely to give rise to protracted discussion, it would not be better to withdraw both Bills?

MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.) asked whether the discussion on the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Bill could be taken at a reasonable hour; and whether the Government, in order to facilitate the passing of the measure, would accept, without debate, all the numerous Amendments which stood on the Paper?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) asked whether, in view of the notes on the Bill made by the draftsman, the Merchant Shipping Bill was not more than a consolidation measure?

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) asked whether Progress would be reported that night at a reasonable hour, to allow the London Equalisation of Rates Bill to be discussed?

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the Equalisation of Rates Bill might be read a second time?

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) inquired whether "the interstices of Public Business" meant Saturday Sitzings?

MR. DARLING (Deptford) asked that sufficient notice of the Equalisation of Rates Bill coming on might be given, so that Members might be present at the discussion.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked whether a Parish Councils Bill for Scotland would be brought in during the Autumn Session?

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) asked whether the promised Bill would be introduced for the repeal of the property qualification of Magistrates in England and Wales?

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) asked whether the Government intended to move Amendments on the Madras and Bombay Armies Bill or not?

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) asked that, in view of the urgent need of such a measure, the Savings Banks Bill might be passed this Session? He intended to support the Equalisation of Rates Bill in favour of which he had presented a Petition from his Vestry, and thought opposition to it might be removed by bringing on any discussion at an earlier hour than 2 in the morning.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take these Bills after 12 o'clock, or whether he proposed to carry them over to the Autumn Session?

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.), considering the recurrence of cholera, asked for facilities for passing the Isolation Hospitals Bill.

MR. NAOROJI asked when the Indian Budget would be taken?

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) asked that the Equalisation of Rates (London) Bill should be pressed forward this Session.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) asked whether the Madras and Bombay Army Bill would be taken at some hour when it could be fairly discussed?

MR. MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow) asked what arrangements the Government had in contemplation to enable them to send those Bills which they expected to pass shortly before Christmas to another place?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has divided the Bills which he proposes to take into three classes. As to the first of these, I do not think there can be any objection on any side of the House. As to the second class of Bills, relating to consolidation, I should, for my own part, have no objection to them if the Government give their pledge, which I understand them to do, that they would involve no alteration of the law [cries of "Order!"] Nor can I believe there would be any objection to the third class, provided—[cries of "Order!"] I shall move the adjournment of the House if hon. Members persist in their interruptions.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) rose to Order, and asked the Speaker whether there was one rule for the right hon. Gentleman and another for other Members of the House, who would like, not simply to put questions, which the right hon. Gentleman was not doing, but to speak?

*MR. SPEAKER said, as the right hon. Gentleman was intimating that there was no objection to certain Bills, he thought the progress of Business might be facilitated if he were allowed to proceed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Certainly, Sir. I cannot understand what the objection was. As regards the third class, there can be no objection to taking them if the Government would undertake to deal with them before 12 o'clock; but if they intend to take advantage of the new Rules I can only say there is the very greatest objection to all these Bills.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I thoroughly admit that no Bill ought to be taken as a Consolidation Bill which is not really of that character, and if the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) is at all right in what he said respecting the Merchant Shipping Bill—namely, that there are serious alterations in it—we shall not attempt to proceed with a measure of that volume and magnitude. I will take notice of what the hon. Member has said, and inquiry shall be made into the matter. All we are doing now is keeping these Bills on the Paper. I was surprised to hear my hon. Friend the Member for St. Andrews Burghs (Mr. Anstruther), as I understand those Burghs are on the East coast of Scotland, coming forward as the principal opponent of the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Bill.

*MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.) said, the right hon. Gentleman was, he thought, treating him unfairly, and endeavouring to misrepresent what he had said. All he had done was to put certain questions to the right hon. Gentleman respecting the Bill. He had said no word against the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I understand that most of the Scotch Members, except the hon. Member, have withdrawn their Amendments; but if there is any serious opposition to the Bill, and it appears that the measure will require considerable time to dispose of it, it will not be taken. As to the question of the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles), I forgot to mention that what we propose is that the Merchant Shipping Bill should be read a second time for the purpose of referring it to a Committee.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES pointed out that he objected to the Second Reading of the Bill, on the ground that it was not a Consolidation Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Something was said about the interstices of business. I did not mean by that phrase a fugitive half-hour. It may occur that we may have a spare day, and in that case we shall endeavour to proceed with the least controversial of the Bills, and get them forward. I also meant that these Bills would be taken at any time during the Session. I have always endeavoured to make that clear as well as I could.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon. I do not know that he has said anything inconsistent with what he says now; but what he says now is distinctly inconsistent with the pledge the Prime Minister gave.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken in that. These matters have been discussed between the Prime Minister and myself from the commencement, and I am sure if he had said anything of that kind I must have known. My recollection of what he said is that it related to the main business of the Session. It is not our intention to proceed with the Magistrates' Qualification Bill during the present Session.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): The Government gave notice of the Bill early in the Session.

SIR W. HARCOURT: At all events, it would be regarded as a new Bill, and we cannot ask the House to go on with it now. Objection was taken by an hon. Member to the Commons Amendment Act. I think that may be regarded as not a very dangerous or revolutionary measure. I am not acquainted with the Isolation Hospitals Bill, but I will inquire concerning it. If it is a useful and urgent Bill, and no objection be taken to it, it may be disposed of. I am very sorry I cannot mention the date of the Indian Budget, because we have already stated that it is to be taken with the Appropriation Bill. I wish I knew when the Appropriation Bill would be taken. As to the Madras and Bombay Army Bill, I hope to take it in reasonable time.

Sir W. Harcourt

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) asked whether the Government proposed to support the Bill, or to move Amendments to it?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Generally the Government support the Bill in its present form, but, of course, they do not preclude themselves from introducing Amendments. As to the Scotch Accidents Bill, we are obliged to exclude it from the list of those to be dealt with in this part of the Session, because I understand one of its provisions is very much disputed.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) asked whether the Crofters Act Amendment Bill was to be taken?

SIR W. HARCOURT: That would be a new Bill, and we cannot undertake to ask the House to consider new Bills now.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) asked what was to be done in relation to the Bills of Sales Bill? He understood that the Attorney General was willing to re-consider the point when he (Mr. Williams) opposed the Bill. As he believed the Bill as a whole was a very useful one, he hoped that it might by arrangement be placed in the category of unopposed measures.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have inquired of the Solicitor General (Sir J. Rigby), and he thinks there is so much opposition to the Bills of Sale Bill that it cannot be included in the list of unopposed Bills.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): What is to be done respecting the Equalisation of Rates (London) Bill? I presume that, a protest having been made against it, it will not be pressed forward this Session?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: There was just now a like controversy between my right hon. Friend and myself, which I think I am now able to clear up—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is displaying a newspaper. It is usual when a newspaper is used in the House to reduce it to the smallest possible compass.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am sorry to say, Sir, I have no other report of the Debate to which to refer; but it appears that on a previous occasion I asked the Prime Minister whether, supposing that, with the assistance of the Opposition, the Second Reading of the two important Bills which had been referred to were got through in a month, the Government were going to introduce other Bills. The Prime Minister replied that he thought I was going a little beyond what he had said, and referred me to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) said—

“We are asked if we intend to take any other measures. Our object certainly is to promote these two measures, and, although we cannot bind ourselves before the House, it is not our intention to promote other measures than these two in the Autumn Session.”

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman will see that I stated on another occasion, in reply to the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), who asked me what I meant by “other small Bills”—I am speaking from recollection, and cannot say that those were the exact words—that I meant non-controversial measures. I am very sorry that a misunderstanding has arisen between the right hon. Gentleman and myself, but the intention of the statement I made was certainly what I have described.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked whether the question alluded to did not refer entirely to Bills to be dealt with during the present Sitting?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think so, or I should certainly never have bound myself at all. I have always intended to ask for these non-controversial measures. Surely if we have spare time we are not to sacrifice all these Bills. I think our proposal is perfectly reasonable, and it is one which has certainly always been in our minds. With reference to the Equalisation of Rates Bill, I have said, and I am bound by the statement, that, if the responsible Leaders of the Opposition regard it as a controversial measure, we shall not feel at liberty to proceed with it. I understand that my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Goschen) does think it a controversial measure, this opinion is in some degree reinforced by what was said by the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton).

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) said, that was not the case.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think the hon. Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) spoke hostile to the Bill, but he asked very fairly whether notice would be given, so that Members would be able to discuss the Bill if it came on. If that were the only condition I should be able to comply with it, as it is a very fair one. That, however, I do not understand now to be the present state of the case. I understand that the hon member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit) considers that the Bill could not proceed without a good deal of discussion.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I said I was in favour of the Bill and intended to support it, but I thought that early to-morrow morning was not quite the proper time for discussing it.

MR. T. H. BOLTON said, he had expressed no opinion that the Bill was controversial. He was in favour of the Bill. He had asked merely whether the Government would report Progress at such a time as to afford an opportunity of having some discussion on the Second Reading of the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, Sir, we cannot in the present state of business stop Supply in order to proceed with this, that, or the other Bill. I had hoped that as far as the Second Reading of the Equalisation of Rates Bill was concerned it would have been agreed to without further discussion. I understand that the hon. Member for North St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton) desires a discussion on the Second Reading. Well, that, of course, prevents the progress of the Bill. There is, however, very little use in considering whether there should be a discussion because I understand the Bill is not accepted as non-controversial.

MR. R. JASPER MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow) asked what arrangements the Government had in contemplation for sending these measures to “another place.” Would the House of Lords sit between Christmas Day and New Year’s Day?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I cannot undertake to answer for what is done in another place. We can only pass our measures here.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: My hon. Friend opposite has asked me, as to the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, whether I propose to consider it on Monday as the Army Estimates are down for that day? Unless the Army Estimates are continued until a late hour I propose to take the Bill on Monday. It is necessary that the measure should pass either during the present Sittings or the Autumn Session.

I know that some hon. Friends of mine opposite take objection to certain Acts which are included in the Bill, but I do not think their opposition can be serious, because it will be impossible for them to take any portions out of the Bill. The Bill continues 52 Acts of Parliament, all of them, with the exception of two, having been continued from 20 to 40 years. As nearly all of those Acts expire on the 31st December, I think I can show a good case why the Bill should be allowed to proceed on every opportunity.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is proposed to take to-night any of the Bills mentioned, and, if so, at what time he proposes to report Progress?

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the Secretary for Scotland whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Parish Councils Bill for Scotland during the Autumn Session?

MR. ANSTRUTHER inquired whether it was not the case that, on the Second Reading of the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Bill to which he (Mr. Anstruther) had an Amendment extending the operation of the measure, the Secretary for Scotland had stated that he would accept the Amendment, whether the Debate was not very much restricted in consequence, and whether the right hon. Gentleman now considered it was fair to ask Members to forego all discussion of the very important branch of the subject to which the Amendment related?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I may say that the Government have prepared not a Parish Councils Bill, but a Local Government Bill for Scotland. This measure would give to Scotland everything that will be given by the Local Government Bill for England, but of course it would be adapted to Scotland and drawn on Scotch lines. Whether or not it would be in accordance with the engagements made by the Government that this Bill should be introduced during the Autumn Session I will not discuss, because I do not think there will be any need to introduce it and have it before this House. The Bill is prepared, and I have no doubt that the

Sir J. T. Hibbert

English Bill will be a pledge and a prelude to the introduction of the Scotch Bill. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Anstruther), the Government would have been extremely glad to introduce the Amendment relating to the salmon fisheries which he proposed, and no doubt it is true that if the Government had not expressed that willingness my hon. Friend would have occupied, and would have been justified in occupying, for a longer period the time of the House. But, as the matter now stands, the only chance of passing the Bill is to pass it without the salmon Amendments. The Government believe that the Bill in its present shape is unanimously approved by Scottish Members, except with regard to some omissions from the financial clauses which the Government are prepared to make. I am afraid if my hon. Friend insists on salmon Amendments being inserted there will be no chance of passing the Bill this Session.

MR. ANSTRUTHER asked whether the Government had any intention of proceeding with the Committee stage of the Bill before Monday? He wished to have an opportunity of considering whether it was possible to adopt the plan suggested by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) inquired whether there were not certain Amendments with regard to the payment of fishermen's expenses, and so on, which were important?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The Government propose, in deference to what I believe to be the pretty general opinion of the Scottish Members, to leave out Clause 20—the financial clause. There are also some small Amendments which the Government are prepared to accept, and I believe we shall be able to meet all the objections taken to the Bill by Scottish Members, though I cannot say we shall be able to introduce all the Amendments they wish to make. I earnestly hope that between this and Monday my hon. Friend (Mr. Anstruther) will consider the position, and that he will agree to the course I suggest.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether we are to definitely understand that he feels himself unable to proceed with the Equalisation of Rates Bill for London in consequence of the hostile attitude of the Opposition?

SIR W. HARCOURT: No, Sir; that is not right. I stated some time ago that with the exception of the two Bills mentioned, we did not intend to take controversial measures, and therefore I endeavoured to ascertain as far as I could what the opinion of the House was as to what was controversial business. I am satisfied that a considerable portion of the House regard this as a controversial Bill. We therefore have decided not to go on with it.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether it was intended to go on with the Second Reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill that evening, or whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer would undertake not to proceed with the Second Reading until his (Mr. Bowles's) objection had been fully considered?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think the hon. Member must be satisfied with the declaration that we will not take it to-night.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) inquired whether the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir J. T. Hibbert) was aware that the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill contained the Ballot Act, and that as that Act was a controversial measure, as shown by the discussion which took place last Session, he would allow it to be discussed separately?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member, as well as other hon. Members, does not seem to understand that no Amendment could be made in any Act included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. An Act can be omitted, but not amended. Hon. Members should bear this simple fact in mind in connection with my statement that the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill is a measure of a non-controversial character.

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £45,471, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs."

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he rose to continue the statement which he was making on the previous evening in regard to Siam. He was at a little disadvantage in beginning afresh, but he hoped the Under Secretary would have the points before the House—the delimitation of the country within the bend of the river; the fate of Luang Prabang; the neutral zone effective if it were broad, ineffective if it were narrow; and most of all the true definition of integrity and independence of Siam not only according to French ideas, but according to English ideas. He would remark, in the first place, that, as the friend and ally of that country, it might be well if some assistance could be afforded, perhaps indirectly, to Siam in raising the amount of the indemnity which had been imposed by France, so that no excuse could be given for prolonged occupation. At all events, he wished to know how the matter was progressing. The river which ran through the district in which Chantaboon was situated came from the hills, in which were situated mines of precious stones and possibly minerals; and in those mines British capital and British mining engineers were employed. The Great Lake was also a very important point, as also were the islands in the Gulf of Siam. He wished to be informed as to the position on the western shore of the Great Lake, as to whether the islands in the gulf were still occupied by the French, and, if so, were they going to be evacuated, and when? Were the Government without reliable and definite information as to the French works round Chantaboon? A still more menacing matter was the nature of the proceedings of the French Special Envoy, who was now at Bangkok, and as to whom he had addressed several questions to the Government. Possibly the answers given to those questions merely indicated that the Foreign Office did not know of any arrangements between France and Siam which would have the effect of excluding British interests in the latter country. He further wished to ask the Government whether any commercial arrangements were being negotiated at Bangkok which would have an unfavourable effect upon England as compared with France. He should also like to know whether the British Government would object if Siam showed any tendency in the negotiations with the French Envoy to infringe the existing Treaties which secured to England the most-favoured-nation clause. The answers previously given on these points could not be regarded as satisfactory, and there was undoubtedly considerable apprehension existing that something of this kind was now going on between the French Envoy at Bangkok and the Siamese authorities—that some concessions were being made, and that commercial conditions were being entered into which would have a tendency to exclude British commerce. He had had a letter from one who was well informed, part of which he would read to the House, as it showed how, by making separate arrangements, France might drive a coach and four through the Most-Favoured Nation Clauses. So he could say that he thought there was reason for his demand for information. He believed that unless the British Government exercised considerable watchfulness and firmness it would be perfectly possible, despite all influences to the contrary, for negotiations to be entered into at Bangkok which would prove to the disadvantage of British commerce, and which would be discovered when it was too late to effectively safeguard British interests. That some secret negotiations were going on seemed to be very probable, for what else was the French Envoy doing at Bangkok? He could not be there to settle the details of the ultimatum, for they had already been unreservedly accepted. There was reason to believe that France was engaged in negotiations with some ulterior object, and it was of great importance to England to provide against those negotiations affecting the integrity and independence of Siam. He would simply say that, notwithstanding any promises or assurances that had been made on the point, the Government should not hesitate to question the French Government on the matter—not with reference to old matters which had already been practically settled, but with regard to the future integrity and independence of Siam. On the one hand they should warn Siam that they should object to any arrangement with France which might prejudicially affect their treaty and commercial rights; and, on the other, should intimate to France in a friendly manner, though with a proper degree of firmness, that they should strongly object to any arrangement which affected the independence of Siam. Considering the great interests which England possessed in Siam, and the great importance to her of the integrity and independence of that country being maintained, he wished to urge these points on the attention of the Government as strongly as possible. It might be said that it was too late to take any such steps; but he admitted that many precious interests had been already sacrificed, and he denied that it was too late for the British Government to take steps to prevent Siam from being absorbed into the French Empire, and to insure that she should become a real and solid buffer State between the English and French possessions. He did not wish to say one word hostile to the French. He did not desire to show any unbecoming jealousy of them. On the contrary, he heartily wished them success in the consolidation of the dominions they had acquired in that part of the world. But there must be a limit to French ambition, and that limit should be drawn somewhere in Siam, so as to keep an inviolable zone between our Indian Empire and the French possessions in Eastern Asia. Certain articles had appeared lately in the Press and in the London magazines, in which it was stated that our Indian Empire was coming more and more between the two fires of Russia and France, and, although he was sorry to say he had not written those articles, he could say that the statements in them were perfectly true, and would be confirmed by any Englishman who had resided in the East. In conclusion, he trusted that in his speeches on this subject he had not pressed too hard upon the Government in point of argument, because he had frequently admired the firm, resolute, and forward attitude they had taken up with regard to Egypt and Canada, and other places, and he heartily concurred in the able speeches made by the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs; but the present state of things in Siam was so serious that it was necessary to call the Government to account as strictly as the Rules of the House might allow, in the hope that they would be able to give a good account of their stewardship in this matter. He was looking forward to the Blue Book which would inevitably have to be presented, and he hoped that would justify the nation in reposing confidence in the Government as English Ministers acting on behalf of England.

*MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport): No one in the House, I am sure, will be disposed to blame the hon. Baronet for raising this important question, which he has discussed in so interesting and authoritative a manner. Not even the most ardent supporter of the Government will say we are doing wrong in taking up a small amount of the time allotted to Supply in calling the attention of the House to so grave a question as British interests in the far East. Throughout this Session of Parliament I venture to say that the Opposition have shown more than ordinary forbearance towards the Government in respect of their foreign policy, mainly, no doubt, due to the confidence which has been hitherto reposed in the administration of Lord Rosebery. Before proceeding further, I would say that the importance of this subject must not be gauged for a moment by the depleted state of the Benches I see around me. It is unfortunately, but undoubtedly the case, that there are considerable sources of attraction in a sometimes much derided place elsewhere, where the Foreign Secretary is speaking on a subject on which his views to most of us are at least of as much interest as his views upon matters connected with his own Department. But though those of us who speak on this question here have but a scant audience, much greater importance is attached to our words elsewhere than is perhaps apparent to the minds of our colleagues. That which is said in this House is not only printed and circulated in the newspapers at home, but is telegraphed and published in every country in the far East. I do not desire on this occasion to repeat what I said last time this matter came before the House, but I would venture to say, that there is not a single criticism in which I then indulged or a single anticipation I then made that has not been justified by what has since transpired. I adhere to the opinion previously expressed that if in March last the noble Earl had found it compatible with his duty to address a perfectly friendly letter to the French Government pointing out that, while we had no desire to interfere in the frontier dispute between Siam and themselves, we should regard any further encroachment upon the integrity and independence of Siam with disfavour and as unfriendly on their part, recent occurrences would never have been seen or heard of. In my travels in Tonkin and Cochin China last November and December I discussed this matter with French officials, and gathered from them that it had never entered into their heads that Great Britain would acquiesce in the French demands, which will result in the virtual dismemberment and extinction of the independence of the Kingdom of Siam. But at an early stage of these proceedings Lord Rosebery, carrying to an extreme limit diplomatic courtesy, assured the French that we had no concern in their quarrel in that part of the world, and the French Government forthwith, interpreting these assurances in the most liberal and most agreeable sense to themselves, proceeded step by step at a rate of progression which can only be described as geometrical, and presented first one ultimatum, then a second, and now, we understand, a third to Siam, expecting at each moment to be pulled up, and as much astonished at our forbearance—I might almost say our weakness—as they were gratified at their own success. Meanwhile, we have been assured by the representatives of the Foreign Office that the French Government is still respecting the pledges it gave. But one of the terms is that the Siamese are not to keep any troops within 16 miles of the right bank of the River Mekong, although they are to be allowed to retain a police force there. The only police, however, in Siam are the military—and I doubt very much whether they would be called military in any other country in the world. To say that Siam is not to maintain military in this district, but is yet to be allowed to keep police there for the maintenance of order, is, therefore, to perpetrate a joke at the expense of that country. It may be suggested that it is from fear of future collision that this precaution has been insisted upon. But have the French themselves withdrawn, or consented to withdraw, their troops from a space of 16 miles on their side of the river? Not a bit. The French are at present concentrating their forces there, and have sent two gunboats up the river. There can be no doubt that this particular condition has been introduced into the ultimatum, and is being enforced by France: firstly, to cut off communication with the territory which will still be left to Siam on the left bank of the Mekong, and, secondly, to facilitate that to which we must look forward in the future as certainly as I am now addressing the House of Commons—namely, the carrying out of further French ambition and aspirations on the right bank of the river. With regard to Chantaboon, the hon. Baronet seems to think we have no interest in it, and says he had no official information about it because we have no Diplomatic Agent there; but he is nevertheless able to state that the 300 or 400 French troops in Chantaboon are in a state of alarm because of the contiguity of 3,000 or 4,000 Siamese troops. In my opinion the hon. Baronet entirely underrates the importance of Chantaboon in connection with the recovery by the French of the two provinces which a hundred years ago belonged to Cambodia. The French have occupied the river, and have advanced eight miles inland, have seized the town of Chantaboon, have thrown up earthworks, and have telegraphed for additional forces. I do not share in the matter of Chantaboon the sanguine anticipations expressed by the hon. Baronet (Sir E. Grey), and I respectfully invite him to keep an eye on Chantaboon during the course of the next few weeks, and to pause until it has been evacuated before he congratulates the Government and the House upon having saved those provinces for the Siamese Government, and upon the fact that the French and Siamese question has been satisfactorily settled. I will leave that point, and turn to what is the most important question to us—the question of British interests in Siam. What are British interests in Siam? They have been more than once stated and restated in the course of our discussions, and in reply to a question from myself they were defined by the hon. Baronet (Sir E. Grey) himself in terms on which no one can improve. He defined British interests in Siam as being four in number. The first, he said, was the protection of the life and property of British subjects residing there; the second is the continued preservation of a neutral zone between the British and French territories; the third, the protection of British trade; and the fourth, the continued independence and integrity of the Siamese Kingdom itself. I will venture to say a few words on each of these interests. As regards the protection of the life and property of British subjects in Siam, I think Her Majesty's Government are to be congratulated on the alacrity with which, the moment there was any fear of those interests at Bangkok being jeopardised, they despatched British war vessels to the scene of operations, although it is a pity that they did not inform the French Government of the object with which those ships were sent, since the French Government made the despatch of the ships an excuse for forcing the passage of the river, and menacing the capital itself. As regards the second British interest—the continued preservation of a neutral zone between ourselves and the French—we understand that negotiations are proceeding at Paris with the view of carving out from the body of the unhappy victim a more or less narrow slice of territory—possibly some hundred miles in width—the object being to prevent the frontiers of Great Britain and France from coming into perilous contact in the far East. I presume that this neutral zone, about which I do not desire for a moment to press for information prematurely, will be constructed out of territory which lies to the West of the trans-Mekong part of Luang Prabang, and that it will consist partly of the former Burmese State of Chieng Kheng, which we ceded to Siam. Whether my anticipations be correct or not, I should like to know to whom is this neutral zone, when constructed, to belong, and by whom is it to be administered? If it is to belong to and to be administered by Siam, are the Siamese to be allowed to keep their soldiers there, or are we once more to have raised this farcical plea of a police that has never existed. Again, what guarantees are you going to obtain for the preservation of its integrity? Supposing that its integrity in the future violated by French troops, or supposing that the wild tribes who inhabit it appeal to the French to come over the border, how are you going to carry out any guarantee you may have previously given or exacted? There is another point. The hon. Baronet (Sir E. Grey) has more than once talked about this neutral zone as if it were identical with a "buffer State." There is the greatest possible difference between the two things. A neutral zone is the merest apology, the palest simulacrum, of a buffer State that can possibly be conceived. A buffer State implies the creation or existence of a third or intervening State between two Powers whose territories would otherwise come in contact with each other. It implies the exercise by the third State of the rights of sovereignty and the possession by it of a certain stability, and it implies the respect of its territories by the two important neighbours who are situated on either side of it. Of such a character is the buffer State of Afghanistan, and of such a character, though perhaps in a modified degree, was, until recently, the Kingdom of Siam itself. As long as the independence and integrity of Siam were something more than a mere name, so long did it preserve the character of a buffer State. But both that integrity and independence have now been fatally impaired, and unless the Government are able to procure guarantees from the French that they will respect the integrity of the Siam that is left, and will give similar guarantees themselves, the buffer State, in so far as relates to Siam, will have totally disappeared. In any case it is certain that the neutral zone you are going to construct in the north-west will in no respect take its place. Your neutral zone, as I understand, is to be a mere strip of territory, you are going to mark out with white paint, much as you might mark a crease upon a cricket pitch, and within which I do not suppose the French position will be more effective than would be the position of a somewhat weak batsman standing at the wickets exposed to the attack of a formidable bowler at the other end. The tendency to argue that if this neutral zone is constructed we may hold our peace and thank God that we have got a Government that has done so much for us shows the existence of a mere vain delusion. If we are to come out of this lamentable affair with no better result than that, it will be regarded, if not by ourselves, by everyone else, as a painful exhibition of weakness. I come next to the protection of British trade and British traders in Siam. That interest is not one that is capable of being satisfied by the mere protection of British property or British subjects at Bangkok, or by the mere defence of British shipping in the river. The Committee must remember that, if Siam is considered as a commercial factor, far and away above any other interest is that of the trade of Great Britain. Of the whole export and import trade of Siam 93 per cent. is British, and the French portion is less than 1 per cent. Only one French steamer has plied between Saigon and Bangkok, and that was sunk the other day. At Bangkok itself, where you read in the papers of the passing of resolutions at enthusiastic meetings of French tradesmen, there are only two French tradesmen, one being a barber and the other a keeper of a knick-knack store. The entire export of the main products of Siam—its rice, its teak, and its pepper—is in British hands. The great commercial emporium of Singapore is to a large extent sustained by Bangkok, and the 200,000 Chinamen who live at Singapore in contented subjection to British rule depend for their sustenance on the rice which is floated down the Menam and shipped at Bangkok. The mines of Siam are for the most part in course of British exploitation, whilst the one considerable railway enterprise in which the Siamese Government have been led to embark—from Bangkok in a north-easterly direction to Korat—has been given to a firm of British engineers. These are no doubt somewhat tedious details, but it is necessary to give them in order to convey to the Committee the character of not merely the important but the overwhelming interest, nay, the monopoly of British trade which exists in Siam. When we hear that this interest is to be jeopardised and thrown away out of consideration for a French trade which has never existed and the establishment of which in the future the French national temperament renders impossible, emotions are aroused which cannot be regarded as satisfactory. What is the attitude of the French towards the trade of which I am speaking? Wherever you get French and British competition you find that it is French policy, by whatever means in their power, to cripple and crush British trade. The absence of commercial attributes on their own part does not deter them for one moment from endeavouring to injure, and, if possible, to destroy, British trade in those parts of the world with which they are concerned, even if the process of destruction involves injury to themselves. Take the case of Saigon, the capital of French Cochin China. It was for some time a free port, and became a very flourishing and wealthy place; but as soon as the French realised that the bulk of the trade profits were going into the pockets of the British merchants they revolutionised their policy; Free Trade was abandoned, and the normal French barrier of a prohibitive tariff was raised, even though Saigon was drained of its life-blood in carrying out that policy. This will be the policy that will be pursued if the French have a free hand in commercial and fiscal matters in Siam. I hope Her Majesty's Government are already, or, if not, that they will become, fully alive to their responsibility in this matter; that where French Consuls are appointed in the interior of Siam to foster or protect French trade, which does not exist, they will be employed to protect British trade, which does already exist; that the Government will take very good care to maintain on our behalf the Most Favoured Nation Clause in accordance with the Treaty of 1855; that they will allow no tampering whatever within the Malay Peninsula, which distinctly falls within the sphere of British influence, and that they will require the fulfilment by the Siamese of the contract they entered into for the completion of the Korat Railway and other undertakings in which the commercial community is so largely interested. The fourth and last interest is far and away the most important—namely, the independence and integrity of Siam itself. It was in July last that Lord Rosebery said in the House of Lords—and it was repeated by the hon. Baronet—that the integrity and independence of Siam were matters of great importance to the British, and more especially to the British-Indian Empire, and that Her Majesty's Government were fully alive to their responsibility in the matter; and similar declarations of respect for the integrity and independence of Siam emanated from the French Foreign Minister. Whilst we have been disposed to give full credit to these assurances coming from both quarters, we have been confronted with the very remarkable facts that the French Government and the French Foreign Minister appear to have been engaged, step by step, in violating the very conditions which we believed they undertook to respect, and the British Foreign Minister, almost in the same breath that he declares that the independence and integrity of Siam are British interests, invites us to witness their progressive disappearance with almost Spartan composure on the ground that the minor British interests of which I have been speaking are not at stake. Surely, after all, the main British interest in Siam is the political stability of Siam itself. If you allow the power of Siam and of its King to be crippled, and the country to be under French protection, there will not be the slightest good in going out with your paint-pot to demarcate a neutral zone, or in insisting upon commercial equality for your merchants. I would point out that a Siam under French protection, either actual or nominal, must be an anti-British, anti-English Siam, and the only Siam that can possibly stand on its legs between France and Great Britain is a Siam whose borders are defined and respected, whose Monarch's authority within its borders is not challenged, and which possesses not merely the symbols, but the realities of independence. I hope, therefore, that in conducting negotiations Her Majesty's Government will not lose sight of this far larger question in the background, compared with which the question of a neutral zone is comparatively of very small importance. If we are to attach the credit which we desire both to the declarations of Lord Rosebery and the French Government; if Great Britain desires to maintain the autonomy of Siam, and if the French have no further designs on the independence of that Kingdom, there can be no reason why both countries should not join in a formal guarantee of the integrity and independence of the Siam that is left, which shall be equally binding on both Powers, and shall enable Siam, even at this late hour of the day, once again to raise her head and take her place amongst the Kingdoms of the East. I await with interest what the hon. Baronet will say on the matter; and although, I am sure, I do not desire for one moment to demand from him any relaxation of the diplomatic reserve he has so skilfully maintained up to the present, I hope that he will at once give us some assurance that this larger and Imperial aspect of the question to which I have alluded has not been lost sight of by the Government, and that in addition to counting up the gains and losses of the moment itself the Government will keep an eye upon a matter which intimately and deeply affects the future peace of the Indo-Chinese Peninsula.

*SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) reminded the Committee that negotiations were still pending in Paris, but, seeing the scant opportunity they would have in the Autumn Sitzings of dealing with the question, he thought that the Government was taking a great responsibility. He was completely in accord with what had been said by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Kingston Division of Surrey and by the late Under Secretary of State for India, as to either a buffer State or a neutral zone in Northern Siam. It was a mockery; but, on the other hand, its creation could hardly be said to be needed in the same way in which it was needed against Russia. France could only get to Siam by the high seas, and on the high seas she was at the mercy of England. She was in this respect in a completely different position from Russia, who was all but our Continental neighbour. The Government could make no statement with regard to Siam, inasmuch as negotiations were pending; neither could they make any statement with regard to a matter which was of high interest to many—Uganda—because they had not yet received Sir Gerald Portal's Report. With regard to Uganda, it was impossible the Government could take any final step until they had consulted the House of Commons. He wished to refer to another case of relations with France, in which, as in the case of Siam, it was possible that the French were trying to make themselves disagreeable to us. He meant the case of Madagascar. He had never been able to understand why the late Government had gone so far out of their way in surrendering the independence of Madagascar. It was a country in which our trade was as predominant as in Siam; and it was a country in which British missionary enterprise had been more successful than in any other portion of the world. Fortunately for Madagascar, its capital was not on the coast like the capital of Siam. It was, therefore, difficult to march on the capital, and the French, when they invaded the island, had failed to reach it. A Treaty was signed by which the French recognised the sovereignty of the Hova Government over the whole island. This was a great concession on the part of the French, to gain which the Hovas agreed to entrust their foreign relations, but their foreign relations only, to France. The late Government having come to an agreement with Germany as to Zanzibar, which it was necessary to force on France, with whom we had a self-denying arrangement as to Zanzibar, recognised a French Protectorate over Madagascar. The present Government could not put them back where they stood before the late Government took this step. What he wanted to know was, how far the present Government was going in the same direction? He would ask what they were doing?—nothing, as he hoped. He would not go into the question of the revival of the Slave Trade on the coast of Madagascar in consequence of the Convention recognising a sham Protectorate, because that would arise upon the Slave Trade Vote. But he would point out that they had gained nothing by the concessions they had made. He could not help thinking that their pledges with regard to Egypt had something to do with bringing about bad relations between the French and ourselves, and that the policy pursued in Siam and Madagascar and with regard to Newfoundland was the answer of the French. In regard to our relations with Newfoundland, a matter which would be referred to on the next Vote, he knew nothing to the discredit of the Foreign Office, but thought that it would be an unfortunate thing if from any idea of proceeding with the arbitration to which the Foreign Office were committed by the late Government we should put further pressure on the colonists.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he had great pleasure in bearing his testimony to the admirable and efficient way in which the commercial work in connection with the Foreign Office was carried out, and he acknowledged in very handsome terms the services of Mr. Kennedy, Chief of the Commercial Department, who was about to retire. The Commercial Reports published by the Foreign Office were full of information. Their high value was recognised by the Chambers of Commerce of the country, and the more widely they were read the more they would be appreciated, and the greater would be the service they rendered. The extension and prosperity of commerce now largely depended on the policy and the action of the Foreign Office through the Consular Service; so much so that it had been stated by a high authority that commercial considerations had now become one of the most important features of the duty of a diplomatist. Several foreign countries had recognised this fact, and acted upon it by extending their Consular Service, and he hoped this country would adopt a similar policy. The point applied with special force at the present time to Siam, where their Consular representation might be wisely strengthened. Most of the import and export trade with that country was British and carried in British bottoms, and he desired to impress on the Foreign Office the fact that the Chambers of Commerce in the country were very anxious not only as to the protection of their present commerce in Siam, but also as to the action to be taken with a view to develop British trade in that part of the world. In these days of hostile tariffs and competition they must always look out for new markets, and when Siam was developed it would become a most important commercial centre for the trade of this country. Siam must, however, have a real independence, and there must be no interference with the advantage they derived from the Favoured Nation Clause, for without that clause their commercial position would be seriously embarrassed. He hoped the commercial interests at stake would be kept in view by the Foreign Office.

Sir C. W. Dilke

MR. HANBURY (Preston) rose—
*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): I do not wish, Sir, to exclude discussion on other subjects, but I think I am justified in asking the Committee to allow me to state at once the somewhat narrow limits to which I can go in dealing with this matter. In the course of the Debate some time ago on the Vote on Account I stated that the position of affairs was such that my language had necessarily to be guarded and restrained within narrow limits. I regret that that is still the case, and, while I have to acknowledge the forbearance of the hon. Member for Southport, I regret that it has not been further extended. As to the assurances given by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to the French Government, it is true that the British Government took no part in the disputes between the French and Siamese while those disputes were confined to the territorial question South of the 18th parallel and on the far side of the Mekong; but directly the dispute covered a wider area, it was perfectly obvious to the whole world that the Government considered British interests were involved, for they entered upon negotiations with the French Government for the delimitation of a neutral zone. Hon. Members seemed to think that we went too far in relying on the assurances that were given by the French Government as to what the limits of their action would be, but the French Government contended that they were not breaking their pledges by their operations on the left bank of the Mekong.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): Which bank is that?

*SIR E. GREY: The Eastern bank. There is no difference, so far as I am aware, between the two Governments in holding that similar operations on the West bank would break the assurances given. The hon. Member for Southport admits that the Government have been prompt to take measures for the protection of British life and property at Bangkok, so I need say nothing more on that point. As to the question of the neutral zone, that is a matter which now forms the subject of negotiations, and it is consequently impossible for me to enter into details. Then there is the question of British trade at Bangkok. It is said that we have a monopoly of the trade of Bangkok, but that is not the only place where Great Britain monopolises a large share of trade. I will only say, in reply to this question, that I read out to the House the other day the provisions of the Treaty between ourselves and Siam. I cannot conceive that more than one interpretation can be placed on the Treaty, and by reading it I did not intend to convey the impression that it was not meant to put it in force. With regard to the independence and integrity of Siam, I will undertake to say that no one can maintain that that independence and integrity have been violated in a way that affects British interests. No one can seriously contend that British interests or trade in Siam have been injured as yet by the action of France. Our trade is untouched, and the negotiations for a neutral territory are proceeding satisfactorily. But hon. Members opposite have been induced to bring forward this subject not so much because of what has happened in the past as because of their apprehensions of what may happen in the future. With regard to the future, I am sorry to say that, inasmuch as negotiations are still proceeding in Paris, I am precluded from saying more upon the subject than that Lord Dufferin has the fullest and most definite instructions for the protection of our rights in Siam, and to express a hope that the Committee will continue to place confidence in the Government. With regard to Madagascar, I have very little to say further than that the relations between the French Government, Madagascar, and the British Government have remained unchanged since the present Government came into Office. We have conceded no point in reference to that country. The question is left absolutely as it was when the present Government came into Office. I have only, in conclusion, to express the great pleasure with which I heard the hon. Member who preceded me in this Debate refer, in words of the highest praise, to the way in which the Foreign Office is served by all those in its service, especially as to the commercial side of its policy. I endorse every word the hon. Gentleman said. I desire to express my gratitude, which is great in proportion as I am conscious of my own experience, to those gentlemen at the Foreign Office who by their energy, their ability, and their industry have given me such invaluable assistance in performing the duties of the position which I hold. We do not in this country, under our present system, follow the example of some other countries in opening up markets by Reciprocity Treaties for our trade and commerce. We rely entirely on the great energy and ability of our commercial classes. We recognise at the Foreign Office that our duty is to clear the channels of communication and keep them open, relying upon the enterprise and energy of our commercial classes. That is the system which has brought to us so enormous a share of the trade and prosperity of the world.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) said, he thought the Committee would agree with the hon. Baronet that it was impossible for him to make public the instructions given to Lord Dufferin in regard to the negotiations which at the present moment were being carried on in Paris in reference to Siam. They on the Opposition side of the House were anxious to make certain that the Government fully recognised the extent to which British interests were involved in the maintenance of the independence and integrity of Siam. He did not think there was much in what had been said by the hon. Baronet in reference to Siam to quarrel with. But he felt bound to draw attention to one observation of the hon. Baronet, and that was that up to this time nothing had been done to impair either the independence or the integrity of Siam. That was an observation that he could not allow to pass without notice.

*SIR E. GREY: The hon. Gentleman has not quite caught my expression. What I said was that up to the present time the independence and integrity of Siam have not been violated in a way that has permanently injured British interests.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, that he quite admitted the force of the hon. Baronet's qualification. It put the matter in a different light. He did not think they could fairly admit that the independence and integrity of Siam had been fully maintained, leaving British interests out of the question altogether, when they found that at present this so-called independent State was not permitted to have a military force within its frontiers. When they found that some three or four of her islands had been actually seized by a foreign Power, and when they found that her ports were in the occupation of a foreign Power, he admitted at once the great difficulty the hon. Baronet had in making any further statement in the matter, and he would simply say, before passing from the question, that they desired specially to call the attention of the Government to the great extent of British interests in Siam, and to the manner in which these interests might be affected by agreements which might be entered into between France and Siam without our knowledge. He next came to the question raised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean with regard to Madagascar. The right hon. Baronet had taken the line that the late Government had recognised a Protectorate which had no existence either in fact or in paper. What were the actual facts in regard to the matter? The facts were that after the war between the French and the Hovas in the year 1884 a Treaty was concluded, the first Article of which provided—

“The Government of the French Republic will represent Madagascar in all its foreign relations. Madagascar abroad will be placed under the protection of France.”

He could conceive nothing wider than those words in the direction of giving a Protectorate to France in the foreign affairs of Madagascar. That Treaty was laid on the Table of the House by Lord Salisbury in March, 1886, and it lay on the Table of the House during the whole of that short Parliament, but no exception was taken to it. Then, in the year 1890, Lord Salisbury's Government simply recognised the existing state of affairs. They entered into an arrangement with the French Government by which they recognised the Protectorate of France over the Island of Madagascar. His contention then and now was that the Treaty of 1890 did not go one step beyond the Treaty of 1886 between the French and the Hova Governments, and he hoped that the present Government would not go one step beyond the position in which they at present found themselves in relation to Madagascar. So far as his recollection went of the negotiations which had taken place in the short time he had had the honour of being at the Foreign Office, he did not think there was anything in the Papers, which could not properly be laid on the Table of the House. The last Papers were laid nearly nine years ago, and as a great deal had happened since then, he thought another instalment of Papers on Malagasy affairs should be furnished by the Government. He was sorry to say he differed from the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean with reference to the arbitration between the Colonies and France in regard to the Newfoundland fishery disputes. The right hon. Baronet had implored the Government not to go on with the arbitration; but he should be inclined to implore the Government to go on, for it seemed to him that until they got that one point settled it would be impossible to arrive at a solution, satisfactory or otherwise, of this difficult question, which had been pending now for so many years. It was true that the Colonial Government had protested against our going into arbitration on this point. The Colonial Government really desired that the Treaty of Utrecht should be ripped up, and that the whole question as to the right of France on the east and north-east shores of Newfoundland should be re-opened. The Government made such a representation to France, and it was not surprising that the French rejected it. France had its rights upon that particular coast, and whether Newfoundland was a British Colony or whether she was in a position of independence or whether she was joined to the United States, the rights of France would still attach to the particular coast. He said again that until they got this question as to whether lobsters were fish or not settled they could not make any progress in dealing satisfactorily with the cod fisheries, and other points of dispute between the two Governments. In the agreement for arbitration it was provided that it should be in the power of either the British or the French Government to submit further questions for consideration to the arbitrators. He desired to join with the hon. Member for South Islington and the Under Secretary in the tribute which they had paid to the gentleman who had served the Foreign Office with exceptional ability during a great number of years, and whose loss, if he ever had to leave the Foreign Office, it would be extremely difficult to replace. During the short time he had been in the Foreign Office he owed a great deal to the assistance which he derived from that distinguished public servant, Mr. Kennedy. A Return might, he thought, be issued as to our position in relation to tariffs of foreign nations. He had received many inquiries from Chambers of Commerce as to the issue of such a Return. The last Return had been issued five or six years ago, many changes had since been made in the foreign tariffs against our goods. The work of preparing the Return would be heavy; but the materials for it must, he believed, be in daily use at the Board of Trade. He trusted that before long they might have the promised Paper in regard to Vitu. He thought that before deciding anything definite in regard to Uganda we should ascertain the position occupied by the British Company in the sphere of influence. The position of affairs in Samoa had gone from bad to worse, and he would like to be informed as to what had been decided in regard to Mataafa, and whether there was any prospect of a settled Government being carried on in Samoa?

*MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars) said, it was only becoming that someone on his side of the House should acknowledge the work which was being done by the Foreign Office, and which had been referred to by the Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit). He remembered that in 1885 and 1886, when Lord Rosebery became Foreign Minister, the delays in obtaining Consular Reports sometimes extended over two or three years, but a change came about during Lord Rosebery's administration, and since then these Reports, or extracts which were likely to be of benefit to the commercial community, had been furnished with commendable rapidity. For the last three or four years the Foreign Office had given them commercial information of a fuller character and with greater promptitude than was furnished by any other Government, and he thought that a Parliamentary Vote of Thanks should be accorded Mr. Kennedy and Lord Rosebery for the good work they had accomplished in this direction, and which, it was to be hoped, would continue and, if possible, be even improved in the future. He should like to say a few words in reference to what had been said as to Saigon and the other French possessions. He had been for many years, and was still, connected with the trade of Eastern Asia, and therefore perhaps he might speak with the authority of one who had not only lived there, but had been actually engaged in the trade of that part of the world. France had done enormous work, and at very great cost, in trying to develop trade in Eastern Asia. Between 20 and 30 years ago the French established a line of steamers there to which the French Government gave an enormous subsidy, but these vessels were chiefly employed now in carrying British merchandise. The French trade, with the exception of the silk trade which they had with Shanghai, was a very small and trifling trade indeed. He had been astonished sometimes at the language of French diplomatists, journalists, and politicians. One would think, to read their statements, that the French had an enormous trade out in the far East, but as a matter of fact the most of what was said and written upon the subject was largely mythical, and French trade in the far East, as we understood the word, had practically little existence at all. There could not be any French trade in any ports in the East if trade was free, because it would pass into our hands or into those of the Germans, or would be taken by the Chinese, who were no doubt the dominating trading race of the East, and unless the French prevented us or the Germans or the Chinese from doing trade then it was certain they would get no trade for themselves. This was true of every place the French had in the East. When they obtained possession of any place they immediately sat down and concocted fixed regulations aimed expressly against ourselves, and if the first series of enactments or regulations were insufficient, they concocted a few more, and finally arrived at this state of things: that, whatever little trade could be done or was done, must filter through their hands. They must take a toll for everything done in the place, and unless they made the regulations he spoke of, they might as well leave the place, so far as doing any trade themselves was concerned. He desired to call attention to the position of two places in the East which did a large trade with Siam—namely, Hong Kong and Singapore. They were absolute commercial mysteries to all Frenchmen who had never lived there. These places, 40 years ago, had no existence as trading places at all. What were they to-day? Singapore was an enormous trading entrepôt for Java, Borneo, Siam, and the whole of the places in the Straits, and Hong Kong was an enormous trading port for the whole trade of the seaboard of China. Any person and any country might trade there. But that was not the French idea of trade at all. If the French were to obtain possession of these two places they would immediately concoct fiscal enactments with a view to direct the whole trade into their own pockets. If France were allowed to impose such fiscal regulations as these on Siam the trade of Singapore and Hong Kong would suffer materially. It was not that the trade would be done by France, but it would cease to be done at all; the little that remained passing into French hands, and the trade that we had, at the present time, connected with these places would be very seriously affected. Something like 83 per cent., or about four vessels out of every five coming to the ports of Siam were under the British flag. He hoped the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would be able to give us an assurance that our interests would be amply protected in any arrangements that were come to. There was not the smallest doubt we should be able to retain the large trading business he had spoken of unless we were interfered with by France in the regulations which were now being made. He hoped the Foreign Office would see that whatever settlement was come to there should be nothing in it to prevent our continuing our trade relations, both by sea and land, between this country and Siam, and Singapore and Hong Kong.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) desired to support the views which had been stated, more particularly by the Member for South Islington. Looking at this question of Siam almost entirely from a commercial point of view, representing, as he did, a manufacturing constituency very keenly interested in finding new markets for its trade, he should like to say he listened with great pleasure to what the hon. Baronet said as to the deeper interest the Foreign Office was now taking in commercial matters. He could assure the hon. Baronet that if the Foreign Office acted firmly and vigorously where the trade of this country was concerned, they would have behind them such a force of popular support—from the industrial population—as perhaps no Foreign Office had ever had before. Referring to the subject of Madagascar, it struck him as a most peculiar fact that there should be this difference of opinion between France and England as to the proper interpretation of the Treaty relative to Madagascar. It seemed to him to be a loosely worded document, and it was quite clear that France, at any rate, did not quite take the view of that rather ambiguous phrase, “the Protectorate of the Island of Madagascar,” which our Foreign Office then took, and which he hoped was taken at present. It was really a pity that the language of the Treaty was not less ambiguous, and it would also have been better if the Foreign Office had not lent itself to the French interpretation by withdrawing two Consuls from Madagascar somewhat, it appeared, at the dictation of the French, thereby implying that the French interpretation of that Treaty was the more correct one. As to the question of Siam, he wanted to press the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs for an answer on two points, which he did not think were necessarily confidential, and on which the hon. Member for Kingston (Sir R. Temple) asked for information. They were questions as to matters of fact. The hon. Member for Kingston asked for information as to how the indemnity was being paid by Siam, and whether it was believed that Siam would be able to meet the obligation that France was imposing upon her, and he also asked as to what information had been received with reference to the French entrenchments around Chantaboon. These were two plain questions, which could be answered without any disadvantage to the Public Service. The hon. Member for Kingston told them on the authority of a statesman well known and versed in Eastern affairs that the Most Favoured Nation Clause was really no protection for our interests in Siam against the kind of concessions that it was to be feared the French would be able to wring out of the Siamese. This statesman contended that in the face of that Most Favoured Nation Clause the French would be able to treat with the Siamese in this fashion. They would say to the latter—"We shall not require the whole indemnity we are asking for if, in return for our not doing that, you will give us certain monopolies and certain concessions in your own country." It was maintained that it was perfectly within the obligations under which Siam rested towards us and the Most Favoured Nation Clause that she should come to some terms of that kind with France. It would be well to know from the Foreign Office whether, according to the interpretation they put upon the most favoured nation clause it was possible for the Siamese to treat with the French on such terms. In view of the fact that it was possible these concessions and monopolies might be granted to French subjects under French pressure it was important to show how vast were our interests in Siam, and how small was the French interest at the present moment. No less than 87 per cent. of the whole shipping in the trade to Siam was English shipping and of the remainder 8 per cent. was German. The value of the English imports was 93 per cent., German 2 per cent. In value the English exports were 85 per cent., German 8 per cent. But there was something further, and that was that the greater number of the vessels carrying foreign flags were chartered by Englishmen, and the whole of the cargoes carried were English cargoes representing English trade. In contrast with all this, according to the last Foreign Office Report the French cargoes, both imports and exports, only amounted to .03 per cent., which was a perfectly trifling and ludicrous state of trade in comparison with that carried on by England with Siam. The mines in Siam, he understood, were in English hands. Taking the special exports from Siam, rice, which was the principal, was almost wholly in English hands; the tea trade was almost entirely carried on by English firms, and the paper and spice trade was in the hands of two English firms. Coming to the trade of cotton manufacturing, he was told that one-fourth of the whole import trade of Siam consisted of cotton manufactures, and the latest Report stated that the goods now sold were almost entirely of English manufacture. This showed the enormous extent to which England was interested in this country, and although it was quite fair for the Under Secretary to say that hitherto English trade had not been much affected by what had been going on, still it was possible that if care was not taken as to concessions to France being outside the Most Favoured Nation Clause it might happen that a great danger would be done to English trade which represented three-fourths of the whole export and import trade of the country. He came to another matter connected with the trade in Siam which, prospectively at any rate, affected Lancashire considerably. He had been speaking hitherto of internal trade, but he wanted to say a word or two about external trade which might be opened up through Siam or Burmah with the South West of China. There was a teeming population there, and great openings for trade. It had been the object and desire of English merchants for a considerable time to get into this corner of China through the Burmese State. He fancied the road for a railway had been surveyed three times—namely, in 1866, 1869, and 1873. Of course, the annexation of Burmah made this route a great deal more possible. Whatever might happen to France in Siam, we could no doubt go a long way in the direction of the south-west corner of China through our own territories; but whether we were able actually to reach that south west corner of China through our own territories would depend a great deal upon what was done in Paris, and in the negotiation as to the Burmese Shan States. It was a question how far portions of these Shan States could be dealt with by Siam, or how far we could claim to have complete control over them. Unless we retained the power to go through certain of the Shan States, about which there was this doubt, the railroad could only be carried to a certain point, because it would then have to pass through a very mountainous district not under our control, and the whole of the trade then have to be carried on by mules. This would have the effect of increasing the carriage about £30 a ton, which was a prohibitory rate. So far as the carrying of goods to Siam—an almost impossible task—he was able to do was this: The French were trying to run up the east bank of the Mekong, and if they were able to run through the neutral zone they would be able to reach North West China by their own railway, and no doubt a good deal of the present difficulty had been caused in Siam by their desire to obtain this railway. He expressed the strong hope that the Foreign Office, in the negotiations that were taking place, would lose no opportunity of seeing that, even if the French did get this communication to the South West of China, that important district, teeming with population and presenting large openings for English trade, should not be shut out from us, and that we should be able to get this communication through the Burmese State which at the present moment there seemed some likelihood of our losing. He wanted to ask one or two other questions as to the closing of the trade in the Soudan, and also as to Nyassaland. With reference to the Soudan, he approached the subject entirely from the point of view of his constituents interested in the trade there. Until 1877 we acted on the idea that the only way of taming the Mahdi and his successor, Osman Digna, was to try and starve out that country. But in 1887 a better system was adopted, and General Grenfell and Sir Charles Hollis Smith, as representing the English Government out there, encouraged trade in every possible way. They had advanced to a station there in the west side of the mountains called, he thought, Boshee. The result was that the tribes were able to pasture on the mountains during the summer; they were bound to us very much by the fact that they received this protection from us, and they also acted as an advance post against raids from the Arabs from Khartoum and that side. But General Grenfell and Sir Charles Hollis Smith had been succeeded by other representatives, a new system was adopted and trade was closed under the somewhat mistaken idea that we should be able to starve out the people of that country, and so, if necessary, be able to clear the Soudan and go back as far as Khartoum; but that, he was told, was a wholly mistaken notion. What occurred was this: We had not been able to starve them out, it was clear, and two things had happened, one of which was very detrimental to the honour of this country. Undoubtedly we did give a pledge to the Arabs, and during the time of Sir

Charles Hollis Smith we practically contracted that we should protect them in future. Under his successor he believed they were disarmed; Osman Digna came down upon them, raided them, destroyed their crops, carried away their women, and we gave no protection whatever to these disarmed men. If that was true, it was dishonouring to this country. Speaking from the trade point of view, these raids tended to destroy what little civilisation there was in that country; it destroyed the people there, or, at any rate, it destroyed their crops, and consequently the opportunity of purchasing our goods by a people who might be very useful customers. Again, the policy of trying to starve out Osman Digna in the Soudan had entirely failed, for he was able to get supplies from the Masai; and the only result was that the Arabs whom we had disarmed and had pledged ourselves to defend had been raided, and the whole trade with the Soudan had fallen into the hands of Italian merchants. With regard to Nyassaland, he would point out the anomalous position which Mr. Johnston occupied there, being at the same time Portuguese Consul, British Commissioner, and agent for the British South Africa Company within the sphere of influence. He believed Mr. Cecil Rhodes, when he was last in England, spoke very plainly to the shareholders of the British South Africa Company to the effect that he had the reversion of Nyassaland, and that he was actually subsidising it at the present moment by paying for a large force of police there. This matter ought to be cleared up. He had received many complaints that so much power should be put in the hands of a British Commissioner who was at the same time the servant of a Chartered Company; and he would like to know how far Mr. Johnston, in acting in this double capacity, was paving the way for Nyassaland to fall into the hands of the Chartered Company? He was no great believer in these Chartered Companies, and he was not sure they should find that this one was destined to be somewhat of a failure, as he was sorry to say the British East Africa Company had been. Before they gave extended powers to the British South Africa Company and allowed it to extend its territory so much, they ought to be more careful that it was really a company with sufficient means to carry out the work confided to it. The Chartered Company claimed a large jurisdiction over Matabeleland and Mashonaland; but he was told the deeds and documents transferring to the Chartered Company the rights over these territories had not been handed over to the Chartered Company by the United Concessions Company from whom they acquired them; the Directors of the one Company being to a large extent Directors of the other Company. There were many things that required looking into in connection with the British South Africa Company, and he should like to know from the Under Secretary for the Colonies whether Mr. Rhodes was justified in telling the shareholders of the Company when he was last in London that he had the reversion of Nyassaland, and that he was actually subsidising it by finding a large force of police.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said, he wished to refer to the statement that the Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. Dilke) made with regard to our policy towards Madagascar. The right hon. Baronet appeared in a new capacity. He (Sir Ashmead-Bartlett) remembered him well in the old days, when he represented the Foreign Office, and when he was always the defender and the advocate of France. The right hon. Baronet, according to the belief of the Opposition at that time, was the principal cause of the unfortunate policy of the Government of the day, which was based on the overthrow of the understanding with the great German Monarchies, and upon an alliance with France and Russia. There was no doubt that the Government of 1880 to 1885 was led into that disastrous Egyptian policy more or less by the influence of the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Baronet attributed the Protectorate of France over Madagascar to Lord Salisbury's short Administration of 1885-6.

*SIR C. W. DILKE said, he did not attribute any French Protectorate over Madagascar to Lord Salisbury's Government. What he complained of was the terms of the recognition of the Protectorate. General want of confidence.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the right hon. Baronet was referring to the Treaty of 1890, which recognised the Protectorate of France over Madagascar; but he (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett) was referring to the Treaty of 1885, which was the result of the policy of the present Prime Minister's then Government. The Treaty of 1890 was practically but the recognition of the Treaty of 1885. What had happened since 1885 was simply the consequence of the ignorance and weakness displayed by the Government of the day. That Government made a great surrender in regard to British interests in Madagascar in allowing the French to do as they pleased. He would say that there was generally a want of confidence felt in a Government which had the present Prime Minister at its head. That want of confidence was nowhere more conspicuous than in the results which had followed upon the administration of foreign affairs by the present Government during the past twelve months. They had at the Foreign Office a man of great ability and patriotism; but, all the same, there was a fatal gloom overshadowing the present Government in their foreign relations. He did not say they were responsible for all the attacks that had been made on British interests in different quarters of the globe; but there was a general feeling abroad that when a Government, of which the present Prime Minister was the head, was in Office, British interests could be attacked with impunity. That feeling had been illustrated in Egypt. The pronouncement of the Leader of the House in 1891 with regard to the embarrassment and injurious character of the British occupation of Egypt led the French to attack that occupation, and to intrigue and manœuvre against us there, and so had necessitated the recent increase of our garrison in that country. The Prime Minister was the cause of all their troubles. Siam was another instance of the same disastrous influence. As the hon. Member for Southport had said, if the Government had before June informed the French Government that a moderate rectification of the frontier on the Mekong would not be objected to, but that anything which would cripple Siam, or would deal a blow at British prestige in the East, would not be permitted, the whole difficulty with Siam would have at once subsided. What would the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs have said had he (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett), or any hon. Member, got up in the House 10 weeks ago and said that the French would filch 75,000 square miles of territory from Siam; that the Siamese troops would be driven away from both banks of the Mekong; that the revenues of the richest Southern Provinces would be seized by France, and important strategic positions on the Gulf of Siam would be occupied by the French forces; that France would inflict a great blow on British trade, and that they would injure British prestige throughout the East? The Under Secretary and his Colleagues would have poured out the vials of scorn on him, and he would have been laughed out of the House. Yet every one of these things had happened. Questions were repeatedly put to the Government, and assurances were as often given that no danger was threatened to Siamese or British interests; but all these assurances had been falsified. The Secretary of State and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs assured the country that the independence and integrity of Siam were objects of first-class importance to Her Majesty's Government. He did not know about the independence of Siam, but he thought, unless the present policy was reversed, that independence would exist only in name. With regard to the integrity of the country, there was not the slightest doubt that that integrity had been destroyed by the forcible transfer of the 75,000 square miles of Siamese territory of which he had spoken. Four-fifths of the export trade of Siam was in British hands, and any disturbance with our foreign Imperial trade inflicted an injury on this country, and especially on the working classes of the country. On this subject he should like to read a quotation from The Times' correspondent at Bangkok. He wrote in Tuesday's issue—

"I must emphasise everything that I have hitherto telegraphed to the effect that it is England that is really attacked through Siam. Great Britain must harbour no illusions, as she has lost prestige in the East up to the present in this Franco-Siamese conflict. The letters which I have received from China and Japan clearly show this, and, as regards Siam itself, so far from British interests being considered as fully protected, I am in a position to state that important British enterprises which were contemplated here, and which would have given employment to labour and capital, have been abandoned owing to fears for Siam's future."

That, he thought, was worthy of the attention of Her Majesty's Government. With regard to our Indian Empire, he looked upon the influence which the weak and unsuccessful policy of the Government with regard to Siam would have on India as being probably the most serious phase of the whole matter. There was no use in our affecting an ostrich-like security while Russia was advancing on one side of India and France on the other. There was little doubt that France and Russia were combining their aims and their policy in Europe, and it was more than likely that they would also co-operate in Asia. He feared that unless the policy which the Government had pursued in the past was soon and completely reversed with regard to Siam, they would find ere long that the injury which had already been done to Siam, and the blow which had been struck at British prestige, would be very largely increased, and to an extent that might even menace our power in the East. He had desired to say a word with reference to the Pamirs, but at this late period of the evening he would refrain. He would only say that he hoped the Government were correct in the statement they made that the Russian force in occupation had not been increased, and that the promise of the Russian Government not to increase their force, or to fortify important Passes on the road to India, would be carried out.

*MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) said that, interrupting the Debate on Siam, he would invite the attention of the Committee for a short time to the subject of the West Coast of Africa. They had heard many eulogiums on the efforts and services of officials of the Foreign Office, both at home and abroad, and nothing he intended to say would detract from the value of those services. The action of the permanent officials had, no doubt, been dictated by the general policy that had animated the various Cabinets that had ruled over this country for the last few years. He desired to call attention to the monopoly which the Royal Niger Company had set up against the express words of their Charter granted in 1885.

Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett

This monopoly was exercised in a country comprising something like 500,000 square miles, and said to contain a population of 30,000,000. The district was not an entirely new one, so far as British trade was concerned, like other districts in regard to which Charters had been granted. It had been known to British trade for 50 years, and the British Government itself had been spending money there to the tune of £500,000. It was stated, when the Charter came before the Cabinet of the day, that the interests of all the British traders had been bought up, but that statement was incorrect, because within the last few months they had purchased the business of the African Association, which had all along protested against the Charter, and besides this Association there were about 12 other firms engaged in the trade. The petty native traders who for a large number of years had been trading up and down the river had according to Bishop Crowther, entirely disappeared, and the potash trade, which was at one time entirely in the hands of those native traders, who were agents for British firms, had been monopolised by the Company. Thus a trader writes—

"We were not permitted by the Agent to leave Lokoja. From February to July, 1885, we were detained there, unable to obtain a passage for us and our potash, while the Company poured into Lagos some hundred tons to take advantage of the 'boom' then existing in that market."

This was not a Party question, both Parties in the State having been responsible for what had occurred. The fact was that five or six years ago the colonising enterprise of recent years was not so distinctly manifest. Imperial federation was not so much talked about. Cabinet after Cabinet came into power, and while they could not deny the great British interests that existed up the Niger they had not the courage, as they should have had, to send out a representative of their own to organise and civilise the district, but through lack of courage they handed over to this company the duty that they themselves ought to have discharged. The Charter was granted, practically, without public inquiry and behind the backs of the Glasgow, Liverpool, and native traders, who, until it was established, had no knowledge that it was going to be granted. The Charter stated that no monopoly should be set up, but the ink of the Charter was hardly dry when, in July, 1886, Lord Aberdare, at the annual meeting, had stated that the Company had set out with the full intention of trying to get a monopoly of the trade in the district. When a monopoly of this kind was set up enormous injustice was done to other traders. He distrusted the policy of handing over a great territory to a limited body of traders, believing that competition was far more civilising. Lord Iddesleigh, in November, 1886, through the Foreign Office, had stated that he considered the terms of the Charter were a sufficient guarantee against any monopoly and differential duty; but the Committee would see how little was the effect of those words. It was clear to everyone that when a person was Governor as well as a trader, he was at a great advantage over other traders. He could collect revenue from the outside trader; he could, and he (Mr. Lawrence) believed he did, in this case, pay backsheesh to some of the black potentates inland in order to induce them to bring down trade to the offices of the Company. It was clear that a monopoly, though protested against on paper, was certain to be set up in practice. A duty of £50 and £60 and up to £100 had to be paid for stations on the Niger. It had, too, to be paid in gold, and if the Committee remembered that at present barter was the sole method of exchange in the district it would be understood what a hardship it was to make these traders bring gold out from England. The Company had imposed very high Import and Export Duties, and a tax upon salt of 20s. per ton, while in the other African States in the neighbourhood it was 5s. a ton, and in the adjoining Niger Protectorate 4s. per ton. The duty on palm oil was 20 per cent. ad valorem, and on palm kernels 30 per cent. ad valorem. These Export Duties, which did not exist in other British territories, had been put on owing to suggestions thrown out at the Berlin Conference, to meet the special expenditure of keeping down slavery. He should like to ask the hon. Baronet to say, when he replied, what was the extra expenditure in putting down slavery that this Export Duty was meant to meet, and whether the expenditure was as large as the amount received in duties. The result of the duties had been that in two years ending 1888 the export of palm kernels from Lagos dropped from 2,500 tons to 1,000 tons. The Committee would see, therefore, that the Lagos traders had just reason to object to the monopoly which, owing to the action of Cabinets at home, had been set up on the Niger River. If the Government at home had been content merely with having called into existence the Royal Niger Company, and had limited its trading to certain places, say, north of Onitscha, perhaps those he represented would not have asked him to specially draw the attention of the Committee to the matter; but the Cabinet of 1892 improved on the Cabinet of 1885, and had extended the area over which the Company ruled, handing over to them the Mahini country, a large and most fertile portion of the Oil Rivers district—about 90 miles of some of the richest territory in that part of the world. How was it that the Foreign Office permitted this to be done, notwithstanding that they had a most serious representation from the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce and the Lagos traders against it—supported, too, by the opinion of Her Majesty's Consul resident in those parts? Those he represented believed that the extension of Sir Claud Macdonald's rule over the whole of that area would be of enormous advantage to the trading community. It would do away with the double system of duties obtaining there. At present, the charging of duties on goods going out of that territory would lead to confusion. The unhappy natives had no idea of customs houses, and would be easily placed in an interminable fog as to whether they were breaking the law or not. The country was riddled with countless streams which were the roadways of the district. Clearly it was expedient that such a district should be under one authority. He should be told that the Niger Company originally came into existence owing to the enterprise of our Gallic neighbours, who were going north, south, east, and west annexing territory; that the Company was chartered in order to secure possession of these territories to the British Crown. But, if so, he hoped the Committee would agree with him as to the reasonableness of the Company leaving the Claud Macdonald territory and going farther afield, with all its advantages—its Imperial support and so on. It should leave, under the jurisdiction of Sir Claud Macdonald, the lower part of the river, which had long since been opened up to British trade, and which had been brought under British influence by Treaties made with Her Majesty's Government, direct through its own Consuls, and not in the least owing to the action of the Niger Company. Although this most successful government of the Oil Rivers Protectorate—which had immediately begun to pay its way—had been established, the district had been sliced off and handed over to the Royal Niger Company. He did not think this Company came to them with the cleanest of hands. They all knew that beyond seas many things were done by people who bore our name and sailed from our shores which could not be defended. He did not wish to believe that all the statements which came from these districts were true, but it seemed pretty clear that some very questionable things had been done by agents of the Company; and he should like to know how far they had been made the subjects of inquiry by the Foreign Office in days gone by? He believed there was a great deal open to censure in the early conduct of the Company. There was one thing which had been brought under his notice in 1885 and 1886. A few months before the Charter was granted an agent of the Company captured three children belonging to a certain tribe, and held them as hostages. The Company had written to the Foreign Office saying that the act was an exceptional one under an exceptional state of things. But after the three children were captured, and a white person was taken in retaliation by the natives, and kept in a black hole for some time, an agent of the Company was actually sailing by and taking no measures to secure this person's liberty. There were other stories of a sinister character, which had been narrated in the columns of The Liverpool Daily Post—a journal whose editor had been a well-known man in the House. It was stated in that paper that natives endeavouring to run the gauntlet through the territory of the Company had been shot at. He could not vouch for the truth of that, but this and the other stories to which he referred could easily be verified.

Then, again, the Company was surrounded with mystery, and its own servants were bound to secrecy as to its action under a penalty of £1,000. The clause in the contracts with their servants ran as follows :—

“Mr. — agrees that he will not, either during the currency of this agreement or for a period of ten years after its determination, from any cause whatever, without the assent of the Company, communicate to the newspapers of Great Britain or other countries, or to any outside persons, official or private, any facts, whether commercial, industrial, scientific, or political, in connection with the business or administration of the Company, or the district occupied by the Company, or with those who shall have visited or become acquainted with it during his employment in the Company's service, and that he will not publish, or distribute privately, any pamphlet, book, or other paper disclosing any such facts, nor in any way knowingly induce any person, or persons, to carry on any occupation of profit within such districts. . . . The amount specified is by way of liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty, but any such payment shall not prejudice the right of the Company to restrain a continuance of such breach.”

Sir Claud, when Major Macdonald, had been sent out to inquire into the allegations against the Company, but his Report had never been published. He was afraid that many Foreign Office Reports were for the Foreign Office alone, and could not be published, but he had good reason to believe that many officials—not merely Major Macdonald—had several times brought to the knowledge of the Government facts which showed that the operations of the Royal Niger Company ought to be more carefully looked into than they had hitherto been. To his mind what should be done was this : some Crown Commissioner should be sent to reside in the district. Furthermore, in his opinion, the Company ought to be compelled to publish periodical accounts similar to those which were published by the old East India Company, showing the receipts and expenditure, both administrative and commercial. Administration and trading accounts should be kept rigorously apart. What the British East India Company were compelled to do under Acts of 33 Geo. III., c. 52, and 53 Geo. III., c. 155, he claimed that the Royal Niger Company should be compelled to do, because they had ousted all other traders from their district. This did not apply to the British South Africa Company, in whose territory there were no outside traders; but in the case of the Niger Company the Government ought to require it to send up accounts of all their expenditure and revenue to be laid before Parliament. He had ventured to bring this matter before the Committee, because they had hitherto received no reply on these matters from the Foreign Office. No doubt it would be said that these Companies were the cheapest form of annexing territory to the British Crown, and that it did not matter in the long run which trader made the profit; but he felt convinced that, if they wanted to spread civilisation rapidly and to found it on a sound basis, the soundest policy was to allow competition to come in. That would be much more efficacious than the policy of tying the hands of traders by allowing a monopoly.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, he had already trespassed upon the time of the Committee for some little space, but would now promise to be brief. He was glad the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Lawrence) had at last had an opportunity of bringing this matter before the House, though he was afraid he could not agree with the hon. Member in the view he had presented in regard to the action of the Niger Company. The hon. Member represented that the Government had handed over the administration of this vast territory of 500,000 square miles to the Niger Company. That Company, by pressing up the river, had enabled Great Britain to bring under her sphere of influence the vast territory in question. Liverpool merchants who traded with that part of Africa had not ventured up the Oil Rivers.

MR. LAWRENCE said, that he knew of one firm which had been up there for 40 years.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, that his information pointed to the fact that at the time the Charter was granted to the Niger Company they had bought out every one of the traders on the whole river, and they had gone behind the Liverpool traders, who confined their operations to the mouth of the Oil River, and had pushed up to the east, and therefore it was not unnatural that a certain amount of trade jealousy should arise on the part of the Liverpool merchants as against a Company whose operations had proved to be eminently successful. His hon. Friend talked about monopoly, but where was the monopoly? By the Berlin Treaty of 1885 the navigation of the Niger was open to all the world; therefore, the clients of the hon. Member were entitled to make use of it. And what duties were imposed on merchants? Absolutely none. There is not a single Import Duty imposed on any merchandise on the two rivers, except in the case of alcohol, tobacco, and war material. If the clients of the hon. Member wished to introduce those things into the country duty would have to be paid, but as to ordinary articles of merchandise—in which the hon. Member's clients probably dealt—there was not a single Import Duty of any sort or kind to be paid throughout the length and breadth of the dominions of the Chartered Company. According to the information supplied to him (Mr. Lowther), not only was there no monopoly, but the trade of the independent traders had actually increased in the district since the Niger Company had been granted a Charter. In 1886 the Niger Company had the whole of the trade; in 1887 independent traders had 1-17th of the trade; in 1890 they had 1-12th; and in 1891 they had 1-9th. He did not feel called upon to defend the Niger Company, the Conservative Government having been in no way responsible for the granting of the Charter. While he was at the Foreign Office he came to the conclusion that the Company was doing a most admirable work, because they prevented any importation of spirits above the deltaic region, and in the lower regions had imposed a very high duty on alcohol. It had enormously developed the country in the time it had been there, and had acquired for British trade and influence this vast territory, which amounted to nearly 500,000 square miles, and which, if it had not been so acquired, might have been swallowed up by France 10 years ago.

*SIR E. GREY said, that in regard to the point raised in the first speech of the hon. Member for Penrith, as to whether any fresh Papers on Madagascar would be laid on the Table, he could not give an answer without further inquiry. The question had been raised in the House already this Session, and the consideration which influenced the Government in refusing to give them was that, affairs in Madagascar being still in a critical state, even if Papers which might be produced had no direct bearing on the questions at issue, they might indirectly have some disturbing influence which it was not desirable to provoke. However, the point raised would be considered. The question of the Return of the tariffs of foreign countries would have to be considered by him with the President of the Board of Trade before a reply could be given. The Papers as to the cession of Vitu were in course of preparation, and he did not know why they had not yet been presented to Parliament. There had been no intentional delay in presenting them. With regard to Samoa there had, no doubt, been some trouble there, but there was no intention to inflict retributive justice on the person who was the cause of it. Mataafa was unfortunate; he did not happen to be the nominee of the Treaty Powers; and, secondly, he was not successful. He was placed on board a man-of-war, and it was for the three Treaty Powers to decide what should be done with him. He would probably be placed upon an island belonging to one of the Treaty Powers, where he would be secure, so far as Samoa was concerned. By his removal the Government of Malietoa had been strengthened, and it was hoped that affairs in Samoa might progress satisfactorily as soon as the new officials had arrived. With regard to Manicaland, the British and Portuguese Commissioners had met on the spot and had gone through certain delimitations, but failed to agree. The question of final settlement was now the subject of correspondence between the two Governments. Regarding the Soudan, he was as much against the policy of starving the Soudan as the hon. Member himself, but the question must depend upon the future influence of political considerations. As to Chantaboon, they had received assurances that its occupation was only to be temporary, while as to the Most Favoured Nation Clause, the Treaty was so distinct that the Government would be bound to see that no commercial advantages were given to other countries which would result in the exclusion of British trade. With regard to Nyassaland, it had been the object of the present Government to insure that its administration should be impartial as regarded the various interests concerned, and the Government had hitherto made no change in the conditions under which it was administered. It should be remembered that in all new territories this country had to consider whether the taxpayers would agree to expenditure enough to take them over. If the British taxpayer was not asked to pay, they must be prepared for some anomalies in existing administration. As to the Niger Company, it had administered the territory over which it ruled well, and had raised no political complications. After the most careful inquiry it appeared that the Customs raised did not so much as cover the amount which the Company spent in administration. It was one of the few Chartered Companies which paid a dividend.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON (Mauchester, N.E.) said, the Debate had been necessarily discursive, but beyond all doubt the most prominent subject before the Committee had been the state of affairs in Siam. In his humble opinion, the Committee ought to accept as satisfactory the statement made by the Under Secretary. He could not associate himself with the opinion of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Sir E. Ashmead - Bartlett), as he did not believe that British prestige had been lowered in the East and in India by the occurrences that had taken place. We did not, and we never had, assumed responsibility for a protectorate in Siam, and he ventured to think our reputation was more likely to suffer from extravagant pretensions than from confining our efforts to our legitimate interests. The Under Secretary of State had accentuated the statement he made on a former occasion with regard to our great commercial interests in Siam and the Resolution of Her Majesty's Government to defend and protect them. He believed they might look with confidence to the Foreign Secretary to act up to the spirit of that statement, and they would pay careful attention to the result of the negotiations that were going on. He believed the Secretary of State had due regard to the interests of British commerce, for it would be not only a national loss, but a national disgrace to allow those interests to be injured or destroyed. The Committee ought to be satisfied so far with the assurances of the Under Secretary.

Mr. HANBURY rose—

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 140 ; Noes 55.—(Division List, No. 296.)

Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed

*SIR E. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT said, he wished to call attention to the position of affairs in Mashonaland. That position was critical, if not perilous, for British subjects and British interests. There were some 1,500 British subjects now engaged in developing the resources of that distant, but most promising and naturally rich country. They were practically cut off from the rest of the British possessions. Hundreds of miles separated them from any immediate assistance which could be afforded either by the Imperial or the Colonial Government. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), in a speech he had made earlier in the evening, had attacked Chartered Companies. He (Sir E. Ashmead - Bartlett) was sorry to hear that from the hon. Member, because if the hon. Member would carry his mind back to the latter portion of the last century and the earlier portion of the present century he would see that the East India Company, the great prototype of the present Chartered Companies, had done the greatest amount of good for the commerce and Imperial power of this country. The greatest commercial development of this country abroad had originated from the efforts of private individuals, working sometimes for their own hand and sometimes banded together as Chartered Companies. What was the position of the British Chartered Companies in South Africa? They had been carrying on a great work of exploration and development in one of the richest territories of the world. A grave danger now threatened them. Lo Bengula, a powerful and savage Monarch, who could put from 15,000 to 20,000 armed men in the field, was dissatisfied with their progress, and threatened them with serious danger, if not complete destruction. Although the colonists might be able to defend themselves within Forts Victoria and Salisbury from any attacks by Lo Bengula's warriors, their work, their wealth, and their resources were of such a character that their retirement within the forts would practically ruin all their enterprise. Their work was twofold—mining and agricultural. There were no two forms of industry so open to destruction by an enemy as mining and agriculture. Everybody knew how easily crops could be destroyed, cattle carried off, and the machinery and appliances of mining ruined by an active enemy. Therefore, the retirement of the colonists within those forts would mean the practical ruin of their settlement and the destruction of their agricultural and mining enterprise, which were very open to the enemy's attack. The Government had assumed an unjust and illogical attitude towards this great British enterprise, for they had said to the Chartered Company that their forces, which would be adequate for the defence of the forts, but absolutely inadequate for the protection of the settlement from the raids of the Matabele, were not to undertake any offensive movement, but were to remain on the defensive. But the only practical way of dealing with the danger would be by a speedy movement of the whole of the British forces in Mashonaland upon the King's kraal. He had asked the Prime Minister the other day whether the defence of a position was not often best secured by offensive tactics. That statement was received with ignorant jeers by the Radical Party, and he was not surprised at that. The latest news from Mashonaland was that, in the opinion of Sir H. Loch and of the responsible authorities in Mashonaland, Lo Bengula was at the present moment temporising, because he had sent some 6,000 of his men on a raid into the Mashukuhunbwe country to the north of the Zambesi, and until they returned he would be unable to take the offensive against our colonists. When that force returned Lo Bengula would be in a position to throw between 15,000 and 20,000 armed barbarians against the small body of 1,500 colonists in that distant country. What was the character of those Matabele? The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies had tried to throw some responsibility on the late Government. "Though Lo Bengula's character was known," said the hon. Gentleman, "the late Government had some negotiations with the Potentate." He would venture to submit that that argument was wholly beside the matter. The hon. Gentleman had added that these raids of the Matabele, which used to be of a most destructive and horrible character, had practically ceased. But that was not so. The raids had been resumed in the present year, and had been attended with all the horrors of the massacre of the helpless Mashonas and the carrying into captivity of their women and children. Every British Government had at some time or other to enter into negotiations with Powers and Potentates whose character for humanity might very largely be disputed. The object of the late Government, as well as of the Chartered Company, in entering into negotiations with the King was to secure peace and order for the large districts which had hitherto been exposed to the raids of these savage tribes; and it was because that policy, which had been successful for several years, was now threatened with attack by Lo Bengula that he now brought the matter before the Committee. He would refer hon. Members who wished to know anything about the Matabele and their raids to the letters which appeared in The Times of that day and on previous days, the statements in which would be fully confirmed by everyone who knew anything about South Africa. He would read a few extracts from a letter which had appeared in The Times of August 29th, from the Bishop of Derry, whose knowledge of South Africa was derived from the most authentic sources—

"The Matabele are descended from a Zulu tribe which emigrated in 1825 under Um-milhquiri, father of Lo Bengula. They form a military state or caste; they are soldiers, not for defence but for the raids upon feebler tribes for cattle, slaves, and especially women. Mashonaland is the centre of their raids, their happy hunting ground. The Matabele loves to kill, lives to kill."

The Bishop then went on to describe the raid of the Matabele. The kraals of the Mashonas were surrounded at night. In the morning the savages made a descent on them, massacred the men, and carried off the women, children, and cattle into captivity. A certain number of Mashona men were preserved in order to drive the Mashona cattle into the country of the Matabele, and when they arrived there these unfortunate men were brutally slaughtered before the eyes of their families. That happened this very year, and yet the Under Secretary for the Colonies told them that the raids were things of the past.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I did not say that. I said to a large extent.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the words "large extent" were not used by the hon. Gentleman, or, if they were used, they were used in such a way that the attention of the House had not been fixed on them.

MR. S. BUXTON: The hon. Gentleman's question to me was whether or not I could say that the raids had ceased within the last few years. As a matter of fact, with the exception of the raid the other day, the raids are to a large extent things of the past.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said he differed from the hon. Gentleman as to his impression of what he had said on the subject. The cessation of these murderous raids was due to the policy of the late Conservative Government and of the Chartered Company. But what had happened this year in Mashonaland? In July one of Lo Bengula's impis raided the country, and many of the unfortunate Mashonas were massacred close to Victoria itself, and their women and children were carried off. Lo Bengula, when remonstrated with by the agent of the company, said that the Mashonas were his slaves, and that he had the right to treat them as he chose. For the last 50 years the unfortunate Mashonas have been subjected to this persecution, and thousands of them had been killed and their women and children made slaves. The country in which these atrocities were being perpetrated was a country under British protection, a country in which the British flag was flying. It might be true that the Chartered Company were largely responsible for peace and order in Mashonaland; but it was impossible for the Government to repudiate the responsibility, which must in the last instance fall upon them for the protection of the British subjects in that country, and for the security of those who looked up to them for security. The Government had thrown upon the Company the responsibility of protecting British subjects within their territories, and yet had forbidden them to take aggressive action against Lo Bengula, which seemed to be the only effective method of giving protection to those who were dependent upon them for their lives. All that was asked was that the Company and the British settlers in their district should be allowed to deal a deadly blow at this barbarous and cruel tyrant, and thus secure Mashonaland for all time against the raids of the Matabele. When Lo Bengula's impis returned from the raid they were making against the Mashukuhunbwes it would be impossible to protect Mashonaland from the overpowering numbers of these savages should they attack the settlement. If such a thing occurred, Her Majesty's Government would have to bear the responsibility. The Government had adopted the very worst policy that it could adopt. They had adopted the half-and-half, meddling and muddling, policy which always characterised a Ministry of which the present Prime Minister was the head, and refused to permit the Company to adopt the only rational means of defending themselves against these raids. Lo Bengula claimed that the Mashonas were his slaves, and that he had a perfect right to carry off their cattle and their women and children. What were these Mashonas doing for the settlers? They were supplying the necessary labour by which alone the country could be developed; they acted as agricultural labourers and mining labourers in Mashonaland. These unfortunate people had taken refuge from Lo Bengula in their mountain fastnesses. They had been induced to come down from these fastnesses in the belief that they would be preserved from the cruelty of the Matabele under the protection of the British flag. But they did not get that protection; they were still being raided by Lo Bengula. The Bishop of Derry in his admirable and eloquent letter well described the terrible results of these raids—

“The Mashonas are absolutely necessary for the development of the country, whilst their extermination is growing nearer every year. The sight of gentle, unoffending servants simply hacked to pieces, their blood spurting over the Englishman's gown, or the Englishman's coat, is something too terrible for thought to dwell upon. This cloud, big with death, ever threatening to break into a fresh storm, and forming again and again, must be dissipated, unless the peaceful development of Mashonaland is to become impossible.”

The present condition of affairs was described in an extract which he would read from The Times newspaper—

“Dr. Jameson, the Administrator of Mashonaland, who knows more about the situation than anyone, has declared the present position to be impossible, and says that it renders action of some sort imperative. Mining work in Mashonaland is suspended; the natives who supply the manual labour cannot be induced to come down from their fastnesses. Prospectors are obliged to remain within the protected area of the Company's occupation. On all sides the opinion appears to be gaining ground that a trial of strength between the forces of barbarism and civilisation in that part of Africa is becoming inevitable. Such a trial has in no way been courted by the Company. War is financially undesirable, and if the conflict could have been postponed for another decade, the Company would have been in a better position to enter into it with the necessary assurance of success.”

All this showed that a grave responsibility would rest on the Government if they adopted the policy they had announced to the House. Her Majesty's Government had no right to blow hot and cold in this matter, for it involved the well-being and prosperity of 1,500 British subjects, and possibly their lives as well. Either the Government should undertake responsibility for the protection of our fellow-subjects in Mashonaland, or should give the British South Africa Company a free hand in dealing with Lo Bengula.

COMMANDER BETHELL said, it was obvious that the Chartered Companies must be restrained by the Government to some extent; it was not less obvious that if war ensued the Imperial Government must sooner or later interfere to protect British subjects. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had that evening spoken of Chartered Companies as excellent institutions, but in his own view the policy of colonising by means of such Companies was very doubtful. It might be that the accounts which had been referred to might turn out to be somewhat exaggerated, and it might even yet be found preferable to square Lo Bengula rather than to fight him. But whether that was so or not, he thought it was quite clear that inasmuch as the Imperial Government restrained the Chartered Company from taking any step which they have believed to be necessary for the safety of those over whom they ruled, obviously in some way or other the Imperial Government would have to come to their assistance in time of difficulty. He would suggest to his hon. Friend, who thought more vigorous action should have been taken by the Government that he should remember that if the Imperial Government was called upon to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for the Chartered Company, it might have something to say to the Chartered Company about the chestnuts after they were pulled out. He would not now enter at greater length into the ethics of Chartered Companies. He would prefer to proceed, as formerly, by slow steps into a new country. That course was pursued in Nyassaland with extremely happy results; and, while upon this point, he would like to ask that more frequent Reports might be published as to the condition of this part of Africa. Although he would have liked to have had some discussion before Parliament closed on certain important questions connected with Uganda, they could not well discuss anything until the Papers relating to that part of Africa were before them.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I want to say a word or two upon questions relating to African colonisation, but before I do so I would like to say that I am also very much interested in another Colony—the Bahamas—the discussion in regard to which, I believe, will be raised by my hon. and gallant Friend opposite. It is quite as much for the convenience of the Government and the Committee as for ours that we should separate what we have to say and keep each subject distinct; but, of course, if the Government are going, without giving us the slightest warning, to move the Closure at some early period, then, of course, it will be necessary for us to deal with the various subjects together. I do hope that the Under Secretary will take this opportunity of giving the Committee in some detail the opinions of the Government upon the whole question of Chartered Companies, which is a subject of the utmost importance, and has, within the last few years, received great development. The Chartered Company of Borneo has, perhaps, been made a precedent, which has been largely followed in the case of Africa. I am not prepared to say that this is the best policy to follow, and experience must have shown that there are great difficulties connected with it. On the other hand, there is much to be said in its favour. If we are to proceed with that policy there ought to be some continuity, and some rule ought to be laid down as to the responsibility of the Imperial Government in connection with Chartered Companies. There is no advantage at all in Chartered Companies unless you intend deliberately and permanently to throw upon them the responsibility which you have committed to their charge. You say to a Chartered Company—"We give you powers to provide for the peace, order, and good government of the land which we trust to your care," and then at the very first opportunity, the moment there is any trouble in the land, there is at once a demand upon the Imperial Government that they should interfere, and, apparently, the Imperial Government drifts and drifts until at last it does interfere. We have, therefore, all the disadvantage with regard to Chartered Companies, all the trouble and risk, and none of the advantages. I think that is altogether a mistake. For myself, I may say that I have not seen reason to doubt that the system of Chartered Companies might have been a very good system, at all events, in the early days of the colonisation of these countries; but, as I have said, you should make an arrangement with a Chartered Company and stick to it. You must say to them—"You have the responsibility, and you must take it up. If you go into a country you must take the risk." In the case of the British South Africa Company, I am not aware that they have even disputed this responsibility, or their readiness to fulfil their obligation; but then the Government comes in and interferes with them, and when the Company, which, by the way, had asked for no assistance, proposed to take a forward movement or an aggression, as it had been called, but which was really a defensive movement, as he understood it, against this Chief Lo Bengula, then the Imperial Government steps in and says, "You shall not move an inch without consulting us: you are not to take the only true method of protecting the people who look to you for protection; you are not to take the only reasonable method, which is to punish Lo Bengula for his aggressions." If the Government was going to take the responsibility of saying—"You shall not punish Lo Bengula for his aggressions," then all I can say is that in that case the Government will have a very heavy responsibility if any massacre of either native or European subjects of Her Majesty took place. I think the Government ought really to state the matter plainly for the information of the Committee. We ought to know exactly what our relation is to these Chartered Companies. Are they practically independent bodies? In that case let them take the responsibility, and then they will have no claim on this country; but if the Government resolve to interfere with the policy of the Companies, we shall be answerable for any failure of that policy. I hope we shall have a clear statement on this subject.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. Buxton, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not think the Committee will expect me on this occasion to enter at length into the question of Chartered Companies generally. We have Chartered Companies in various parts of the world. So far as the Colonial Office is concerned we have only one in any sense under our control; the Foreign Office have four or five, and I do not think it would be expedient on the present occasion that I should attempt to lay down any principle which ought to direct the Foreign Office, as well as the Colonial Office, in dealing with these Companies. But so far as the British South Africa Company is concerned, the position is that they acknowledge themselves to be entirely responsible both for the administration and the protection of the territory over which they have control, but in their Charter, as regards any question of dispute between them and the chiefs in their territory, there is a distinct clause which enables Her Majesty's Government, if they think fit, to interfere in that dispute and to forbid the Company taking a forward action, or to come to some arrangement with them in regard to that particular matter. Government are in communication with the Company in regard to the dispute with Lo Bengula, and they have made no complaint whatever in regard to the attitude Her Majesty's Government have taken up. They have declared themselves perfectly competent to look after their own protection, and they have declared themselves very well satisfied with the moral support which we have given them.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : What is the moral support ?

MR. S. BUXTON : The moral support is that we have, as regards the posts of danger in Bechuanaland, sent up more police, and we are prepared in that sense to show Lo Bengula that, as far as we are concerned, he cannot attack our territory with impunity. It has been assumed that the Company are in a position to attack Lo Bengula at the first moment. That is entirely and absolutely incorrect. The Government are, of course, bound to take an interest in the action of the Company, and what we have done so far as regards their position is simply this—we have said that at the first moment they should not make an aggressive movement on Lo Bengula without our knowledge and authority. A good deal has been said about Matabeleland and Lo Bengula and his raids, which I do not desire to defend ; but I think we ought to require two things. In the first place, these raids are no new thing, and, in the second place, as regards the raid the other day, Lo Bengula declared that he sent the impi in order to punish the Mashonas, partly on our account—because they had stolen some telegraph wires—and partly because he wanted to get back some cattle that had been stolen. I think it is quite clear that this impi did largely exceed his orders, and that they were very severely punished by a large number being killed.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (interposing) : What was the subsequent statement ?

MR. S. BUXTON : His statement was that which we have always admitted —namely, that the Mashonas were his subjects. We have always admitted that they were his subjects, and his statement that they were his slaves was another way of saying that they were under his jurisdiction. What I wanted to point out was this : at the present moment, whether as a matter of right or wrong, there can be no justification on the part of the Company for an aggressive movement which the hon. Gentleman is so anxious should be undertaken, and where also, quite apart from the rights and wrongs of the case, at the present moment they are not in a position to make it. And, so far as we are concerned, we are not going to be rushed into another South African War. We feel it is only right and just from the point of view of Imperial interests as well, I am bound to say I think of the interests of the Company themselves, that they should not by a forward movement, without proper support, be allowed to suffer some reverse which might raise a very large number of native troops throughout other parts of Africa against the white men. We are, as far as we can, desirous of ending this dispute in a peaceful way ; we are very anxious to take no more risks than we can possibly help, but at the same time the Government are fully aware of the responsibilities which they have undertaken by forbidding this forward movement. They believe that is the right policy. They know that at the present moment the Chartered Company themselves are in accordance with the action they have taken, and I can only say in the very delicate position of the question at the present moment that remarks such as those of the hon. Member are, in my opinion, very mischievous and highly inexpedient. [SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : Which remarks ?] The observations which the hon. Member used more than once, that in his opinion we ought to allow and encourage the Company to attack Lobengula whether right or wrong—[SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : I said nothing of the kind]—or whether they are likely to be successful or be defeated. These remarks are so much in accord unfortunately with the views of persons on the spot—but not with responsible people in the Company—that I fear unless a strong expression of opinion in this House is made, they may easily rush us into this war which we are very anxious to avoid. I hope, at all events, that we may be able to avoid any difficulty with Lo Bengula, and I think the hon. Gentleman ought to remember that the Company and these Colonists have been very fortunate in having had up till now a very easy and peaceful time, and I do not think on the first difficulty which arises that they ought to complain, or that they ought to call upon Her Majesty's Government to support them in their aggressive movement. We are prepared to defend the territory for which we are responsible; we are prepared to do our best to avoid difficulties of this sort, and the Company themselves declare that in their opinion they are quite prepared to meet any emergency. Therefore, as far as we are concerned, while we fully feel the responsibility of any action we may have taken in the matter, we believe that such action as we have taken has been in the interest of peace and in the interests of the company themselves, and we believe that if a difficulty arises we shall be in a proper and right position to meet and deal with it. With regard to what has been said as to further Papers on this and kindred matters, I have in the last day or two laid some Papers on the Table, which I hope will be printed and circulated in a very short time. As regards the question of Swaziland, I think hon. Members will feel that it will be more convenient to discuss that question when we reach it in the ordinary course; and if hon. Members desire to speak on it they had better do so on the special Vote instead of mixing it with other questions.

*THE CHAIRMAN (Sir J. GOLDSMID, St. Pancras, S.) called upon Sir C. Dilke, when—

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said: I desire, by way of personal explanation, to say that the Under Secretary has very considerably misrepresented what I have said. I did not advise a forward movement. I said that the Government had no right to throw all responsibility upon the Chartered Company, and at the same time forbid all offensive movement. The first I knew of the forward movement was the statement by the Government that they had distinctly forbidden a forward movement. With regard to the statement of the hon.

Gentleman, in my opinion, on the whole, not unsatisfactory, and if his answers to my questions had been in the same sense, the House would have been spared much of my remarks to-night.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that this is more than an explanation.

*SIR C. W. DILKE called attention to the action of naval officers on the Treaty shore of Newfoundland, and said it would be impossible for Parliament to impose its will upon any other Colony which had responsible and representative institutions in the manner in which it had attempted to do in the case of the self-governing Colony of Newfoundland. The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies had been reported to have said, in reply to a question, that the recent extraordinary action of the naval officers was in pursuance of a discretion conferred by Treaty. He had afterwards explained that he was misreported and had not said "Treaty." But the discretion alluded to was not contained in any Statute, and it appeared to him that the powers which were exercised by the naval officers were outside any law. Turning to the Blue Book which had recently appeared, he said that the first action taken by Lord Ripon in the matter, to judge by a telegram sent to the Colonial Government, went in the same direction as that in which the late Government had gone in their dealings with the colony, only the language was still more peremptory. In the telegram Lord Ripon threatened that Her Majesty's Government would be compelled to resort to coercive Imperial legislation. The whole question now in dispute arose out of the meaning to be attached to the words saying that we should not molest or interfere with the French fishery in the Royal declaration attached to one of the Treaties. The British contention was that we had a concurrent right of fishery on that part of the Newfoundland shore upon which the Treaty of Utrecht had given the French the right to land and dry fish. That part of the coast was an integral portion of the Colony and it returned two Members to the Colonial Legislature. It had not been until the lobster fishery commenced, in the year 1882, on the Treaty shore, that conflict arose on the French Treaty rights. In 1887 the French naval officers began to cut the nets of British fishing boats that were engaged in fishing off the Treaty shore, and to remove British lobster pots, and so did that which our Government had declared that they had no right to do. He denied that Newfoundland had been unwilling to carry out Treaty obligations, and declared that if, instead of a feeble colony, they had had to deal with an Australasian Colony, no attempt would have been made to bully the Colony or to propose Imperial coercive legislation, as had been attempted in the case of Newfoundland. He did not think that it was to the advantage of the Colony that arbitration should take place upon the limited subject to which it was confined, and as regarded which it constituted a partial admission of a monstrous claim. He did not wish to interfere with the Treaty rights, but in their protection of the French they had gone far beyond the letter of the Treaty. They had prevented their own Colonists from making use of their own country, and it was because he felt that they had gone much too far that he ventured to call the attention of the Committee to the matter.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) rose to Order.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said, there was no question of Order involved, and called upon

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central), who had risen simultaneously with Mr. Morton. The hon. Member said that, having been recently in Newfoundland, he would impress on the Government how deeply the Colonists felt upon this question, and how necessary it was to arrive at a settlement.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, that he did not intend to detain the Committee unnecessarily, but he was of opinion that they ought to protect the British citizens in Newfoundland. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. W. Lowther) had stated that the colonist desired to "rip up" the Treaty of Utrecht. That was not so. The Newfoundlanders had stated distinctly, through their Delegates who were here in 1891, that they desired and were willing, to purchase the French rights, whatever they were, at a fair price. And all that they asked of the British Government was that, as Newfoundland was a poor Colony, the British Government should lend them the money at a low rate of interest, and he (Mr. Morton) was assured that the Newfoundlanders would pay both interest and principal of such a loan. He (Mr. Morton) did not think much of the proposed Arbitration. After all, it would only decide whether a "lobster" was a fish or not, and would leave the main question undecided. On the whole, he (Mr. Morton) thought it would be just as well to drop the proposed Arbitration altogether, and to approach the French Government in a friendly manner with a view to settle the question finally by purchasing the French rights; and it was admitted that the French people had rights on the Newfoundland coast. Until that was done the "Newfoundland difficulty" would never be settled. And he (Mr. Morton) earnestly hoped that the present Government would do their best to get the matter settled. He (Mr. Morton) had by several questions called the attention of the Under Secretary of State (Mr. Buxton) to some grievances of the Newfoundlanders, but the replies were not very satisfactory. One of those matters was with regard to the naval officers acting as Magistrates in questions affecting the rights of the colonists. What the Newfoundlanders said was that they had Magistrates and Courts of their own on the land, and they objected to their citizens being tried in secret on British ships without any chance of their being properly represented or protected by publicity. He (Mr. Morton) hoped that the Government would in this matter allow the colony complete Home Rule. Then there was the question of Admiral Sir B. Walker, and the compensation cases. He was informed that the Admiral had evaded service of the writs which had been issued against him. That, if correct, was a disgraceful state of things, and should not be allowed by the British Government to exist for a single day. Surely the British Government could appoint some respectable solicitor at St. John's to accept service of these writs, and allow the Supreme Court to hear and settle these cases. In this, as in other matters, he (Mr. Morton) hoped that the Colonial Office would do their best to remove the grievances which were properly complained of, and do justice to our oldest colony.

Sir C. W. Dilke

*SIR J. GOLDSMID said, as he understood the matter, there were three points of complaint. The Colonists complained that the Government here had decided against them without fairly considering the position of affairs; that by the Treaty the French had the right to put up temporary buildings only for the purpose of curing cod, whereas they had put up most substantial factories in order to do something else; and further, that the British Government did not protect them against the French, who destroyed the nets and implements of the local fishermen, although they had at least equal rights with the French to fish for crustacea as well as for cod. He thought the Admiralty might easily give instructions to the Naval Officers to prevent the French from taking the law into their own hands. He could not see the object of arbitration. What was the point for arbitration? Was it whether a lobster was a fish? If that were determined, how would it settle the dispute? He agreed with much of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. W. Dilke), and he thought it was only fair to the Colonials that they should be consulted with reference to what should be done in these matters affecting themselves.

MR. S. BUXTON: Three points have been raised, and I shall deal with them in their order. With regard to the objection as to Justices of the Peace for the Colony, they were appointed at the request of the Colony; and as soon as the Colony is able to appoint local Justices, the Government will be glad to relieve these officers from a position which they do not desire. In many parts of Newfoundland they have been of great advantage to the inhabitants, who have approved of the bulk of their actions. We cannot now go back, and we are bound by the Acts that previous Governments have for many years passed. As to the question of coercing the Newfoundlanders, I can only say that England has always sympathised with their difficulties, and has made attempts in a sympathetic and liberal spirit to meet their views. In 1857, in 1864, and in 1874 action was taken, and the difficulty with France as nearly as possible concluded; but, unfortunately, the Newfoundlanders rejected our proposals, and no settlement was arrived at. As to the question of the particular matter to which the permanent Act will apply, I admit to the full it is a limited reference which goes to the Board of Arbitrators; and I think every one of us—certainly Her Majesty's Government—would be only too delighted if every one of these difficult and anomalous French Treaty questions could be referred to arbitration and settled by definition. Unfortunately you cannot go to arbitration unless both sides are prepared to do so. The late Government more than once approached the French Government with a view to seeing if all the questions at issue would not admit of arbitration. The French Government, however, have refused to arbitrate on all the points, and I think we shall all agree that the present moment is not at all a favourable one to meet the French Government with a view to complete arbitration. That being so, and the position being an anomalous one, it appears to me better to have these small questions arbitrated upon than to allow them to add to the friction already existing. I can only say that we have endeavoured, and will still endeavour, to meet the Newfoundland Government in the most friendly spirit we possibly can. The Despatch referred to, which I am glad to think the hon. Member regards as an advance in the right direction, was written with a view to getting them to send a delegation over here to discuss the question, and to show that we, as far as we could, consistently with Treaty rights, were ready to meet them in regard to their own local matters. We trust that they will endeavour to meet us in the same spirit, so that this section of the matter may be removed as one source of friction with France. That is the position so far as we are concerned. We are anxious to settle this section of the matter.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON said, that during the five years he was Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs this question had constantly occupied the attention of the Government. Nothing could be a greater mistake than that which appeared to dwell in the mind of the hon. Member for Peterborough—namely, that the late Government—and he supposed he could speak also for the present Government—were in any way indifferent to this question, because Newfoundland was not one of the largest Colonies, or its people one of the most numerous and best able to make their voices heard. On the contrary, this question had occupied an amount of attention out of all proportion to its magnitude and the size of the Colony, or the interests involved. As the Under Secretary of State had said, it was a matter of great difficulty with which, after all, two great Powers were concerned, each tenacious of the privileges and rights of its subjects, involving questions as to which there was considerable difference of legal interpretation. He had been surprised at the remarks of the hon. Member, but he had been still more surprised to hear from the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. W. Dilke), who had had large experience in connection with foreign affairs, and who, he freely admitted, was a very considerable authority on many points of foreign affairs, arguments which showed such a total disregard of the rights and susceptibilities of other Powers. When the right hon. Baronet deprecated arbitration and said that we had the rights of our Colonies to protect, and that they should be left to manage their own affairs, was it possible that he was ignorant of, or indifferent to, the position of the French Government on this question? How was it possible that one nation—still less a colony of a nation—could judge its own cause? Where there was an International difference for one Power to say—"These are our rights, and these we will maintain," is nothing less than saying—"We will go to war unless our view is accepted." Was it to be supposed that the French Government would tolerate an assertion by us of the right of the Colonists of Newfoundland to say what was the interpretation to be placed upon certain Treaties, and to what extent they would carry them out? It was evident that the responsibility rested with the Power who made the Treaties, and that it was the duty of that Power to see that they were carried out. The British Governments had been far from indifferent to the susceptibilities of the Colonists. They had run considerable risks of difficulty with the French Government, and he was bound to say that the French Government had been forbearing in the matter. To say that we could permit a Colony to ignore obligations under which it lay, to interpret a Treaty for itself and disregard the rights of France under that Treaty, seemed to him to ignore and disregard the plainest principles of International Law. The hon. Member for Peterborough said—"Why go into arbitration about the matter of lobsters?" There were a school of politicians who said—"We ought to go to arbitration upon all matters of International difference;" but when it came to any particular point that had to be arbitrated upon they said—"You have no need to go to arbitration." It was perfectly impossible to contend on the one hand that arbitration was the course in all cases of difficulty, and then to decline to go to arbitration because it did not suit them to do so.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I never said that.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: But the hon. Member said that some way of settling the matter ought to be found with the French Government. Well, the only way of settling a dispute was to go to an International tribunal, and that Her Majesty's Government had been willing to do. But here arose the difficulty. They had to consider the limits and grounds of arbitration. Neither Power was willing to refer to arbitration what it regarded as sovereign rights. The French asserted their right to something like concurrent possession of the Treaty shore with ourselves, and to build salmon weirs on the streams—they did build them, in fact, and they had to be removed. The French would like us to refer to arbitration whether they had a right to do such things, and whether they possessed concurrent rights on the Treaty shore. This we could not allow. Neither would the French Government submit to arbitration matters they considered to be their undoubted rights under the Treaty, consequently the Reference had to be narrowed to the limits we had stated. Nevertheless, there were some questions of principle here involved, because, if the curing of lobsters, which was not an established practice when the Treaty was entered into, lay within the right of "drying fish," then it might follow that the necessary buildings must be put up for the purpose. A good deal depended on that question. He had only risen to point out how vain and futile it was to say that they could leave to the Colonies the right to settle affairs that were matters of International arbitration. We could not deal in amity with a foreign Power with whom we had contracted International Treaty engagements were we not to charge ourselves with the fulfilment of those Treaty obligations, and were we not ready to settle by arbitration matters we could not settle by diplomacy.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was unable to agree with the strictly official view put before the Committee by his right hon. Friend opposite. The right hon. Gentleman was bound by his responsibilities to support the view taken by successive Governments, and to accept the view which had been stated to the Committee by the Under Secretary. When he (Mr. J. Chamberlain) was in America, dealing with a fishery question of a different kind, he had had the opportunity of making the acquaintance of some of the foremost Representatives of the Colony of Newfoundland. He had entered into conversation with them on this subject, and had learned a great deal about it. He confessed he had come to the conclusion which had been so well stated to the Committee by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean. Those who heard the right hon. Baronet would say that these discussions in Supply were not purely obstructive. The right hon. Gentleman had given an account of this dispute with regard to the lobster fishery on the Treaty coast of Newfoundland, which had been accepted by the Under Secretary of State as substantially correct; and what was the conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman drew from the statement—a conclusion which must have been accepted by everyone who heard him, and who, at the same time, was prepared to accept his facts as correct? It was that the French had extended their rights under the original Treaty and under the King's Declaration until they were now claiming more than either in equity or in law they were entitled to. The Newfoundlanders, according to the right hon. Baronet, were absolutely right in their contention. What was to be done? It was suggested by the Government that they should be forced to arbitration because the Colony would not go willingly. The right hon. Baronet said there were certain questions affecting territorial rights which were not fair subjects for arbitration. "Suppose," he said, "the French claimed a Treaty shore on the Isle of Wight, would you go to arbitration on a claim of that kind? Clearly not. Why should you go," said the right hon. Member, "to arbitration on a similar question because it happens to affect a Colony?" Under these circumstances, they arrived at this conclusion—that, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, they could not admit the claim of the French—they could not go to arbitration. What was the alternative? Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to go to war? Really, this was very important. This question had been raised by two supporters of the Government who belonged to the New Radical Party. Whenever people came forward to defend the rights of the Empire, and the property of the Empire, they were accused of being Jingoës at once; but here were two hon. Members, belonging to the New Radical Party, who pressed on the Government a course of action which meant war if it meant anything.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: If it is put to me as a question, I say we have no demand at all to make on the French. We have simply to remain in possession of the rights which we have. If he asks me whether I think there is any risk of war in that I say no.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had not asked any question of the right hon. Baronet; but he was prepared to give way to him at any moment he desired to make a further statement. As he had said, he was in agreement with the right hon. Baronet; but he wanted to have a clear understanding as to the position of the new Radical Party on the question of Treaty rights, for it seemed to him that it must inevitably lead them into war. The right hon. Baronet said it would not lead to war, but that was simply the right hon. Gentleman's ipse dixit. It would not lead to war if the French Government gave way; but how did the right hon. Baronet know that they would give way? What authority had he to speak for the French Government? He said we had no demand to make on them, but at the present moment French officers were cutting the nets of our people, they were preventing the establishment of railways and of local communication, and interfering in many ways with the territorial right of our Colonists. And were we to sit still? "No," said the right hon. Baronet, "we were to give instructions to our Naval officers to prevent the French from doing these things." But what would be the result of that? War. ["No, no!"] It was absurd for the right hon. Member to interrupt him and to say that it did not mean war with France. What was the alternative? It was repression—to say to the Newfoundlanders—"You are a small Colony; you do not interest us. It is true you are the oldest of the British Colonies; but as a pecuniary matter, if we strike a balance, we shall not be the gainers by your possession; and under the circumstances, if you do not take our advice and give way to the French, though we admit that you are right and the French are wrong, we will not protect you, and you must work out this question for yourselves." This was really a most important question, on which it was well he should clear their minds of cant, and to have a clear notion of what their policy should be. This was a case in which his right hon. Friend would, he thought, be prepared to say—"Our honour in this matter is concerned, and we are bound to accept even the risk of war in protecting our Newfoundland Colonists." If the right hon. Gentleman said that, he would not say that he (Mr. J. Chamberlain) should not be inclined to support him; but, then, do not let the new Radical Party accuse him and his friends of being jingoes. The other alternative was to say to the Colony—"Go, in Heaven's name, and settle affairs with the French!" That was the position taken up by the hon. Member behind him.

MR. A. C. MORTON: No, no!

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, he did not know whether the hon. Member's desire was to repeat his statement.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he objected to what the right hon. Gentleman was saying about him. He (Mr. Morton) had stated in his speech that what he desired was that they should approach the French Government in a friendly way with a view to purchasing their rights. He had said that the people of Newfoundland had stated distinctly that they were willing to pay for these rights.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, the proposals of these amateur diplomatists were most ridiculous. The view now put was not that put by the hon. Member in his original speech.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he had put that view.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, the hon. Member proposed that they should approach the French Government in a friendly way and say—"You are absolutely wrong; you have no rights. Now, what will you take for your rights?" It was well-known that the French would not sell their rights; but if they were prepared to do so, it was equally certain that any price they put on them would be much larger than Newfoundland could afford to pay. Newfoundland was a miserably poor Colony, with a population of 300,000 or 400,000. But did the hon. Member propose to put the expenditure on the British taxpayer? They had seen no inclination on the part of the new Radical Party to spare the British taxpayer; but he confessed it would be another thing to be carried to their credit if they required Parliament to pay for the extinction of rights which did not exist. This discussion threw light on many interesting questions. It threw light on the foreign policy of the new Radical Party and on their self-governing legislative policy and their policy with regard to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament and the veto of the Crown. In the case of Newfoundland there was an undoubted and unimpaired and indefeasible supremacy of the British Crown; the Imperial Parliament had a veto over the legislation of the Colony, and yet here was a case in which a small Colony refused to carry out the Treaty engagements of the Imperial Power, and the right hon. Baronet said that he and a great number of his friends would do everything in their power to prevent the Imperial Parliament from exercising the supremacy of the British Crown and from vetoing the concurrent legislation of the Colony.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: I am loth to interrupt my right hon. Friend, even when he refers to me as speaking for the new Radical Party, though I have spoken simply for myself. I repudiate the suggestion that I would back up the Colony in refusing to carry out Treaty engagements.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was well aware that the right hon. Baronet contended that the French had no Treaty right, and that they were wrong in their claim. But the position of the Government was the reverse of that. They admitted the claim of the French as a subject of contention which they were willing to submit to arbitration. How was supremacy to be exercised over Newfoundland when they found a powerful Party led by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean ready to use all the Forms of the House to prevent it?

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he wished to repudiate a great deal that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had said. He believed that the French had Treaty rights; so did the Colonists, and they had no desire to rip up the Treaty. They were willing to buy the French out. With regard to the practicability of this purchase, the right hon. Gentleman ought to know that the United States purchased two of their present States—one from France and one from Spain—and that within recent years they had bought a large tract of territory from Russia. Surely the British Government could do something of the same sort. [Cries of "Divide!"] It was nonsense to talk of the "new Radical Party" as desiring to carry out a Jingo policy. They had no such desire. What he desired was that whatever rights the French had we should purchase. There was no question of war in the matter, because all these things could be settled if the Government wished it in an amicable manner. [Cries of "Divide!"] The Under Secretary had said that the cases he (Mr. Morton) had brought under the notice of the Colonial Government were mares' nests; but judging from the reply of the hon. Member he, at least, did not seem to think so. The people of Newfoundland did not think so. It had been admitted that there was something in some of the cases; but it was contended that the matter could only be settled by the Government. This was, unfortunately, the way in which the Colonial Office had generally treated the Colony. Whatever complaints were made they were almost always said to be "mares' nests," and until they could induce the Colonial Office to adopt a better mode of dealing with the questions, difficulties would be constantly arising. [Cries of "Divide!"] He contended that it was the duty of the Colonial Office to arrange with the British Admiral as to accepting service of writs. He (Mr. Morton) had a letter from a Member of the Assembly of Newfoundland, in which he stated that he had taken out a writ against Sir Baldwin Walker, but had been unable to serve it because he had left the country. Six other cases had been sent to him, in one of which the claim was for 2,000 dollars; but Sir Baldwin Walker, although he had been in the country, had evaded the service of the writ by only coming on shore on Sunday, and getting away to his ship before the time at which the writ could be legally served. He (Mr. Morton) did not wish to concern himself in any dispute between the Colonial Office and the Admiralty; but he trusted that care would be taken to appoint someone in Newfoundland to accept service of the writs. ["Divide!"]

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The discussion which has taken place has been no doubt interesting and important; but I think it will be felt that it has now reached its natural termination. [Cries of "Oh!"] I understand there are still several questions to be raised under the Vote in regard to other Colonies than those that have been dealt with, and I think the Government might now consent to report Progress. [Cries of "No!"] I beg to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope the Committee will be disposed to sit a little longer. I believe that the other subjects to be discussed will not take long, and seeing that the Government have obtained only two Votes in the past two days—the Home Office Vote yesterday, and the Vote for the Foreign Office to-day—I think the House should go on a little longer. [Cries of "No!"] Do hon. Members opposite think that one Vote a day is a satisfactory rate of doing the large amount of work yet before them?

In these circumstances, I think we should go on with Supply.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The right hon. Gentleman appears to think that the time which has been occupied on this and the preceding Votes had been unreasonably long. If he will look back at the record of the proceedings of previous Parliaments he will find that, by comparison, the time which has been occupied on these Votes has been extremely limited. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that two days for discussion on the Home Office and Foreign Office Votes is a very limited amount of time compared with that occupied on those Votes last year. The Foreign Office Vote, which has been closed after four hours' discussion, has usually taken two nights; and it must not be forgotten that we have yet to discuss the Report of the Supply taken last night. There are many important questions to be raised on the Votes, and it is only in Supply that Members find their opportunity of criticising the policy of the Government. I do not think there is any desire to discuss unimportant Votes at undue length. All we ask is that discussion shall not be cut short by the arbitrary action of the Government.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : Dealing only with our discussion to-night, I would point out that at least two or three of the important questions which have come before us have been raised by the right hon. Gentleman's own side. I would also point out that Members—notably the hon. Member for Camberwell—who sit on the Liberal side of the House, who have given notice of their intention to bring forward certain matters under the Foreign Office Vote, have left the House under the impression that there will certainly be no opportunity of discussing them after 1 o'clock in the morning. One question to be raised of which I know something myself has to do with the Bahamas. I think that out of courtesy to hon. Gentlemen who have put down these notices we should not attempt to proceed with the Votes at this hour. When we were discussing the conduct of business, the Prime Minister, in answer to a statement of mine, which was to the effect that under the new Rule it was intended by the Government that we should sit up every night until 1 o'clock in the morning, distinctly repudiated any such idea. My right hon. Friend has spoken as though we were only going at the rate of one Vote a day. I would point out that on Tuesday the Government obtained no fewer than five Votes, in addition to which they have since obtained the whole of the Home Office Vote, the Foreign Office Vote, and have now pretty well got through the Colonial Vote. Most important questions have been discussed, including Siam, Madagascar, and the raids of the Matabele. Any one of these subjects at an earlier period of the Session would have been good enough for two days at least, whereas we have got rid of half-a-dozen in a few hours. Any reasonable person who takes note of the number of important subjects which have been discussed during the past two days will at once be ready to admit that no time has been wasted. The Government may do what they please, but they cannot get this Vote. In view of the Opposition, it will only be putting the House to unnecessary trouble if the Government force us to go to a Division.

SIR W. HARCOURT : The right hon. Member for West Birmingham a short time ago expressed his desire to bring forward the question of the Bahamas. All that the Government desires is that the right hon. Gentleman will bring that question forward now.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : Not at 1 o'clock in the morning.

COMMANDER BETHELL said, he did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was aware of the fact that the hon. Member who intended to raise the question of the Bahamas was not present. He had gone away, believing that the Vote now under discussion would not be passed to-night. He (Commander Bethell) and other Members had understood that after the question of Newfoundland had been dealt with Progress would be reported. He would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accede to that course.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : Do the Government propose to take the postponed Resolution relating to the House of Lords to-night?

SIR W. HARCOURT : Yes.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: That will occupy some time.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 133.—(Division List, No. 297.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested that the Motion with reference to which notice had been given should be brought on to-night. I have already pointed out that, as regards the Motion in which one of the right hon. Gentleman's own supporters are interested, it is impossible for that gentleman to bring it forward, because he has gone home. As regards the matter that I am concerned with, no doubt its discussion will not occupy much time, but it is a subject when there could by no possibility be any reference to it in the public Press. The matter concerns the administration of justice in the Bahamas, and it is a subject that is of intense interest to the Colony, at all events, and which cannot be reported in the Press at such an hour. At all events, I do not choose to let it come forward without the possibility of its being reported. It is now 25 minutes past 1, and the Government have still, by the necessities of the case, to deal with the Report of Supply, including the matter on which they sustained a defeat the other night. I think it is asking too much that we should proceed with the ordinary work of Supply. Understandings entered into with the Prime Minister appear to me not to be worth anything at all. He goes away—"Oh, oh!"—and his Lieutenants will not keep his engagements. ["Oh, oh!"] But I will not press that point. I quite understand that the tactics of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer are part of the policy of bullying the House of Commons. Well, we have resisted that before, and I shall continue to resist it to the end. Under any circumstances I beg to move that you, Sir, do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. J. Chamberlain.)

SIR W. HARCOURT: I will not discuss the question in the tone adopted by the right hon. Gentleman, who says he does not choose to let the Committee discuss a certain subject. Whose language, I should like to ask, is the language of "bullying?" The right hon. Gentleman's is not the tone that I hope any gentleman uses on these Benches. I only ask, in the interests of all parts of the House, and in view of the late period of the Session, that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen should do what they can to facilitate the despatch of Public Business. The right hon. Gentleman admits that the question on which he desires to speak will only occupy a short time, and it seems to me, therefore, that his only fear is lest posterity should lose the benefit of the speech he is prepared to make. That is, no doubt, a very important matter. I should be very sorry that future generations should not be able to study that oration. In former times we used to consider 1 o'clock an early hour, and I am told that in another place, where they are not so anxious about the preservation of their orations, they are still debating. If the House of Commons considers itself physically weaker than the House of Lords, and is so much more solicitous about the reporting of its speeches, it will be useless to protract this struggle, and I do not propose to do so. I would, however, express a hope that on other occasions these questions will be approached in a different spirit from that adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I entirely share the wish of the right hon. Gentleman that questions of this kind will hereafter be treated in a different spirit. As the right hon. Gentleman has given way I will not follow him in his extremely insolent remarks. [Cries of "Withdraw!"]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I rise to Order. I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in describing the observations made by a Member as "insolent remarks?"

*THE CHAIRMAN: I did not hear the words. If the right hon. Gentleman did use them they are not Parliamentary, and I think the right hon. Gentleman will see the necessity of withdrawing them.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I have great pleasure in withdrawing the expression, in accordance with your ruling, and I will substitute another word which has been admitted to be in Order, and say, instead of insolent remarks, venomous observations. I must protest—[Cries of "Divide !"—]—against the misrepresentation of my language ; and again I say that to treat a question which is of the greatest importance and interest to one of our Colonies—[Cries of "Divide !"—]—at half-past 1—["Divide !"—]—when there can be—["Divide !"—]—I say to treat the affairs of an important Colony—["Divide !"—]—I say to allow—["Divide !"—]

*THE CHAIRMAN : Order, order !

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : To allow a matter which interests an important Colony—["Divide !"—]—to be discussed at half-past 1 in the morning, is to show great want of respect to that Colony.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow ; Committee also report Progress ; to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [6th September] reported.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS II.

"That a sum, not exceeding £56,697, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department and Subordinate Offices."

Resolution agreed to.

SUPPLY [5th September]—REPORT.

Order read, for resuming Consideration of Postponed Resolution,

Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had intended to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he could not see his way to postpone the consideration of this Order to next Monday. If the right hon. Gentleman had seen his way to do so he would have complied with the wish of a large number of his supporters in the House. There was a feeling abroad that the subject of this Vote required a great deal of discussion, and that it was ridiculous for this popular Assembly to supply the means to "another place" to enable it to defy and impede their legislation. He believed that though they might not be able to do it this Session, the time was not far distant when the feeling to which he referred would assert itself by Constitutional methods, and the infringement of the liberty of the people would be resented by cutting off the Supplies. In view of the late hour and the late period of the Session, and of the other business the Government had to do before they broke up for the short vacation, he did not propose to enter at length into the subject to-night. At the same time, he did not think he would be doing his duty if he allowed the Vote to pass without attempting further to reduce it. Though they carried a reduction in the salary of the Clerk of the Parliaments by £500 the other evening, there was a strong feeling that this official was not the worst feature in the long list of sinecurists in the House of Lords, and that the case of "Black Rod" was even worse. In addition to the salary he received as Black Rod, this gentleman was on the Pension List as a retired Admiral, and was furnished with an official residence.

SIR W. HARCOURT rose to Order. It was not at this stage possible to move a further reduction of the Vote without re-committing the Vote.

MR. SPEAKER : The Question is "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution." That Question having been proposed, no further reduction can be moved.

MR. SEXTON : In view of that, Mr. Speaker, I take it that my hon. Friend would effect the purpose he had in view by dividing against the whole Vote.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had consulted what he had thought was a considerable authority on the subject, and had been told that he would be in Order in moving a reduction; but as Mr. Speaker had ruled him out of Order—

SIR W. HARCOURT: He has not ruled that.

MR. SPEAKER: A reduction can be moved to a Vote on Report; but in this case no Notice of Motion had been given, and no hon. Member rose to move; therefore I put the Question, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was sorry he had not announced his intention to the Speaker. He, however, was willing to accept the situation as it stood. He would adopt the suggestion of his hon. Friend, and signify his protest by opposing the entire Vote.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH said, he thought it was understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make a statement as to the course it was intended to take with regard to the reduction carried upon this Vote in Committee.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think there is any course to take except to agree to the Report on the Vote as it was passed the other night. I have been in communication with the House of Lords to see what can be done in reference to the Vote. I hope that some arrangement may be made; but I am not able at present to say whether it will be possible. All that I am at present able to say is that we must take the Vote as passed in Committee.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he had great pleasure in supporting the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor.) They had stood a great deal during the past few months in the shape of threats from the House of Lords, and now he thought was the time when they must do something more than merely remonstrate. It would be understood that the Division would be taken as a protest against interference with the rights of the people on the part of the House of Lords, and not that it was intended to deprive the officers of that House of any salaries or wages that might be their due.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Government must support the Vote. It may or may not be that this House will ever come into conflict with the other House of Parliament. If it does, this is not the way in which the battle will be fought. If we have differences to settle with the House of Lords, they must be settled in a very different manner to reducing the Votes for Clerks. The Vote was reduced the other night on the ground that the salaries of the Clerks in the House of Lords were too heavy, a view that hon. Members may hold very fairly. But I must protest against the notion that if we have a Constitutional issue between the House of Commons and the House of Lords it can be fought on such a battle-field as a Vote for the salaries of Clerks.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): We who are Irish Members consider first our duty to the people of Ireland. I cannot forget that before the Home Rule Bill was drawn and introduced into this House the Leader of the House had the audacity to declare in public that the Bill, whatever it might be, would be rejected by the House of Lords. In face of that declaration, I consider that any opportunity for attacking that institution in any form is most opportune.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) said, he wished to point out to the hon. Member for Peterborough, who had said that he had no wish to deprive any officers of the House of Lords of the salaries due to them, that if he supported the Motion the hon. Member would refuse payment of all salaries whatever.

MR. A. C. MORTON: No; we have given a large amount on account.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS wished to say that when the proper time arrived he would be prepared to take his share in any conflict with the other House if the necessity arose, but he agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that that conflict should be fought out in some different fashion than that now proposed.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): It is useless to argue with hon. Gentlemen who take the line that on account of political differences with the House of Lords they would refuse to vote money towards its establishment. But I would ask the House generally to consider the somewhat undignified position the House would place itself in if it adopts this Motion. Some time ago objections were raised to the salaries of the officers of the House of Lords, and a Committee of the Lords was appointed by the late Government to consider the matter. The House of Lords freely entered into the feelings of this House and proceeded to reduce the salaries to the scale of the salaries of this House—[Cries of "No!"—I think it will be found that reductions amounting to £7,000 have been made in the House of Lords, and on the expiry of the tenure of the present holders of the office the salaries will be reduced to the same scale as the salaries of corresponding officers in this House. I think that every Member who desires to maintain the honour and dignity of the House will vote against the Motion now before us.

*MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): As I object to voting a single sixpence to the House of Lords for any purpose or under any conditions, I will most cheerfully support my hon. Friend opposite if he goes to a Division.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough) said, that as the Representative of an agricultural constituency, if the Motion went to a Division he would consider it his duty in the interests of his constituents to protest against the House of Lords by voting for the Motion.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 96 ; Noes 63.—(Division List, No. 298.)

SCIENCE EXAMINATIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY asked the Lord President of the Council whether the Science and Art Department would reconsider the exclusive system of payment by results of examination, in view of the recent effects of that system and the general dissatisfaction of science teachers, and would adopt that in use in the Education Department of fixed grants for scholars properly attending and instructed, supplemented by a system of rewards for those who show especial merit? He said, that the present system of the Science and Art Department—of payment by results for individual scholars—pressed very hardly on the teachers in the schools, who were not in that way adequately rewarded, because it, of course, cost as much to teach stupid boys as clever ones, and the Department always had the power to greatly raise the standard for passing, as he believed had been done this year.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): The aid of the Department is not granted exclusively on a system of payment by results of examination. On the contrary, a capitation grant is made to both day and night organised science schools, provided that the scholar on whose account the grant is claimed has made 250 attendances in the case of the day school and 60 in the case of the night school, and passes in a subject of science or obtains a higher success in a subject in which he has already passed. But the Department is aware of the need of some modifications in the present system of aid, and it is hoped that as the Local Authorities under the Technical Instruction Act get their schools and work better organised the Department may be able after a time to extend its capitation and fixed grants in lieu in part of payments by results; but this must be a work of time. I hope that answer will be satisfactory to the right rev. Prelate.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY said, he wished to thank the noble Earl for the answer he had given; but, although the grant was called capitation, he would point out that it was really only given for the scholars who passed with success. They must pass in one science, and got nothing unless they succeeded in passing the examination. It was, therefore, a system exclusively of results. He begged to give notice that he would draw attention to the subject at an early day.

SHOP HOURS ACT (1892) AMENDMENT
(No. 2) BILL.—(No. 256.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD PLAYFAIR said, this was a purely technical Bill. It had passed through the other House without opposition and without a single Amendment, and he hoped their Lordships would give it a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Playfair.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

FERTILISERS AND FEEDING STUFFS
BILL.—(No. 263.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order), with the Amendments.

LORD RIBBLESDALE moved formal Amendments, which had been agreed to in Standing Committee.

Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT (PLUM-STEAD AND HACKNEY) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD MONKSWELL said, this Bill had passed through the House of Commons. It was not contentious, and merely proposed to make two united parishes separate Local Government Districts, on the ground that they ought to have complete control and management of their own accounts.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Monkswell.)

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed for Tuesday next.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 265.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED

[FOURTH NIGHT.]

Order of the Day for resuming the Debate on the Amendment to the Motion for the Second Reading, read.

Debate resumed accordingly.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK : My Lords, when I see the serried ranks in this Assembly it is obvious that a great question is under discussion, and it is more obvious, when I see the crowded Benches on that side and on this, that this is no Party question, but a question which concerns the interests of the whole country, and on which every patriot is called upon and is bound to give an opinion. Much has been said upon the dispute which has taken place in the Liberal Party on the occasion of the introduction of this Bill. Far be it from me to impute motives of unconscientiousness to one side or the other ; but there are circumstances connected with the change which I think invite attention. When people are converted in battalions and platoons it causes some suspicion ; and therefore it is that it has not been for the first time that the name of the great magician who effected the wonderful transformation has been brought into a somewhat prominent position. And when it is complained that remarks are made with respect to that remarkable man, it may be said that he has been the one great central figure who has appeared throughout the whole of this controversy, working and continuing to work in circumstances which must excite our wonder as to his physical capacity, as well as his intellectual power. My Lords, he has been the Colossus, and though far be it from me to say anything as to those who have told us how they came to be converted from their own independent opinion, yet I cannot help thinking that he was the Colossus who bestrode that narrow world, or that Liberal world elsewhere, and though it may be that a portion of his Party were not influenced by him, yet I think it is perfectly clear that, in the words of Shakspeare—

"The petty men
Walked under his huge legs and turned about
To find themselves"— in a majority. I will not use the painful words with which that quotation ends. But, as a matter of fact, the change appeared to be coincident with the change of a minority into a majority and with the exclusion from Office into the possession of it. We have been taunted with taking a pessimistic view of the Irish character. I am not going to dispute whether the optimistic or the pessimistic view is the right one ; but it is clear that you must take men upon their own statement as well as upon the statement which those who have been concerned with them have made of them ; and after all, in all concerns and transactions of life, the question of character is one which is a matter of reputation, and which is entered into in every case in which you may put persons in a position of trust. The confessions which we have had have been very interesting. We had my noble Friend (Lord Ribblesdale) coming forward to give a most extraordinary account of his conversion. His was a conversion apparently not caused by repentance for his own sins, but the sins which he confessed for others. He made full confession of our sins, but he made small of his own. He said he was influenced by the fact that the majority of the Irish Members continued the same after the Government had had six years of power, and that, therefore, because in those six years no change took place all hope of proceeding was at an end, all hope of treating the Irish in any way but the one he now adopts, though there is no greater security for the remedy he proposes being operative. The other case is that of the noble Earl the First Lord of the Admiralty (Earl Spencer), who told us that he began to have doubts in 1885. I do not think that his conversion was complete at that time—that he had found salvation. But, though he began to have doubts, he was at that time an advocate, I will not say for violent coercion, but for exceptional laws up to the beginning of 1886, within a few weeks of the time he took office. In May, 1884, at Belfast the noble Earl said that English statesmen and the English nation would face their enemy with a determination not to be beaten, and would not give up one point or idea in order to maintain the united Parliament of England and the Sovereignty of the Queen; "I say this," he continued, "not only to the English and Scottish nations, but to the Irish nation." Does the noble Earl mean to say that he had in his mind at that moment anything but the Repeal of the Union? He was dealing with men who were against the Sovereignty of England and of the Queen; he was speaking of men who were Republicans, who were looking forward to a Fenian Republic in Ireland, and he knows that there is not one of the men whom he now proposes to put in trust who was not acting in combination with them and receiving their active encouragement and support. But even in 1886, within a few weeks of taking Office, he said that if the clauses against intimidation were given up the power of the National League and intimidation would increase to an enormous extent, and "the liberty of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland would be destroyed." Which subjects? The liberty of those to whom you say now you are going to give unlimited liberty, or those whom you are going to put in the position of being oppressed by those to whom you give that liberty? He added, that it was essential for a policy to be pursued by which law and order would be restored and maintained in Ireland. Last night Lord Rosebery told us that he had then come to the conclusion that there ought to be no more exceptional laws, though Lord Spencer, who knew Ireland, felt that there must be such laws in order both to restore and maintain order; and said you could not rely on any ordinary jury in Leinster, Munster, or Connaught. These were the terms in which the noble Earl in charge of the Bill spoke at the beginning of 1886, within a few weeks of the time when we were called upon to deal with the Bill of that year. Now, the conversion was said to have taken place—in consequence of what? Because the Conservatives were in a minority at a period when it was absolutely impossible for them to renew any Coercion Act, or any exceptional law, because there was no time to do it. But they went to the country, and when they came back in 1886 it is notorious that if there was that fear for a short time there was not only the intention to bring forward, but there was the preparation of measures, in order to take care that law and order should be preserved in Ireland. We have heard something to the effect that inducements were held out. Where is the proof? Who has been selected as the agent of the Tory Party? Who has been the person who is supposed to have combined with them? It has been denied by a man of the highest honour, one who has gone from among us, and no one I imagine will impeach the chivalrous truthfulness of the late Lord Carnarvon. It has been denied by Mr. Balfour in the other House in terms which should have convinced anyone, and even yet we find that the Prime Minister has taken upon himself more than once to repeat the insinuation, if he does not state it as a fact. The noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery) who spoke last night with so much humour, and good humour and candour, said that he would not enter into the details of the Bill, but that he would examine the principle. What is the principle of this Bill? It is a separate Legislature for Ireland. I will not call it a Parliament if noble Lords opposite do not like; but do you suppose you are going to have a Legislature in Ireland with power to enact laws, and that it will not swell into a Parliament? It is a view that is too comical; it is too absurd. I, for my part, will never hesitate to express my opinion that, though it may be most important to examine the details of the Bill to show how insoluble the problem is, the very fact of establishing a separate Legislature in Ireland gives up everything, because it puts powers into the hands of men who, while they have been without a Parliament, have been endeavouring to put themselves into the possession of power for certain purposes, and who when they have a Parliament will, undoubtedly, make use of it for the extension of their schemes to the utmost—for the object which they have in view. Mr. John Stuart Mill said that an absolute or qualified separation of the two countries would be a dishonour to the one and a serious misfortune to both. I hold that opinion very strongly. Then Mr. John Bright said (and I agree with him)—

“It is not a question of more or less; I am against the establishment of a separate Legislature in Ireland, because all the consequences will follow, whatever restrictions you may put upon them.”

When we come to the Bill itself, it is the produce of the wit of man after seven years of incubation. It has been altered again and again while it has been before Parliament during this year. We were told that the Bill of 1886 was dead; that it had no life during the seven years. In the meantime, we have had no Bill before the country—only the question whether there should be a Legislature in Ireland or not, and that mixed up with a number of other questions. In its details this Bill, although it is the last, is, in my opinion, the worst that has been before us—the last and the worst. The great master and magician of finance, whose speeches on finance have been the admiration of the world, produced a scheme which, when it came to be examined, was found to be wrong in its calculations to the extent of £350,000. It was promised that there should be justice and equity in finance. I have heard no answer to the speech of my noble Friend (Viscount Cross) the other night, proving to demonstration that no less than £750,000 was handed over to the Irish to buy our own degradation and submission to them. It is difficult to talk of these things coolly, they are matters of serious import; and it has to be—if I may use a coarse expression—rubbed into the minds of the people of Great Britain that the Irish are not able to start on their career without putting their hands into our pockets, and being paid by us for the degradation of Great Britain. And then we were to get rid of friction. Why, the friction will be greater than ever. Anyone who has had much to do with the Treasury knows that it is not easy to get on with. When they have a Treasury in Ireland, will there not be friction between the two Treasuries in carrying out the terms of this Bill? Even although they might not be unjust in themselves, there may be a good deal to make the hair of the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer stand on end in dealing with the British Treasury, as that of English officials often does. There is no finality in the scheme of the Bill, as it is to be revised at the end of six years; and under what circumstances is it likely to be revised? With regard to the land, there is now an abandonment of the second Bill which was brought in in 1886, and of promises that were made by the noble Earl (Earl Spencer), by Mr. Morley, and in the most emphatic terms by Mr. Gladstone. The Prime Minister always guards himself in what he says, and when his attention was called to what he had said about obligations of honour, he said it was an obligation with respect to facts and circumstances which were then existing. I know he did say “the sands are running out”; but an obligation of honour depends upon its justice and equity, and not upon its acceptance or non-acceptance at a given time. The offer was founded on the strength of the claim that the Land Question should be dealt with here and should not be left to the Irish Legislature. I am told—but I have not been able to verify the statement by reference to Hansard—that in the other House the Attorney General said that if the Land Question were not settled by the Imperial Parliament in three years the Imperial Parliament “would be under an obligation to fix the terms and conditions under which it should be delegated to the Irish Legislature.” We have heard nothing of that sort from the noble Earl; and I should like to know whether the statement I have cited is true or not. If the Government are in power, do they mean in three years to fulfil the obligation stated by the Attorney General on their behalf? The position in which the police are left seems to me to be one of the iniquities, and also one of the dangers of the Bill. It is admitted on all hands that the police have been the stay and safeguard of the nation. They have been an honest, well-contented, well-conducted, and well-disciplined force. Now you strike a blow at it. It is as if you had stunned a man with a blow and then expect him to fulfil the duties which he could only perform in a state of full health and strength. You are destroying the esprit of the police. They know that everything is to be taken from them, and that they are to be deprived of their position upon poor and miserable terms. In the meantime they are supposed to work well under an Executive which is taking steps to cripple and destroy them. The Lord Lieutenant is to have the police under him; but I want to know to whom he is going to be responsible? I understand he is to be responsible to the Irish Executive, and, therefore, to the Irish Legislature; but he is also to act as representing Her Majesty, on the advice of her confidential advisers. How is he to exercise these two functions with decency and dignity? If he thwarts his Irish Cabinet they can stop the Supplies. What is he to do then? Change his Ministry? But suppose he has the same Ministry or one like it forced upon him? What a miserable position the Lord Lieutenant would occupy if a Vote of Censure were inflicted upon him! All these things do not seem to have been fully considered; and when a question was asked about them in the House of Commons there was no one to give a satisfactory answer. No doubt there is to be separation between the Irish Legislature and the military, which is to be under the command of the Lord Lieutenant; but if the interference of the military be required it will be asked for by the Local Authorities, and the Lord Lieutenant must consult his Irish advisers, because it will be impossible for the Lord Lieutenant to exercise his powers without reference to his Ministers and his Parliament. And the veto will have to be exercised under conditions similar to those in which the military will be employed. Then we come to the Exchequer Judges and the Judicial Committee. That, with all deference to my noble Friend (Lord Playfair), is a mere paper protection. Who is to initiate proceedings before the Judicial Committee, and who is to be the party to argue in these cases before it? And who ever heard of cases of abstract principle being referred to a Judicial Committee, to settle not a particular case, but large questions which are afterwards to be disputed in the Courts as to the extent of their meaning — what was meant by those who gave the judgments? We come to the other limitations and restrictions in the Bill. Limitations and restrictions are imperfect bulwarks to set up when you have let out the flood. They are always swept away. The great stream carries with it everything, and these smaller things are soon swept away. The limitations and restrictions will be the subject of continual fret and irritation. My noble Friend (Lord Swansea), who at so early a period of his initiation to this House gave us so solemn a lecture last night, in tones which showed he was come from a domineering Assembly, told us that the Leaders of the Nationalist Party would hold high office, and that they were not such fools as to throw away their office. Suppose the people want some extension of power and you do not give it them, what becomes of your office? And are there to be no rival ambitions in this new Legislature, no rivals for supremacy and influence—things which men value more than most things in life? All Legislatures, we know, continually strive to increase their power, and do you suppose the Irish Legislature will not press on to get greater powers than it has? It is one of those things I should have thought were beyond argument. But there is a great deal more than that. Those gentlemen who are to hold high office have given pledges—pledges to evicted tenants, to people who entered into that criminal “Plan of Campaign,” of which they were the instigators. I do not hesitate to say that they have demoralised the people of Ireland in making them believe they would have anything for the asking, all the more if they enforce their demands by outrage and crime. From the moment the Prime Minister declared that the Clerkenwell explosion brought the Irish Church within the sphere of practical politics Mr. Parnell saw his advantage. He said—“We know how to work upon the feelings of the Prime Minister;” and we all know how he brought him into his power. From that day the demoralisation of the people has ensued, which has in many instances been too much pandered to, and insatiable demands will be made when the time comes for those who made the promises to perform them. Do you suppose that, when these men have to choose between being traitors to the people which elect them and traitors to you, they will stand by you? Do you suppose that the Fenian organisation is extinguished in Ireland, and that no pressure will be placed upon the Irish Ministers by that secret and earnest body? Do you suppose that the Irish Americans, the "Ireland of Retribution," the larger nation of Ireland which is in America, will stand still and allow these men who have been their agents to fall short of the promises they have made in order to get the money from America by which alone they could carry on their machinations? Of course, this Bill is accepted by the Nationalists. Did you ever know a case in which a man who wanted to defend himself or to commit a crime would not thank you for the weapon you have put into his hands? They know, as we know, that, having accepted this proposed Legislature, they will have accepted that which will give them every opportunity to treat it as provisional, and to proceed from step to step until there ensues, I do not say separation, but that which is worse than separation, a dominating Power ruling over us in Ireland and elsewhere and preventing us from doing justice to the subjects of Great Britain who are loyal to the Crown. My Lords, is there anything to prevent these people from enacting that the Plan of Campaign shall be a lawful thing for the future? An attempt was made in the House of Commons to get ex post facto laws excepted, but it was rejected under that dominating influence; and there is to be a power in this Legislature to make any ex post facto laws, a thing which is not allowed in any way under the American Constitution, which may bring degradation and ruin upon people who have simply done their duty in matters connected with the offices they hold. These, my Lords, are serious things; and you have to consider whether those people who make these pledges and who have given themselves over so absolutely to the Fenians and Irish Americans will be able to resist that powerful and enormous pressure which will be put upon them. And then the evicted tenants. My noble Friend (Lord Swansea) said he would be prepared to legislate anything which would protect and preserve property. "Ah!" said the noble Earl opposite, "too late." When you have given these powers you cannot resume them. It is all very well to talk of the supremacy of Parliament being reserved. My Lords, the supremacy of

The Earl of Cranbrook

Parliament has been parted with, absolute power has been given to the Irish Legislature to deal with all questions not specifically reserved, and the Parliament of England could not without dishonour take upon itself to legislate upon those subjects which it had delegated. It could legislate, no doubt, for the repeal of this measure. It could repeal it; but that, again, is one of those things that we cannot look forward to with much hope. We cannot suppose that those who had been induced to pass this Bill would be likely to repeal it, and so thrust themselves into difficulties and troubles which they are anxious to get out of. Now I come to another point, which I must dwell upon. The character of these men, as painted by themselves, I will not quote. Everybody knows what they have been. Everybody knows that many of them are filled with hostility to this country; that they wished success to the Mahdi, to the Afghans, to the Boers, when British regiments were commanded and constituted by their own brethren, and the blood that was shed was Irish blood. These are the men to whom you are going to give these enormous powers! These are the men you suppose you can ever make firm and constant friends of England! It has been said by the noble Earl that he did not charge the men who were asking for these great powers with being criminals, and I think it was the Prime Minister himself who said that though he charged Mr. Parnell he did not extend the charge. Were those 1,200 men whom you shut up in Ireland without trial—were they suspected of crime or not? If they were not, a gross violation of law was committed; if they were, how dare you now turn round and say you never suspected them? You cannot get out of the difficulty. You imprisoned them without trial, and, having done so, you have condemned them as guilty of crimes against their country, and yet you propose to give them these enormous powers. You are told—it has been repeated again and again—that this measure will give contentment to Ireland. We are charged with being pessimistic, but could anything be more optimistic than the different speeches which have been made promising contentment as the result of this Bill? We have had Memorials from vast numbers of Roman Catholics—those who are bold enough to speak out—we have seen Presbyterians, Churchmen, and Nonconformists practically unanimous against this Bill, and yet the part of Ireland which is worst you are going to give mastery over the best, to put the living under the dead, and to assume that that state of things will bring about contentment. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Rosebery) said at Paisley that the statesmen of England knew more about Ireland than any portion of the Irish people. Does the South know as much about the North of Ireland as we know about the whole of Ireland? Yet under the Bill the South is to exercise a sway to which it is not entitled. The Bill, in short, is an attempt to put an inferior Ireland over a superior Ireland—a faction over the nation—instead of leaving both to the mitigating influences of an Imperial Parliament which would do justice to each—an attempt to set one against the other, in continuance of the perpetual conflict which has gone on for many a long year, and would not be stopped by this most wretched measure. Mr. Parnell said the Irish had no right to ask for more than the restitution of Grattan's Parliament, but it is now proposed to give to them not only a Legislature, but an appendant Legislature. In the time of Grattan's Parliament you legislated for the Empire without any Members for Ireland sitting in your Parliament, excepting those returned by British constituencies. Now, for the first time, you propose that there shall be an addition to our Parliament. It was during Grattan's Parliament that Great Britain's influence and interest were at stake. Lord Rosebery last night, with great candour, acknowledged that Mr. Pitt had in the circumstances no course open to him but to call for the Union; and it is notorious that Lord Cornwallis—a most genial, benevolent man, and most anxious to conciliate the Irish if he could—came to the conclusion that nothing could save Great Britain unless a Union were established. The noble Earl has given the House his reasons, not why this Bill should be carried—because he never entered into that question of this Bill at all—but why something in the shape of Home Rule should be offered to the Irish people. He says he wants to give Ireland something that is worth defending.

Is it credible that my noble Friend can be a party to a Bill which would prevent the Irish from defending themselves or anybody else, because they are under this Bill prohibited from drilling—from availing themselves of naval and military resources, and how they are to defend themselves or anybody else under those circumstances I cannot imagine. Mr. Pitt felt that in a case of difficulty Great Britain ought to have every rein in its own hands, so that it should guide the coach, and manage the whole concern, so that every influence and power could be concentrated in this country, in order that there might be no danger from Ireland. The noble Earl assumed that, in the event of a European war, it was possible that those who were now striving to obtain this measure might, in case it were rejected, be so traitorous that they would welcome the French or any other nation; and he assumed that if this Bill were carried they would have something so well worth defending that they would not. But it was under Grattan's Parliament, when the Irish had their own Legislature, that the Rebellion took place, and when disloyalty reached such a height that the French, it was supposed, would be welcome in different parts of Ireland. Whatever restrictions you may impose, do not tell me that in setting up a separate Legislature for Ireland you are not in substance repealing the Union. Up to 1886 we have had a consensus of statesmen who had no doubt whatever of the importance of the Union. I happened this morning to see a passage in a speech of Burke's with which I so entirely agree that I should like to quote it. Of course, I do not say this Bill is a separation; but it is the way, in my opinion, to what is worse than a separation. He says—

"I think, indeed, Great Britain would be ruined by the separation of Ireland, but that as there are degrees even in ruin it would fall most heavily upon Ireland. Ireland would be the most completely undone country in the world, the most distressed, and in the end the most desolate country in the world. Many people in Ireland do not know how much depends upon her continued connection with this Kingdom."

Now, I know we are told that this is no repeal of the Union. Do not, my Lords, deceive yourselves by words. Do not tell me that if you set up a separate Legislature, whatever restrictions you put upon it, that you are not repealing the Union. Daniel O'Connell never spoke of separation; he always guarded himself against it, but what did Sir R. Peel say? In April, 1834, he said—

"I want no array of figures; I want no official documents; I want no speeches of six hours to establish to my satisfaction the public policy of maintaining the Legislative Union. I feel and know that the Repeal of it must lead to the dismemberment of this great Empire, must make Great Britain a fourth-rate Power in Europe, and Ireland a savage wilderness; and I will, therefore, give at once and without hesitation an emphatic negative to the Motion for Repeal."

I cannot forbear to recall to the noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer) the words of one who in my youth exerted a potent influence in politics. What did Lord Althorp say, a man who was an honour to the Party with which he was connected—

"He hoped and trusted that the advocates of the Repeal of the Union would never succeed in the attainment of their object. No man held civil war in greater detestation than he did, but he should even prefer that to the destruction and dismemberment of the Empire."

By this measure the Government propose to give too much from the point of view of Great Britain and too little from the point of view of Ireland. Lord Playfair and other noble Lords who have spoken have expressed the opinion that the retention of the Irish Members was forced upon the Government by the Unionist Party. That view, however, has not been supported by any scrap of proof. For my own part, I have always said that the only good thing in the Bill of 1886 was the plan for excluding the Irish Members. They were excluded in the time of Grattan's Parliament, and why should they be included now? But the reduction of the Irish Representatives in the House of Commons to 80 is, in my opinion, tantamount to an admission that the present number of 103 is a disproportionate amount of representation to have given to the Irish. Why they should have 183 Representatives, for that is what it comes to, as I shall show presently, I do not understand. We were told, I think by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that Mr. Gladstone shares the objections which we feel to the retention of 80 Members.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: I only said that Mr. Gladstone had indicated rather clearly his preference for the other plan.

The Earl of Cranbrook

*THE EARL OF CRANBROOK: I agree with the noble Earl. Mr. Gladstone has the most extraordinarily open mind respecting these matters that any great statesman could have. In 1886 he certainly said that he would "never be a party" to the retention of the Irish Members. He may have changed his mind on the point, but I doubt it. However, he has inflicted upon this country a plan which he himself admits to be "an anomaly," and which is an invitation "to intrigue" and "a great danger." Mr. Morley, at Newcastle, urged upon the people the importance of excluding the Irish Members from the British House of Commons, and yet he has now voted for the Third Reading of a Bill which contains the very provision which he then protested against. What did Mr. Morley say about this plan of retention?—

"I do not care what precautions you take; I predict that there is no power on earth that can prevent the Irish Members in such circumstances from being in future Parliaments what they have been in the past, and what to some extent they are in the present—namely, the arbiters and masters of English policy and English legislative business, and of the rise and fall of British Administrations."

Is it not atrocious that the two men who have condemned the plan of retention in terms like those should have induced the House of Commons to pass a measure in which that very plan of retention is embodied? In passing, I would ask how the election business arising out of the return of these 80 Members is to be managed. You have made no provision in the Bill for the trial of Election Petitions. Then I should like to know whether the Irish Members are to be exempted from considering Private Bills in Committees, or are they to form part of Committees on Private Bills relating to England only? All these things must be considered. Consider what will happen if this plan of retention is preserved. The 80 Members will be returned, not by the same number of constituencies, but practically by the same voters as the 103. The 103 Members of the Irish Legislature will be reinforced by the 80 Representatives. The bulk of the 103 Members in the Irish Parliament, and the 80 Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament, will have one and the same Leader, and all the subjects which are excluded from the cognisance of the 103 Members in Dublin will be raised by the 80 Members here. And this is the way in which you propose to get rid of the friction caused by Irish Business in the Imperial Parliament. You are going to create a power which will dominate you in that Parliament. The Government say that if these privileges are granted the Irish will be checked in their actions by a sense of responsibility. It is at this point that the question of the character of the men to whom you propose to entrust these powers becomes so important. Mr. Bryce, when writing philosophically about the American Constitution, said—

“The chief lesson which a study of the more vicious among the State Legislatures teaches us is that power does not necessarily bring responsibility in its train.”

Now, to this proposed legislation Great Britain has not given its assent. The Union was a Treaty, and now you propose to repeal it, and to inflict degradation upon England. The Prime Minister, I know, boasts that he is a Scotchman; but I think that he, who was born and educated in England, and who owes so much politically to England, might have hesitated to declare that this country, which had resisted his imperious will, “required discipline.” He writes to an American—not one of the chief and best of Americans, but a man who has written of this country in a hostile manner—and says that “England requires disciplining,” and so he devises a plan under which he gives us the off-scouring of the Irish Parliament, such as they may choose to send, in order to extort further concessions to the Irish Nationalists. The Prime Minister has said that “Great Britain was entitled to a voice on this question.” She has given utterance to that voice. In 1887 the right hon. Gentleman said that the retention of the Irish Members was “a British question,” and not an Irish one; yet it has been carried by the Irish vote against the whole of Great Britain. Now, my Lords, in the final issue, we are told that we are 33,000,000 to 3,000,000, and that we can reconquer Ireland. Well, I think Mr. Gladstone is hardly the general who could undertake the reconquest of Ireland. After all, these concessions have been made to Ireland by a cowardly surrender: the idea of reconquering her is so preposterous and absurd that it does not require discussion. I am told, my Lords, that statistics show that Ireland has been impoverished since the Union. There is abundant evidence that Ireland has grown in riches, and would grow in quiet if you would allow your own Acts to operate. You keep passing Acts of Parliament, and then, like children growing flowers, you take them up by the roots to see how they are going on. The remedy you have proposed is worse than the disease; it will poison the two countries, and bring about constant friction and constant animosity and struggle. Now, my Lords, I will say one word about this House, of which I have the honour to be a Member. It is a second House, and a part of the Parliament of this country. Your Lordships have your rights, as large, except in finance, as those enjoyed by the House of Commons. Though not a Representative Body, I admit, it is your Lordships' duty to examine all questions that come before you, in view, not only of your rights, but of the expediency and policy of your action. Unfortunately, there is no question in politics which comes before us in an abstract condition. It is always weighted with circumstances which you have to take into account. We are taunted in the other House for speaking of the proceedings of that House, as if it was not a question before us. But, my Lords, we are part of the Parliament of England, and we have a right and duty to see that that Parliament, so far as we are concerned, does its duty; and we have a right to look at and comment upon the action of the other House if it evades Parliamentary law and resorts to expedients which we believe to be false and fatal in themselves, injurious to Parliaments in all parts of the world, and to call forth a despotism in Parliaments, which is equally abhorrent as despotism in individuals. We are called upon to try this question as upon our honour and as men who are interested in a peaceful, happy, and contented Ireland; and I venture to say for myself and those who act with me that we are not less interested in a peaceful, happy, and contented Ireland than noble Lords opposite. I am, to a certain extent, deeply and personally interested in Ireland; but I do not think it right, because a child or a lunatic desire a torch or weapon, to put it into their hands.

This Bill is one which the Government themselves admit will not be final. It is a Bill provisional in many most important particulars, and if passed must come on for reconsideration. We agree that we have solemn duties in connection with Ireland. You despair; we hope. You have given up; we are faithful to our Imperial destiny, and believe, though it may take time, that we have the means to redress every grievance of which Ireland can complain. Now, my Lords, I will conclude by quoting some words of that great Tribune of the people, as he was called by the noble Earl (Lord Rosebery), Mr. Bright, as they exactly express my feelings—

“Save its population (Ireland's) from the future conduct of the men who are answerable for much of its present sufferings and for all the disorder by which it is now afflicted and disgraced. There are 2,000,000 of loyal people in Ireland. Let us be firm in our resolve; and if it be possible—as I believe it is possible—save them for expulsion from the guardianship of the Crown of the United Kingdom and from the shelter and the justice of the Imperial Parliament.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, I have listened with interest and admiration to the speech of the noble Earl who has just sat down. I shall have some difficulty in following him, because I cannot but feel deeply conscious that, while he has been speaking the sentiments of vast multitudes of noble Lords within this House, I am going to advocate a cause which here has few friends, and I must necessarily come in conflict with the sentiments and opinions of many noble Lords present. I shall, at all events, endeavour so to conduct the argument which I have to put before your Lordships as to avoid saying a single word which may stir susceptibilities any further than is absolutely necessary. I have been struck with the constant repetitions throughout this Debate of the statement that no arguments have been adduced in favour of the measure now before your Lordships. I do not wonder that such expressions should come from noble Lords who come here from Ireland. I think it is not unnatural that a measure in which they are so deeply interested, and which must stir natural prejudices, should have been regarded by them mainly from one point of view; but I confess I am astonished that noble Lords who have been Liberals, and who call themselves Liberals still, although they may deem the dangers of a measure of this description as being too weighty to be encountered, nevertheless fail to see how much there is in it, and must be in it, to commend it to those imbued with Liberal principles. I say there has been a failure to recognise this, because we have heard from more than one, in effect though not in words, this description of the measure:—That it is the mere offspring of the self-will of a fanatic who has lost his head, accepted by subservient Colleagues who have lost their principles. [Opposition cheers.] I accept those cheers as a proof that the minds of noble Lords calling themselves Liberals who can thus view this measure have not been addressed to the arguments which with all unprejudiced persons will weigh in the consideration of the question. The noble Duke who moved the rejection of the Bill said that it was the duty of statesmen to forecast the future effect of any measure that was proposed. I agree; but there is another condition just as rigorously required by statesmanship, and that is that before forecasting the future you shall have weighed the arguments on both sides, and that you shall have examined the arguments which are opposed to your natural prejudices and preconceived opinions or traditional policy with as much care and scrutiny, and give them as full and fair weight as the arguments that are on the other side. The noble Duke commenced his speech by sweeping on one side as wholly irrelevant the references made by Lord Spencer to the history of the connection between England and Ireland since the Union. I confess that when we consider what is the matter with which we are now dealing, it is a most astounding proceeding to treat that history as irrelevant. What is the question now before your Lordships but this—whether any arrangement concerning the Parliamentary relation of the two countries arrived at at the beginning of the century is to remain untouched, or whether events have shown that the time has come when it is expedient, in the interest of both countries, that a change should be made? Is it possible rationally to arrive at an answer to such a question as that without looking to see what have been the fruits of the measure whose continuation or alteration is now in question? The Act of Union has been treated by many who have spoken in this Debate almost as if it were a divine institution and as if it were to be regarded with a reverence which made it almost blasphemy to say a word against or treason to suggest that it should be altered. And yet, after all, it was an arrangement arrived at not so very long ago, and, although I do not for a moment question the great ability of the statesmen by whom that measure was advocated and passed, I do not think anyone will contend that they were infallible. I am not going into an inquiry how that measure came to be passed in Ireland. It undoubtedly was passed in this country in a time of great national emergency, and, indeed, of imminent crisis. Even at that time of danger and emergency there were not wanting noblemen in this House of experience and judgment who believed it to be a mistake. Lord Fitzwilliam, in the Debate in this House, contended that—

“It would weaken instead of strengthening the means of resistance to the enemy.”

And he added another statement which is not without its interest and importance in relation to the Parliament of Ireland. He said—

“The House had the experience of ages; that the dangers apprehended from a separate Legislature had not arisen.”

What were the objects in view at that time? For my part, I think that it is quite compatible with the belief that the circumstances of that time demanded that arrangement to believe now that the circumstances of our time may demand a modification of it. There is one most important circumstance in the relative positions of the two countries which must not be lost sight of. The closer means of communication to which the noble Earl who has just spoken has alluded have afforded facilities and powers which did not then exist in this country in relation to Ireland. Further than that, at that time the population of Ireland was one-third of the population of the United Kingdom. The population of Ireland is now only one-eighth of the population of the United Kingdom; and I am by no means sure that if the conditions which exist to-day had existed at the beginning of the century Mr. Pitt would have been in favour of the Act of Union which he carried out. Therefore, it seems to me it is not in the slightest degree a slight on the memory or statesmanship of Mr. Pitt that one should believe that the arrangement then arrived at was in need of modification. What were the expectations and anticipations held out to those who advocated that measure? They hoped and believed that it would weld the peoples of the two nations into one. It has become now a ground for sneering when there is any talk of the “union of hearts.” But the idea is not a new one. The words almost were used in the discussions on the Act of Union. “United hearts” was what people were led to expect by some of the speakers as the effect of the Union. It was expected, too, that it would bring about a state of things without which good government does not exist. I should like to quote the words that were used by a noble Earl in this House as to what is essential to good government.

There were, no doubt, at that time those who doubted whether these hoped-for results could be achieved. We are able to-day to determine whether they have been. What is the condition of things we find? The Union under that Act has continued for 93 years, and to-day and during the last few days from almost every speaker in this Debate in opposition to the measure we have heard references to the loyal minority of Ireland. What is this but a confession that there is a disloyal majority? [Cheers and counter cheers.] Noble Lords cheer. I will deal with the question how this came about, and what is the cure for it. But are noble Lords satisfied with that condition of things? What does it mean—a disloyal majority? That there are some millions of our fellow-subjects in an island close beside us who have been subject to the Rule of Her Majesty and her predecessors for years, who are opposed to the rule under which they live, who desire its change, who resent the measures that are adopted towards them, and who believe that they are being wronged. I believe that that is the only spot within the broad dominions of the Queen, with the numberless forms of government under which her subjects live, and with the myriads of which they consist, where such a state of things could be possibly found. [Cheers.] Is that not a momentous fact? Noble Lords cheered it as though they were rather pleased with it, as though it was not a thing to be ashamed of and bitterly repented. That is the condition of things which we find after all these years, I will not say as the fruit, but following upon and succeeding this Act of Union; and all I am contending for is this—that whatever else it has done it has not produced that condition of contentment, it has not secured those conditions of good government which we hoped for it, and anticipated for it, and for which in the main it was passed. I think that the British Parliament, as a piece of legislative machinery for Ireland, has been a failure. I think it has not quickly enough discerned Irish wants. It has turned a deaf ear to them often when they have been urged before Parliament. It has delayed too often, cruelly and wrongly, the redress of serious grievances, and it has naturally stirred up, and inevitably stirred up, a feeling of hostility to the institutions of this country. I should like, before I pass from that, to allude to one sentence of the noble Earl. He says—

“ You told us in 1870 this measure was to be a satisfactory solution; you told us in 1881 that that measure was to be a satisfactory solution. We find none of them a satisfactory solution.”

Just what I contend. We have never, in the British Parliament, sufficiently understood Ireland to secure a satisfactory solution, and consequently when the Irish have told us that what we believed was solving the question would not solve it, we passed the measure that suited our opinions, and that was consonant with our ideas, and we found by bitter experience that they were right and that we were wrong. These are the measures which have been from time to time passed. They have been varied by coercive legislation which became necessary and I admit always is necessary when you have discontent or to suppress revolt against your institutions of the description I have referred to. I know it has become the fashion nowadays to speak of Coercion Acts as though they were rather magnificent legislative achievements of which we have no reason to be ashamed. That was not the language used by the statesmen of either Party until recently. We are reproved for expressing sometimes hostility to or dislike of Coercion Acts, and it has been suggested that you cannot be opposed to them unless you are in sympathy with criminals or crime. That was not the attitude of statesmen of either Party in the earlier generations of this century. Coercion Acts were always introduced under pressure of extreme urgency, to meet a condition of things which were very critical, and passed only for a time—avowedly only justifiable on account of the critical situation, avowedly to be repealed the moment the situation became no longer serious. Now, we have so far advanced that we have come within the last few years to pass a permanent Coercion Act for Ireland, and we consider that, circumstances having brought us to pass once for all a permanent Coercion Act for Ireland, it is really a triumph of legislative achievement for that country. I have been astonished at some of the language used with regard to this legislation. I admit that Coercion Acts often are necessary. I believe that whenever you do not or cannot satisfy the just aspirations of the people and make them content with the government under which they are living, Coercion Acts, or some form of coercion, are necessary; but I none the less hate the process, believing that the necessity for Coercion Acts proves that there is a disease which seeks a remedy. Coercion Acts are spoken of as light things. What do they mean? You take away in regard to Ireland some of the safeguards which the wisdom of our ancestors has placed on the administration of justice in England for the protection of the people from wrong, hardship, and unjust treatment. Are those safeguards of no concern here? Would we endure, is there an English Minister who would dare to propose for England a measure such as we passed for Ireland? An English Minister dared not do so, because he could not pass it. It would be impossible in the state of things existing here that such a Bill should ever become a law. It can be passed for Ireland, because the British Parliament by British votes take away the safeguards in Ireland where we are not subject to the law. I do not say that it may not be necessary to do so; but I will never fail to utter my protest against the view that it is a light matter or one of small moment. When it is said that these Acts are only passed against those who are not law-abiding and who will not conform to the law, has not that been made a justification of every tyrannous form of government and law? Are we not always told—"Keep within the law; say and do nothing to which the Government can object, and then these laws will not touch you"? That has never been considered a sufficient justification; and, moreover, I do not believe that those safeguards can be removed without the risk of injustice. My noble and learned Friend said that there had been no cases where people under the Coercion Acts had received injustice. I do not believe it. I am satisfied myself that there were cases in which injustice was done for want of those safeguards on which we here rely. I think it is established by these two circumstances with which I have dealt that there is a disease which has not been cured either by your bribes from time to time—for that has been the form of some legislation—or at another time by your Coercion Acts. The disease still exists. What has led to the discontent which exists? I think it is quite possible that if measures which were passed late had been passed earlier discontent might not have been what it is. But I think that this discontent, which has been caused by the consciousness that the legislation of the British Parliament has not succeeded in producing happiness and prosperity, has naturally united itself with national sentiments and aspirations. I do not see how it can be doubted that there does exist in Ireland among the majority of the people a desire for some distinct national life. Every circumstance to which I can look in the course of the present century seems to me to conclusively prove it. My noble Friend (Earl Cowper) said that the cry for Home Rule was a modern one, that it only began in 1870, that before that time it was Fenianism, and before that Repeal. I agree. It has taken many forms, and it would be a superficial view to treat these as separate things; the same principle underlays them all. Whether it be Home Rule, or Fenianism, or Repeal of the Union, it was the same cry and desire for a means of self-government which would enable the people to bring, as they believed they could bring, to themselves the prosperity, contentment, and happiness which we have failed to bring to them. It is said—"How can you expect to satisfy the Irish with a plan of Home Rule when you say they have desired something so much more extensive than that—Fenianism, or it may be Repeal?" Have we not seen instances in which there has been a cry for a more extended form of national life which has yet been satisfied with a narrower? Did Hungary, when she agitated for years and fought, seek that arrangement which now prevails and under which she possesses her autonomy? She sought something more than that; and even when the present arrangement was entered into there were some holding extreme views who retired dissatisfied and disgusted because she had not got more. But, nevertheless, the arrangement has brought satisfaction, and contentment, and peace; and those who demanded and insisted that more ought to be obtained became diminished in numbers and less important as time went on. I see no reason to suppose in any instance that a smaller satisfaction of demands which have been made may not bring contentment. It is said that the tendency of the time is towards national consolidation, while this measure tends to separation. I do not for a moment deny that the tendency of time has been towards national consolidation; but there has been another principle, which side by side with this national principle has been more and more coming into force and operation, and that is the principle of decentralisation of local autonomy. Perhaps in the greatest instance of national consolidation which we have seen in our time—the Empire of Germany—that national consolidation has been found not inconsistent with the completest local autonomy. Is there anyone who believes that if another course had been taken, if the separate Parliamentary Governments of those portions of Germany which now form the Empire had been taken from them, and an attempt had been made to govern a united Germany, or administer its laws and legislate for it through a united Parliament, Germany would have been stronger to-day than she is? On the contrary, the national consolidation would never have taken place. Germany, which is an Empire not wanting in strength, an Empire not disregarded by her foes, would not have been the Empire she is to-day. The conclusion to which these facts seem to me to point is that the only hopeful policy in regard to Ireland is a policy which shall seek to satisfy those desires and aspirations which she recognises, and which would enable Ireland to govern herself and manage her own internal affairs. I may be asked—Why do you think this is a hopeful policy? As far as I see, no other policy has been suggested which holds out the slightest hope. I say it is a hopeful policy because, as far as I know, wherever you have given to those who have been discontented and who have felt the yoke of Parliamentary Government under which they lived, a freer system, wherever you have recognised their desires and conceded them, you have brought contentment and peace. Now it is said that our conversion to these views has been very sudden. I do not know that it necessarily follows, because a conversion is sudden, it is therefore either mistaken or insincere. But if it were so, it would prove that Catholic Emancipation was a blunder, and that the policy of Free Trade was a mistake. Talk of sudden conversion! I was refreshing my recollection a day or two ago with reference to the passing of Catholic Emancipation, and I came across this passage in The Annual Register—

“The Duke of Wellington in December had written in express words that he saw no prospect of a settlement of the question; that it was impossible to expect men to consider it dispassionately and to come to an ultimately satisfactory conclusion, and that it had better for a time be buried in oblivion.”

The writer proceeds—

“When the Duke of Wellington thus declared on December 11 that he saw no prospect of a settlement, what man could imagine that he had already decided forthwith to force it to a settlement? When he expressed the opinion that it ought to be buried in oblivion, would it not be a deep insult to the understanding and honesty of his grace to imagine that he meant by that the instant agitation of the question before Parliament, and that, too, as a Government measure?”

Your Lordships will recollect the language used in the other House, especially with respect to Sir Robert Peel's action on the Corn Laws. And yet these men live now in the admiration, esteem, and veneration of their countrymen; and I prophesy that the time will come when those who now receive the same measure of abuse will not be regarded the worse for it by their countrymen, who will recognise the benefits of their action. I invite your Lordships' attention to the situation in 1885. A Franchise Bill had been passed, and there was about to be an election, and in the House of Commons this statement was made by the Leader of the House and of the Conservative Party, speaking on behalf of the Government—

“You have now given this large measure of franchise. It is inconsistent with that measure to govern the people of Ireland by the old method of coercion.”

I think that was a momentous statement. It indicates to my mind, as it could only indicate, one thing—that at last there was a search being made to find some other method of governing Ireland. For inasmuch as Ireland needed to be governed, and you were not going to govern her by coercion, how were you going to govern her? There was obviously an idea of some other policy, and that could only have been a policy of conciliation; and there could have been no policy of conciliation which did not take the direction of something in the nature of Home Rule. But that is not all. Do not let me be misunderstood. I am not for a moment using this argument as a charge against the Conservative Party that they intended to advocate Home Rule. My argument is that they themselves were looking, and announced to the country that they were looking—and were so understood by the country and by us—for some other means of governing Ireland. That was followed by another momentous event. There was an interview between Lord Carnarvon—the Viceroy of Ireland—and Mr. Parnell, of whose character and sayings we have heard a great deal during this discussion. Could anyone fail to see that, after such a declaration had been made and after such an interview had taken place, there were circumstances which must stir the thoughts of any man on this question and compel his attention to the inquiry—“Are we to go on with the old system of coercion, or are we to adopt some other means?” There were then 85 Nationalists returned to Parliament; there was an indication under this free franchise of the opinion of the great majority of the Irish people. What was to be done? It is said that statesmen one after the other had approved the Union and defended it. Undoubtedly they did. I do not suppose that there is anybody who would not prefer to leave untouched the Act of Union, if that Act were regarded with equal affection and esteem by the whole of the British Islands. It has been one of the conditions of political life in this country that whenever measures have been passed, though they were distasteful to a large minority, they have been accepted and honestly acted upon. And so it would naturally be with the Union. No statesman would rashly or readily attempt to disturb a settlement so solemnly arrived at. But there often comes in national life, as in individual life, a crisis. You have trodden a path unquestioningly for years, until you are compelled to face the question—Are you taking the right road? It is easy to walk in the accustomed way; it is very unpleasant to face the questionings and difficulties that arise when you begin to doubt whether you are on the right road or not. It is much easier to dismiss the doubts. But there comes a time when you can dismiss them no longer, and you are obliged to face the problem. This was the case with many in 1885; and it was certainly the case with me. It is a great delusion to suppose that the minds of people in England were never stirred about Home Rule until Mr. Gladstone brought the matter forward. I do not know whether others had my experience; but I represented a constituency in which there were many working men; and I know that there were many who had misgivings, and more than misgivings, as to the policy of coercion in the Parliament of 1880-1884. I was asked at various times by one and another whether it would not be possible to give to the Irish Home Rule. They saw that you never could govern the Irish without coercion unless you made some concession, and the mind of the English democracy was turning in this direction—that there was no reason why you should not give the Irish some form of Home Rule instead of coercion. It is said that the change took place to buy the Irish vote. What was the situation? At that time the Conservative Party were in Office. There had been returned in the previous autumn a Liberal majority of 86—a majority such as was only balanced if all the Irish Members, from Ulster and all parts, together voted with the Conservative Party. What had the Liberal Party with such a majority as that to fear? Why did they need to buy the Irish votes? They would only need them if they were unitedly thrown in support of the Conservative Party. If all the Irish Members did not support the Conservative Party, the Liberals would have an ample majority. Could we suspect that the Tory Party would attempt to buy the Irish vote, or that they would try to bring about such a combination of Irishmen of all Parties as to defeat the Government which had so large a majority from Great Britain? I admit that a change of this kind cannot be made without danger. I have never shut my eyes to the weight of the arguments which may be adduced against such a change. I have pondered and looked at them from every point of view; and I feel that they are of serious gravity, and that they well deserve to be considered. I do not regard it as a light thing. I think that any statesman or body of men who attempted to lead the country to a change of this description with a light heart and in any other spirit than one saturated with the conviction of the importance of the change would be very foolish—would be mad. But when I say that I fully realise all the dangers of such a change, I must ask—Is there no danger in leaving things as they are? We have had painted to us pictures of the dangers which may arise from a change such as this; but there has not seemed to be, in the mind of any single speaker who has addressed your Lordships, the dimmest consciousness of the dangers which exist in the present state of things. There is scarcely an instance you can bring to prove the gravity and danger of the change which does not equally prove the danger of leaving matters as they stand. The whole basis of the pictures which have been drawn by those who have preceded me rests upon this—that after this Bill passes Ireland will be discontented, and anxious to throw off the English yoke. But if things are left alone, will not the danger be then just as much? It would be there in its most serious form. I have spoken of the national aspirations and desires of a large body of the Irish people ; but I have not spoken of the sympathy with those feelings which exist in the tens of thousands of Irishmen scattered not only throughout Her Majesty's dominions, but in all parts of the world. Is there no danger in such a state of things ? — a discontented people in Ireland, a multitude sympathising with them in America, gold passing freely between the two countries. Are there never times when our relations with America become critical ? How can we shut our eyes to the danger, and pretend that all is peace when there is no peace ? There is this added danger—that the full sympathies of vast multitudes of Americans who are not Irish, who have no connection with the Irish, and who in a sense may be said to have no love for them, are nevertheless strongly with them in their demand for autonomy. The existence of that sympathy, the belief that wrong is being done, and that a demand that might be conceded is being refused—these are most important factors in considering the situation. If a concession be made which is felt to be just and reasonable, and which is safe, you will remove this danger at all events, and instead of there being sympathy with Irish discontent and a desire to assist Irish discontent in Ireland the sympathy will be the other way. It is said, however desirable it may be to attempt to introduce a change of this description, no measure is possible ; statesmanship is not equal to dealing with the question and creating a well-considered and workable scheme. I should be sorry if that were true. I admit that the task is one of enormous difficulty ; I admit it is one in which we may well desire the aid of the best intellects in this country without regard to Party. I admit it is impossible to devise any scheme not involving great difficulties ; but I cannot forget that, more than a century ago, a knot of men drawn from a very limited number, who, however, were sons of England, were capable of framing a scheme and Constitution which has stood the test of a century, and has been the admiration of the civilized world. And are we reduced to such intellectual or statesmanlike impotence that it is impossible for us to devise a scheme which shall settle upon a better footing than the present the relations between England and Ireland. I, at all events, do not believe it. Now it is said that this Bill, indeed, is not perfect—that it is full of imperfections. [“Hear, hear !”] Yes, my Lords, I quite admit it. But I say that there is no scheme which can be made perfect, there is no Constitution in the world which is perfect. If the same intellectual acuteness that is applied to this Bill were applied to the British Constitution you could prove that it is utterly unworkable, and that not many months or years could elapse before things would come to a dead-lock. But if this measure be desirable and right, are we, because a perfect scheme cannot be constructed, because no scheme can be devised that will be free from difficulty, to abandon the task ? I confess I feel it is idle to argue with those who are opposed to us on the provisions of this Bill, and for this reason—because I admit that there are dangers and difficulties in the scheme. If your point of view is that no scheme at all is necessary and that there is no reason for attempting to give self-government to Ireland, why, of course, there is an end of the case ; any scheme which is in any sense dangerous or perilous would prove to be undesirable. When you say that nothing at all is to be done, there is no use in discussing details, but I propose to allude to some of the points that have been raised. The proposition that the supremacy of Parliament is not maintained can only be established if you select your own meaning for the words, and that meaning one which has not hitherto been given to them. The legislative supremacy of Parliament is complete ; Parliament will be able to legislate, and its laws will be as much in force in the Sister Country under this Bill as before. The enforcement of them is not generally included in Parliamentary supremacy. It has been said it would be a breach of honour for this Parliament to legislate upon subjects remitted to the Irish Parliament. It would be nothing of the kind. There remains the legitimate use of the provisions contained in the Preamble, and of the clause to which allusion has been made, which mean that you set up a subordinate Legislature without impairing the supremacy of this Parliament. It is this which explains and justifies the insertion of the words to which I allude ; they could only serve that purpose ; neither the enactment nor the words in the Preamble can be said to serve any other purpose. You cannot get rid of the supremacy of Parliament ; no words can preserve it more than it preserves itself ; and the only object in inserting the words was to meet such an argument as the noble Earl has used. In answer to the noble Duke, I maintain that we have always drawn the distinction between a United Empire and a United Kingdom ; the fallacy involved in not drawing the distinction has been on the other side. Everywhere speakers have denounced the disintegration of the Empire. I maintain the unity of the Kingdom is preserved when you have a common Parliament in which sit Members for every part of the United Kingdom, with power to deliberate and vote upon its affairs. You do not destroy the unity of the Kingdom by delegating certain functions to a subordinate Parliament. The noble Duke said that Parliament makes and unmakes Ministries. A more extraordinary and astounding proposition I never heard advanced. Does this House believe itself able to make or unmake a Ministry ? Let it pass any Resolution it likes, and Ministers will remain. Let this House try whether a Resolution of Censure will drive a Ministry from Office. It is true that, by Constitutional practice, votes of the House of Commons make and unmake Ministries ; but it is new to me to hear from a Whig politician, and a Leader of the Constitutional Party, that the House of Commons and Parliament are synonymous. Therefore, when it is said it is necessary to the supremacy of Parliament that there should be interference with the Executive, I say you are using the term "supremacy of Parliament" in a sense in which it has never been used before. I admit that there will not be the same control over the Irish Executive. If one thing is certain, it is that there has never been any concealment or question that it was part of the scheme that there should be an Irish Executive. The noble Earl asked why Irish Members, any more than Members for Australia or Canada, should sit in the House of Commons ? There seems to be good reason why we should not include Representatives from Australia or Canada, while we include those of Ireland, because we do not leave to the Irish Legislature matters over which the Legislatures of Australia and Canada have full control. The reason of this is obvious—it is that proximity renders it in the highest degree expedient that we should have, for example, a common system of currency. More than that, when you are giving with these reservations a subordinate Parliament, if you are to maintain the supremacy of this Parliament and its ultimate control in case of absolute necessity, it is impossible to do it with justice or propriety if you are to exclude Irish Members. More than that, when you are retaining in the British Parliament absolute control in matters so greatly affecting the interests of Ireland as do those named in the 3rd clause of the Bill, there are certainly strong reasons against excluding the Irish Members from the British Parliament. If there was one thing that was more clearly placed before the country than another it was that it was to be a part of the scheme of Home Rule that Irish Members should be retained in this Parliament. It is said that you now include them and permit them to vote on all questions. Now I agree at once that that is a matter of very great difficulty. I should prefer myself, I frankly admit, a scheme by which the Irish Members should only vote upon those reserved questions or Bills relating to Ireland. But the difficulties of such an arrangement will be obvious to anybody, and although I may not think those difficulties so serious as some do, although I might have desired some method of that description to be passed into law, yet the difference between that and the retention of the Irish Members for all purposes seems to me, when you are dealing with such a Bill, if it be a Bill at all necessary, a matter of detail. The noble Earl has suggested that by this scheme Great Britain will be in a worse position than she now is. I confess I look at the matter as a practical man, and although I would have desired their exclusion from voting except upon reserved matters it seems to me we shall be in a better position, and not in a worse, than we were. The noble Earl says—“ But you retain to them a certain power of interfering in legislation which concerns you, while you cannot legislate about local Irish affairs." Personally I confess that, put in that way, I at least have not the slightest desire to legislate or take any part in legislating in local Irish affairs. I regard it as a burden or a responsibility to be performed if there is no Body to whom it can be delegated. I treat it as a hardship upon me that whilst the Irish can meddle in my affairs I cannot meddle in theirs. I can understand the hardship so far as they can meddle with mine. Yes, my Lords, it is a hardship which exists now, and which you are seeking to perpetuate; but to say it is a hardship that we cannot interfere in their affairs is a thing which does not commend itself to my understanding. There is not a local English, Scotch, or Welsh matter upon which the Irish Members will be able to vote, and on which they could not vote and turn the scale, on which they will not vote and turn the scale now, if this Bill passes, upon which they could not turn the scale if this Bill had never been introduced. I look for an improvement in that respect. I believe, in the first place, you get an enormous advantage in regard to time which will become available for English, Scotch, and Welsh affairs which is now absorbed by Ireland. You will get rid of her and you will have more time to devote to your own affairs. In the next place, you will find that the Irish, when they are managing their own affairs, will become very keen and active in relation to them, and you will not find the same keen and constant attention to English, Scotch, or Welsh legislation which you have at the present time. As a practical man, taking that view and wishing what you wish, I say I get something under this Bill; I get nothing if you throw out the Bill and the present state of things prevails. With regard to the mode in which judgments are to be enforced, questions were asked me. In regard to the Judges of the Courts they will be enforced as they are now. The questions put assume a refusal on the part of those whose duty it is to enforce the law to do so. What now is the ultimate resort in such a case? Why, force, and nothing but force. But it does not follow that it will be necessary. But it will be certainly used to force the law if it is found to be so. It has been said that the Exchequer Judges are like

Aunt Sallies on the racecourse. I cannot see any such resemblance. The question put to me is a riddle which I am unable to solve, put in extremely enigmatical and picturesque language. I do not see what the difficulty is. It seems to me the position of the Exchequer Judges is made very clear under the Bill. The noble Lord who spoke before me, asked how the Exchequer Judges were to be appointed. If he looks at the Bill he will find they are to be appointed as they are now, and be removable in the same manner—a Motion in both Houses of Parliament. And matters after this Bill will be the same as before in that respect. With regard to the financial provisions with which I do not intend to deal except to say one word. The noble Viscount, Lord Cross, said that your Lordships have a right to know that the Bill embodies the convictions of the Government. I rather question that right. When a Bill comes from the other House it embodies the opinion of the House of Commons, and it does not matter whether they are the convictions of the Ministers or not. On any particular provision Ministers may have been overbalanced by a majority of the House of Commons, but to contend that every provision, except on a vital point, must express their convictions appears to me to be a novel doctrine invented for the occasion, and of which we have never heard before. In regard to the financial proposals I do not care to dwell at any length for this reason; there are very weighty arguments against Home Rule, and you may convince the Committee that this policy which we believe to be just and expedient is unjust and inexpedient; but of this I am certain—if you do not convince your countrymen against Home Rule by other arguments you will never convince them by any petty huckstering about a little more or less in regard to the financial arrangements. I believe this of the English people: those who think it just and right will be glad to have it made in these terms; those who do not will object to it in any form. I turn to a part of the case which is undoubtedly of great importance, and that is the position of the loyal minority. I am not going to say a word disrespectful to the loyal minority, but this I must say. At the outset, I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that either a minority or a majority would be justified in resisting the law as passed by Parliament and refusing obedience to it merely because they apprehended there might come to them some possible harm. I can understand men feeling that the state of government which has been created and under which they live has become so intolerable that any risk must be run rather than submit to it, but that must be an actual existing state of things, and not a mere guess which may come about. I should be most desirous of seeing any safeguards introduced for the protection of the loyal minority subject to one limitation, and that is that they be not such as to give a minority the rights of a majority. A majority must rule, and a minority cannot rule a majority. The position of the landlords and their agents has been a good deal mixed up with the fears of the Ulster or of the loyal minority. Now, they are two very different things. I do not mean for a moment to say that the interests of the landlords are to be disregarded. Far from it. But it is not about the interests of the landlords, about questions of rent and otherwise, that the loyal minority, the people of Ulster, are specially concerned. As I understand, their fears may be said to be threefold. They fear unfair religious treatment, unfair differential legislative treatment, or perhaps unfair treatment generally by the Legislature, and they fear unjust taxation. I believe myself those fears are enormously exaggerated. I do not believe there is any tendency to unfair religious treatment or unfair taxation to the minority, and I base that belief on experience; your belief is based upon speculation. All experience tends to show that this unfair treatment is never received. Take the Irish Municipalities, in some of which the Nationalists are in a majority. Take the Corporation of Dublin. The Corporation of Dublin administers its affairs as well as Corporations which are governed and controlled by the loyal minority, and deals with its political adversaries just as fairly as political adversaries are dealt with anywhere else. It has arranged its financial affairs with unusual success, and the men who have been doing this municipal work are the same class as the men who will have to deal with those other affairs in the proposed Legislative Assembly. Therefore, looking at the acts done in the municipal life of Ireland, you have not only no reason for fear, but every reason to expect, that in the larger legislative life which you propose to give them you will find them actuated by the same motives. It is said you are going to hand over the government of Ireland—the fate of 3,000,000—people to these persons—to men whose characters have been spoken of in words of reprobation; but, looking to the men who now represent the Nationalist Party in the House of Commons, I believe you will be able to find men to fill the Executive offices with as much ability, public spirit, patriotism, and fairness as actuate men who fill positions of the same kind in this country. Let us look at it for a moment as a matter of self-interest. Those men will desire that their Government should be successful, and they will have every motive to deal with the North. It seems to me, in reality, the chance would be that the North would get something more than its due; and I will tell you why. Does anybody suppose when this Bill passes that you will have only one Party in Ireland? You will have two sides to a Chamber. One will have the same legislative desires as the other which is opposite them, and the Party on the other will be anxious to gain the alliance and support of the Representatives of Ulster; and there is not the slightest reason to fear that Ulster would suffer under such circumstances. I admit there is apprehension, but I am not prepared to accept the statement of bankers, merchants, and others as necessarily to be relied upon, because in times of great political excitement, and when animated by political feelings, they do not always state what is accurate any more than do the rest of mankind. My belief is that the experience of this Legislative Assembly would remove that apprehension, and that, when it was seen there was no injustice or unfairness in dealing with different parts of Ireland, it would go far to remove much of the bitterness which now exists and make Ulster better friends with the rest of Ireland, and would take but a short time to remove enmity which unfortunately at present exists. With regard to the landlords, we have been told that 4-5ths of the landlords of Ireland have been able to collect their rents with greater ease than those of England. We have been asked why we had not introduced a Land Bill. I confess I should have liked long ago to have seen a measure of land purchase passed, eminently satisfactory to have obtained a settlement which would free an Irish Parliament from the responsibility of dealing with this matter. But I believe, myself, that might have been done in connection with the proposals of 1886 without any serious financial risk to this country, or serious loss; but that was not the view taken at the time of those who opposed the Government in 1886, and the Land Bill was used as a stick with which to beat the Home Rule Bill all over the country. The people of England were told it was a monstrous Bill, and one not to be passed. If now it is impossible, in the state of public feeling, to pass such a Bill, they are the persons who are responsible for the state of public feeling which has made that impossible, and it does not lie in their mouths to ask why we do not introduce a Bill which they have done their utmost to render difficult, if not impossible. It is said that the people of Great Britain are against this Bill, and that they have shown it by recent elections. I am not prepared to admit that as a matter of fact. My belief is that the majority of the electors of Great Britain voted in favour of the Bill. I admit that the majority of the Representatives returned were against it; therefore, there can be no doubt in a great many instances—and I have investigated some—that the scale of the elections was turned by the same persons voting in several places, and, therefore, the opinion of the people of Great Britain is not necessarily represented by the number of Members returned. It is next said that there was no mandate for this Bill in all its clauses. The noble Duke says the Bill, and every clause in the Bill, must be before the country. To what would that reduce our Legislative Assembly? I say nothing to a referendum ad hoc. The Representatives of the people meeting in Parliament would have to pass the Bill as it stood, because they had no mandate to amend it. It is also said that the Bill has not been discussed. Then why not take your revenge on the other House? Pass the Second Reading, amend the Bill in every clause, and force the House of Commons to discuss it. It is said that the Bill was discussed with the object of educating the people. It took 86 days in the other House, and they were not enough, to educate the people as to the Bill, and your Lordships are going to make that education complete in four days. I, of course, know that this Bill will be rejected amidst tumultuous and enthusiastic cheers. I wonder if there are sounding in your Lordships' memories the echoes of cheers just as enthusiastic which were but the precursors of the victories of great reforms. We watch on the shore the flowing tide, and as we watch it we scarce can believe in its approach, but its approach is none the less certain. My Lords, if this measure is, as we believe, founded on principles of equity and justice, principles which in past times have borne precious fruit, your Lordships' action, though it may retard, cannot prevent or even long delay, the ultimate triumph of our policy.

LORD HALSBURY: I must congratulate my noble and learned Friend upon his excellent speech, although there are some matters on which I am in controversy with him. I believe there has been a real effort to deal with some parts of the Bill which is before your Lordships' House. But I have noticed with some surprise that the Ministers who are responsible for the Bill have talked about anything but the Bill; and I must say, with a feeling of pride in my old profession, when it came to the turn of the Lord Chancellor, there was an effort, at all events, to deal with the arguments which were directed against the passing of the measure. Let me say a word on what I think is a misapprehension in the mind of my noble and learned Friend. I do not think anyone cares about the conversion of any person unless it is sincere, and to be a conversion it must be assumed to be sincere; a thing which makes the history of this Bill, and where it comes from, and how it comes, important. There is a more than half-implied right that you have no option but to pass the Bill which is now sent to this House by the House of Commons. I am not going at any length into that matter; but I suppose nobody would gravely contend that a portion of the Legislature would have a right to put itself in conflict with the country by legislating on questions on which the country has never been consulted. We have heard from the noble and learned Lord something about the internal relations of the Party to which he belonged before the surrender of 1886. I think I am entitled to say that no responsible politician prominent in political warfare had ever pronounced before that year in favour of any measure of Home Rule whatsoever. In fact, up to that time there was a deliberate determination on the part of the Liberal Party to preserve the Union intact. The policy of this Bill was sprung upon the country as a surprise, for before 1886 it had not been adopted by any Party except the Nationalist Party. I do not think the words of the Duke of Devonshire could bear the interpretation my noble and learned Friend has placed upon them. What he did ask was what reference had been made by the noble Earl who had moved the Second Reading. With regard to the Bill itself no reference had been made to it. I think we are all agreed as to the great and serious importance of such a subject as this. I am afraid I cannot think so, because I notice in the amusing speech of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs last night it seemed to me to be hardly appropriate to so grave an occasion. Rightly or wrongly many of our fellow-countrymen believe that their happiness, property, and even lives depend upon the decision of Parliament in this case. Such apprehensions are not likely to be allayed by the noble Earl's jocose observations. Upon the question really before us—namely, that “this Bill be read a second time,” I am bound to say the noble Earl said not a word. I admit that during the interval between 1886 and 1892 we heard a great deal about Home Rule, but those who spoke about it never gave a satisfactory answer to the question—“What does Home Rule mean?” But now we have a Bill on the subject before us, and what does the noble Earl do? He repeats the vague and ambiguous statements about Home Rule which were made in the interval to which I have alluded. If the speech of the noble Earl opposite was intended as an exhibition of tactics and diplomacy it was a complete success, because I will undertake to say that if at some future time the noble Earl were to say—“I spoke in favour of some measure of self-government for Ireland, but I never approved one single clause of this Bill,” he would be perfectly within his rights. The noble Earl did not utter one single syllable in defence of the clauses of the Bill. In fact, he said very candidly that he would not, and he gave a reason—I was going to say not quite respectful, I will not say to your Lordships' House, but to Parliamentary Institutions. Suppose, my Lords, a Minister of the Crown, having a large majority who he knew would vote for him, came down to the House of Commons, and said to them—“This is a Bill I recommend, but I will not trouble you to discuss it.” Would that be a Constitutional thing for him to do? Parliament consists of both Houses. Neither House is a Parliament without the other, and considering the interest taken in this measure, and the manner in which noble Lords had come from north, south, east, and west simply to give their approval to the measure, it all went to prove that it was part of a system of separate Assembly. It is hardly suggested, my Lords, that this Bill has been discussed. We have had from the other side of the House nothing pointing to what the Bill is going to effect. No speech has been directed to show that this or that particular clause will remedy this or that particular defect. We have nothing put before us but this general proposition—“Something must be done, because what has been done in the past has not succeeded.” That may be a very good reason for saying that something must be done, but how does it recommend the adoption of the principle of this Bill? And I have to remind you again that the question is that this Bill may be read a second time. Now, my Lords, I will say a word or two about the Bill itself. It does, in effect, repeal the Act of Union. I know that it has been said that it does not, but whether it does so or not may very easily be discovered by anyone who reads the Bill and the Act of Union. Does a thing assume a different aspect because you call it by a different name? I heard my noble and learned Friend continually use the phrase “subordinate Legislature.” If the Irish Legislature is to be a subordinate Legislature, why does not the Bill say so?

When it was suggested that that word might be introduced to render that beyond doubt it was refused. It is the duty of the Government, I presume, in thus initiating a new Constitution, to see that justice is done both to Ireland and England, and I should have expected from the promoters of the Bill some effort to show that that has been done. But has it been done? It has been pointed out that the new form which the new Governing Body is to assume is one that will lend itself to the oppression of one section of the community by another. That apprehension is seriously entertained by a large number of people. Why, then, instead of a general lecture on the impropriety of indulging in pettiness, have we not had some practical description of the grounds on which the apprehension to which I have referred is said to be groundless? It is the old story. You are to trust everybody, and it is assumed that there will be an entire change of heart and disposition on the part of those you have hitherto looked upon as your bitterest enemies. Is there, my Lords, any indication of a kindly and generous feeling towards those of their countrymen who are now in a minority in the House of Commons on the part of those who in the future will be in a majority in the Irish Legislature if this Bill passes? I confess I certainly find no evidence of it. I do not want, if I can help it, to speak of individuals, but who are the people who are to be elected into this new Legislature? The noble Earl who moved the Second Reading of the Bill, though he did not say so in terms, inferred that in the formation of the Legislative Assembly and the Irish Ministry the best persons would be adopted, and that there would be a change of disposition in those who are to exercise authority there. But I observe that Lord Swansea was of opinion that the men now in the House of Commons would hold high office, and I would rather accept his judgment on the point than that of the noble Earl. It is impossible not to know that these men, who were the subjects of the investigations by the Special Commission, have not lost their popularity among their constituents in consequence of the finding of that Commission. What reason, then, is there to suppose that they will not retain that popularity in the future with the people who had retained it to get Home Rule in the past? It is said that they would be contented, but would they be contented with much less than they originally demanded? We must not prophesy, but our opponents may. I have no wish to prophesy. I only draw an inference which everybody must draw from the evidence. It has been said, in language with which your Lordships are doubtless familiar, that "provisional" is stamped on every line of this Bill. I think I should be disposed to say that "vengeance" is stamped on every line of the Bill. The loyal minority, the Police, the Civil servants, all of them are in turn to come under the vengeance of those who have been their enemies in the past and will continue to be their enemies in the future. I should just like to say one word upon that. A paper has just been handed to me containing a statement which I have not had time to verify myself, which is attributed to Mr. Grattan—"Give them the power and they give themselves your property." That strikes me as a motto to be placed just over the door of the new Irish Legislature. The extraordinary character of the Bill is well illustrated by the provision relating to the Exchequer Judges. They are appointed to determine certain questions, and the difficulty that presents itself to me is this. There is to be an ordinary Executive in Ireland, and therefore the Sheriff, by hypothesis, will not execute the process of the Exchequer Judges. The Exchequer Judges are to have the power to appoint a Sheriff of their own. Suppose what I may call the ordinary Sheriff, known to the law, is under the orders of the Executive Authority, and the new Sheriff—the Exchequer Judges' Sheriff—is ordered to do something which the proper Sheriff will not do, and the forces of the law are under the command of the ordinary authorities, what is to happen? The new Sheriff may call out the posse comitatus, and the ordinary Sheriff may take the same course. Who is to decide between the two? That is only one illustration of the almost impossible theory of having an Irish Executive which is to be controlled by another Executive. There is still a further difficulty. The Exchequer Judges' Sheriff has no funds, no staff, no officers; he is to be "a person appointed." All I can say is that I should not like, under these circumstances, to be a Sheriff of the Exchequer Judges. With reference to the Land Question, one would suppose, from the sort of argument that has been addressed to your Lordships, that this was a sort of game of chess between the two political Parties. The landlords are the persons whose property by the hypothesis is imperilled. In order to protect them it is suggested that some purchase or land scheme is to be put before the people. The Liberal Unionists and Tories between them proclaim all over the country that this is a wicked, an unworkable, and an improper scheme. Suppose it were entirely erroneous to entertain such a view, are we to be punished? No. It is the landlords that are to have their property taken from them. That is not the attitude of a responsible Government. The question before the Government is whether or not the effect of the Bill may be to inflict a grievous wrong, and to take away men's property without compensation. The answer given is—"Oh, you agitated so that we could not pass our Land Bill, and so we are going on without it." That is not the mode in which such a question should be dealt with. Principles of justice and right demand that you should protect the property you have put in peril. I now come to the vexed question of the retention of the 80 Members. I do not myself know exactly what position we are in on that subject. My difficulty is a conundrum much more difficult than my noble and learned Friend professed to be able to solve. One knows perfectly well that down to within a few hours of the determination everybody supposed that such a provision was not to be in the Bill as it now contains. Three of the Ministers in this House disapprove of it, and nobody debated it in the House of Commons. If ever there was a Bill introduced with an apology in this regard this is that Bill. Can anyone say anything for the provision or adduce any logical defence of it? Does anybody reasonably contend that when we are here precluded from the discussion of Irish affairs we are nevertheless to allow 80 Irish Members to come and discuss our local affairs? The Lord Chancellor said it was not a privilege to discuss local Irish affairs. But that is not the point. The presence in Parliament of these men, their influence and power, the mode in which they could make their presence known and disagreeable, those are the real questions; and when the matter is passed over as a joke and not worthy of being discussed from that point of view, I confess it seems to me that of all the extraordinary things that one has seen in Parliamentary life, nothing is more extraordinary than to see a proposition which has been repudiated by everybody in the first instance, which is not supported by the Ministers in the House from which this Bill comes, nevertheless put forward for your Lordships' acceptance without a single word being said in respect of its reason or common sense. I really do not know but what I am disposed to emulate the language of King Lear—

"Someone is going to do dreadful things; what they are now I know not, but they shall be the terror of the Earth."

I am not going into abstract views as to the extent to which resistance to lawful authority is permissible or not. People must judge for themselves what degree of outrage of the human rights justifies such a resistance. I deprecate any discussion of this matter. But, at the same time, what statesman or man responsible for the government of his fellow-creatures will safely neglect the possibilities of insurrection and armed resistance to authority? My noble and learned Friend said that the Union had failed in this—that notwithstanding it had been in operation for 93 years there had been continual recrudescences of crime and outrage in Ireland. But was Ulster loyal at the time of the Union? If Ulster now speaks with a united voice against the Bill, it is the effect of the Union. Perhaps it hardly avails to say that the intelligence, education, and property of Ireland are opposed to the Bill; for it almost seems as though education were to be a disqualification for the exercise of the franchise. The most conspicuous example of that is that one of the most distinguished seats of learning in Europe—Trinity College—is to be disfranchised. This Bill is partly a disfranchising Bill. One would have supposed that justice would have been done in giving representation to all parts of Ireland. But I find this in the Schedule, though I do not know who is responsible for it. The County of Meath has an electorate of 12,000 and a population of 86,937. The County of Armagh has an electorate of 25,146 and a population of 143,289—nearly double that of Meath. But they are both to have two Members. By the abolition of the divisions of the counties—which is contrary to the principle adopted in this country—every one of the Loyalist Representatives in the South of Ireland will be taken away. Has that been done deliberately or not? No discussion about this has taken place in the House of Commons. The Schedules were closed; and no explanation of all this was given. What Reform Bill or great measure of any kind has ever been passed where you had not a discussion, at all events, about the distribution of political power? Either you had Conferences between the two Parties, or you had Boundary Commissioners, who took every care to see that there should not be an arrangement of boroughs or districts which would produce injustice. In this case only has it happened that an English Minister has brought forward a Bill in which he has arranged the whole thing, and has not permitted any vote except that on the question—"Shall this Schedule as a whole become law, aye or no?" If this were to be drawn into a precedent hereafter, what would become of the liberty of the subject? You say that 76 days of discussion were devoted to the Bill. I do not care if there were 176, so that the subject-matter demanded it. I could find a clause which should consist only of one line, and which, nevertheless, would form proper matter for a discussion of several months. Suppose it were—"Let the English Common Law be repealed." The discussion of that clause might well take 76 days, for the one line comprehended the whole of the English Common Law, which was the growth of centuries. And here, where the Bill enters into the most complicated political relations, and has added to it a reform, it is idle to say that a discussion of 76 days is extravagant. I know that a solemn warning has been given to us in tones of dreadful note. But I have no disposition to assume the position of a martyr on this subject as yet. I do not believe that I shall suffer for the vote I am going to give. On the contrary, I believe that it will be a popular vote. I believe that by voting against this Bill, so introduced, so sprung upon the country, so concealed up to the last moment as to its nature and contents, and passed in a totally different form from that which it had at the Second Reading—I believe that the democracy of this country will say that, if there is one thing which proves the absolute necessity of such an institution as the House of Lords, it is that that House has given them an opportunity of making their voices heard on a matter in respect of which they had been tricked out of their votes by these men. Have you given in the Bill adequate protection as promised? I have not found it. Have you restricted the Irish from legislating on any of those subjects which it might be perilous to leave to them? I do not believe it. Would it be lawful, for instance, for the Irish Legislature to prohibit marriage between Roman Catholics and Protestants? Lord Playfair said that there had never been a Christian martyr in Ireland. I do not know how he defines Christian martyr. The noble Lord should read the histories of 1641, or of what happened at Wexford Bridge in 1798. I have read that those who would not abjure their faith were tortured and killed; and surely they were Christians and martyrs. I do not wish to revive memories which had better be forgotten. I know that some of the most loyal and devoted subjects of the Crown are to be found in the ranks of the Roman Catholics. Is it not true, also, that there are some of those not without influence in Ireland who nurse and cherish with undying vitality the spirit of ancient persecution? And it is in these circumstances that you are going to leave without further protection the loyal inhabitants of the North of Ireland to the mercies of the new Legislature. You know what they have said, but you do not believe them; they were words of passion. I confess that I should rather look at what people did, whether they denounced crime and declined to associate with crime rather than look at the lamb-like professions of these men. I am prepared to vote against this Bill because I believe it is not in accordance with the will of the country. It has not been explained to the people, and it is not understood by them, while it has not been properly discussed in the House of Commons.

Lord Halsbury

THE BISHOP OF RIPON said, it was their duty to lay aside all prejudice of political faction in answering a question of this kind, and he thought he could claim to have done so when he stood before them to speak as he did on this occasion. It came to him with a sort of pain that for the first time since he entered their Lordships' House he should be compelled to go into a Lobby different from that which would be occupied by his noble Friends Lord Spencer and Lord Ripon. All his early life was associated with the Irish soil and climate; he had visited her shores since then, and even now he never set foot upon Irish land without feeling that nature re-asserted herself, and a new thrill of impulse stirred within him. He had drunk in with rapture the language of those great men. Flood, Grattan, and Curran; he lived in their lives: he spoke in their speeches; he rejoiced in their aspirations; and, as he walked through College Green, often and often his heart would throb at the thought once more that the bank might be transformed into the House of Parliament. But in looking at a question of this kind he was disposed to ask whether there was any reasonable ground for hesitation? Whatever their impulse might be, there still came the thought to pause and consider before they acted. Speaking for himself alone, he should say that there had not been given due consideration to this measure by the people of the country. He had listened to the speech of the noble Earl last night, and it appeared to him that it was like a man who had built you a house. You objected to the arrangements of the windows, and he altered them; and you objected to the colour of the bricks, and he altered them. Your objections were met, and everything was altered, until he was disposed to ask himself where was the house. He agreed with the noble Earl (Rosebery) that the Irish Question ought not to be considered from the Party standpoint. It ought not to be dealt with in the rivalries and wrangling of Parties, but by sober, wise, and deliberate conference of Englishmen determined to do their best for that which was dearest to them, while doing that which was best designed to meet legitimate aspirations. There were two ways in which great systems of States might be established—namely, federation, as in the United States and Germany, and incorporation or unification, which was the method by which the British Empire had grown. In seeking to set up a separate Legislature in Ireland the Bill seemed like an attempt to put the clock back in English history. It might be that the time had come when we should seek henceforth to pursue the ideal of federation, and when this Parliament should include Representatives of the Colonies as well as of the British Isles, and if he saw in this Bill a nucleus which might afterwards be developed into Imperial federation it would have enormous fascination for him. But while, with regard to the ideal of unification, the Bill was a retrogression, with regard to the ideal of federation it was ill-advised, because it was incapable of indefinite application in other cases. A federation scheme should be great and generous in its conception and framed with a view to its adoption in the case of Scotland and Wales as well as Ireland. This was not the case with the Bill; it dealt with Ireland as an exceptional case; it did not work out the idea of unification; and it did not involve the idea of federation. For these reasons—he might say Constitutional reasons—he was not prepared to give his approval to the Bill, and hesitated to do so. They all knew the Irishmen; the finest gentlemen in the world; loved for their simplicity, their charming expressions and individuality, their honesty, hospitality, and fascinating indolence. He did not mean to say they were idle; but he must say that out of all the races of the world they had rather a strong talent that way. When he said this, he said it with the utmost good temper, but they might have seen them as holiday travellers. But they were the most tenacious people on earth. There was no race under heaven so tenacious of their purpose and determination to have it. The religious feeling was much more deeply set in them than we had any idea of, and while we deplored religious differences we could not ignore them. It was said that ebullitions and outrages were seldom based on religious animosity; but he could not accept that view. Going back to 1798, what took place then? A number of men marched into Wexford to strike a blow for their freedom as they thought; 14,000 turned their hands against the Protestant Party there and massacred them, and transformed what was intended to be a political movement into a religious one, the United Irishmen standing aloof in silent and sullen indignation. They might look forward to better times ; but he did not think the time had come when they could risk the interests of the Empire under the scheme of this Bill. They could hardly understand the passionate attachment of the Irish to freedom. He made no apology for any strong language the Irish had used—everyone used strong language at times. They had all used words they were sorry for, and he thought it was an unfortunate incident of this great contest that the past had been so much raked in order to find the bitter phrases used on one side or the other. Not thus should the question be debated ; if sometimes passionate words had been used on one side or the other, he remembered the words of Edmund Burke — “ I pardon something to earnestness wherever I see it.” Edmund Burke had said that the very Constitution laid down that when Representatives met in the House of Parliament they had no interests beyond the interests of the Empire, and local interests must of necessity be subordinated to the interests of the United Kingdom. He, therefore, must decline to accept the principle that any portion of the Empire under the dominion of Parliament was to be governed by the ideas which happened to prevail in particular localities. He made no apology for any strong language the Irish had used—we all used strong language at times. We had all used words we were sorry for, and he thought it was an unfortunate incident of this great contest that the past had been so much raked in order to find the bitter phrases used on one side or the other. Not thus should the question be debated ; if sometimes passionate words had been used on one side or the other, he remembered the words of Edmund Burke—“ I pardon something to earnestness wherever I see it.” It was said that the apprehended dangers of the Bill were purely imaginary, and that the future was entirely safe. In 1869 he felt it his duty to work against the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, very largely on the ground that the principle on which the measure was advocated was not a sound one for the English people to act upon.

The Bishop of Ripon

The doctrine was that Ireland ought to be governed according to Irish ideas, and that he felt to be so dangerous a principle that he ventured to say at the time—

“ As sure as that principle is allowed, the demand for Home Rule, or whatever they please to call it, could not in consistency be denied ; for if the principle is true, then you must take it with all that follows” ;

and that was exactly what had happened. If they accepted the principle that Ireland was to be governed by Irish ideas, then the day that Ireland asked for separation they were bound to give it her. There was no logical escape from that. But was it likely that the demand for separation would come ? There was one item in the Bill which struck him as very strange—namely, the provision that the collection of the taxes, among other things, should for six years be in the hands of the Imperial Parliament. There was no more unpopular man in the world than the tax-collector ; he was no more popular in Ireland than in England. He remembered that when a friend of his was discussing Home Rule with an Irish peasant he said—“ But, you know, you will have to pay your taxes to Mr. This or That in Dublin.” “ Oh, dear, no !” was the reply. “ Oh, but you will.” “ Oh, dear, no ; they are every one of them far too much the gentleman to ask that.” If the tax-collector was identified in the popular mind, not with the Irish Legislature sitting in Dublin, but with English rule, what chance had they of maintaining anything like the popularity of England among the people. It had been said this Bill did not change things ; that under the Union Ireland had not prospered to the extent it was expected she would. Certainly the Union had had this result—that while 100 years ago the United Irishmen opposed to English rule were the men of Ulster, to-day those men were all that had been described as loyal. The statistics put forward by Lord Playfair proceeded on the old fallacy of post hoc propter hoc. The country had passed through bad and difficult times, and Ireland, so largely agricultural, had suffered greatly in her agriculture, though England had endeavoured to help her as much as she could. England had not been wanting in generosity or sympathy for Ireland, and was ready to help her in the future as in the past. But it was another thing to say that these conditions had sprung from the operation of the Union. He claimed that the Union had done much for Ireland, especially in her manufacturing centres. Supposing this Bill passed the sympathy of those men would be alienated by their being placed at the mercy of the majority, and every Loyalist would be converted into a Separatist. Resolutions had been passed by the Presbyterian and other Bodies deprecating this Bill. There was some risk that this Bill would not be in any sense final, but must stir up certain jealousies, which might develop into further dangers. Therefore, he could not be one to rush forward without thought in such a matter as this, feeling that the Bill might not assuage, but might possibly accentuate difficulties, feeling the question ought not to be dealt with by one Party, but by both Parties in the State, feeling also that every step taken unwarily might land us deeper in the Serbonian bog; believing also that even though there was delay there was enough generosity and enough appreciation in the minds of Irishmen everywhere to know that there was nothing which we would not be ready to grant them in satisfaction of their legitimate aspirations so long as we kept whole that Union and that Empire which is so priceless to us and so indispensable to them.

LORD MONKS WELL said, he wished he could think the right rev. Prelate was right when he spoke in his eloquent speech of the impartial judgment of that House upon the Bill. The speech seemed to him to lead to a lame and impotent conclusion. The right rev. Prelate said that matters were very bad indeed in Ireland, and that that country was hopelessly divided against itself, but he did not suggest a shadow of a remedy except that Ireland should wait. One of his arguments, indeed, was strongly in favour of Home Rule, when he talked of the passionate attachment of Ireland to freedom, and said that no people in the world were so tenacious of their opinions as the Irish people. In supporting the Second Reading of that Bill, he had no wish to make extravagant demands on noble Lords opposite who did not agree with him, and would not ask them, therefore, to share his views as to the merits of Home Rule. All he would urge upon them was that whether this Home Rule policy was good or bad, it was, at all events, the best available under the circumstances, and the only one that had a chance of success. The only alternative policy suggested from the Opposition Benches was another 20 years' resolute government of Ireland. They said, no doubt with sincerity, they were eager to submit the question to the verdict of a General Election, but for that purpose they would have to put before the people this alternative policy of theirs, and they would never get a mandate to carry it out. That policy of "resolute government" had been tried and had failed. There was a time when the objections to that policy came home strongly to noble Lords on the Front Opposition Benches, though they had recanted their opinions in that respect. There was not the slightest doubt those objections would appear very serious to the democracy of England. A fatal obstacle to their obtaining such a mandate from the English people at the next General Election was the want of continuity in their Irish policy. After what happened in 1885, the people of England thoroughly disbelieved in the steadiness of their policy with regard to Ireland in any shape, and he did not think the events from 1886 to 1892 had altered their opinion. The Party opposite had not been steadfast either to Home Rule, Coercion, Revision of Judicial Rents, or Local Government for Ireland. By their own action the Party opposite had entirely cut away the ground from under their own feet, and the people would ask—"What guarantee have we that your resolute government which you ask a mandate for will be really a resolute government." He would ask those who advocated the sacred cause of the Union as against Home Rule why they had not always shown a firm front, and put aside the abhorred, detested, and accursed thing, and why they had made something like a compact or alliance with persons whom they denounced as ruffians of the deepest dye? He hoped to obtain the assent of some, at all events, of the noble Lords opposite to the statements he was about to make. Mr. Gladstone resigned on the 12th June, 1885. Three days afterwards Lord Salisbury began to form a Conservative Government, and the new Government began at once, as they were bound to do, to collect information with a view to formulating a policy. The first step that the new Government took with a view of collecting that information was significant, and had given rise to a good deal of comment. On the very day after Lord Salisbury accepted Office there was sent out from the headquarters of the Conservative Party in London a circular marked private and confidential, asking how many Irish voters there were in the various constituencies where the Irish vote was strong, and whether that vote would be or not sufficiently strong to carry the election. That fact had never been denied from that day to this. The result of that Irish poll could not be announced to Parliament for nearly three weeks after the issue of the circular. Ministers met Parliament on the 6th July, presumably with the interesting information which they had obtained from the issue of that circular. The Lord Chancellor had gone fully into what followed. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach on that day announced that the Coercion Act was to lapse, and he made the statement that permanent coercion for Ireland was absolutely impossible under the circumstances. What was the next development? On July 17, in answer to an appeal from Mr. Parnell, there was a Debate on the Maamtrasna murder. In justice to the Party opposite it should be stated that many Conservative Members were thoroughly disgusted with the conduct of their Leaders in reference to the imputations they cast upon Lord Spencer and his administration of justice. The result was to persuade the Nationalist Party in Ireland that Home Rule was not so absolutely abhorrent to the Conservatives as people had supposed. That was not all. Another circumstance in connection with the Conservative policy was that on July 9, in the House of Commons, Lord Randolph Churchill was asked whether he adhered to certain opinions which he expressed in 1883 strongly denunciatory of the principle of Home Rule? His answer was—

"Anything which I may have said at that time was perfectly justified by the special circumstances of that time, and by the amount of information I may have had in my possession."

It might be supposed that in 1883 Lord Randolph Churchill had not the interesting information at his disposal which had been subsequently obtained in the method indicated. Then a most important utterance was made by Lord Salisbury, at Newport, dealing with the question of Home Rule, and throwing doubts on the efficacy of coercion for putting down boycotting. He went on to say—

"I have never seen any plan or suggestion which gives me the slightest indication that a solution of the problem had been found."

He further said—

"I wish it may be found, but I think we should be holding out false expectations if we avowed a belief which as yet, at all events, we cannot entertain."

Mr. Goschen, on the 10th October, commenting on that speech said—

"Does Lord Salisbury hope, then, that the solution of the Irish Question is to be found in the direction of federation, and that Ireland is to that extent to be separated from the United Kingdom?"

I cannot gather from this oracular sentence what the idea of the Prime Minister is upon the subject. The noble Marquess's Newport speech was followed, as was well known, on the 23rd November by the issue of the Parnellite Manifesto denouncing the Liberal Party. The Duke of Devonshire, at a dinner given to Lord Spencer on the 28th July, 1885, after saying he had no desire to dwell on the declarations made as to Irish policy by Government, said—

"It may be the necessity of the present Government that they should rely on the Party of Mr. Parnell for the conduct of business during the present Session."

And also that it might be their sole chance of securing a majority during the next election to co-operate with the Irish Nationalists. The noble Duke again at Belfast, on the 5th November, said—

"We are of opinion that an offensive and defensive alliance has for some time past existed between the Conservative Party and the Party led by Mr. Parnell."

Again, he said at Matlock—

"He adhered to his opinion that the Conservative Party had set a bad example of political morality."

And at a meeting of the Eighty Club, on the 5th March, 1886, the noble Duke spoke to the same effect. It might be said that a great deal had happened since 1885, and that the Leaders of the Party opposite had changed their minds—that their conduct with regard to coercion from 1886 down to 1892 proved nothing as to their capacity. They knew their only chance of obtaining power was in their devotion to coercion and the Union. The steadfast action of the Government during those years showed that they had a fair share of that intelligence which kept people on the right side of the fence when they saw an infuriated bull on the other. The people could not be induced to believe in the steadfastness of the Conservative Party in any policy of Ireland. Had they any alternative course to Home Rule? Soft words could not turn away the wrath of the Irish people, who would be satisfied with nothing short of Home Rule. Would they refuse to yield to the aspirations of a high-spirited people upon whom they had lately conferred a largely-extended franchise? They had known for 700 years what it was to incur the animosity of the Irish people, and surely that experience had been long and bitter enough to justify them in doing what they could to conciliate and secure the friendship of a warm-hearted people.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY), though reluctant to trouble the House at that period of the Debate, when almost every form of argument had been used, was unwilling to give a silent vote on the question before their Lordships, especially as he was the only Member of that House who, in 1886, felt himself bound to leave the Government of that day. That was a step which no one could take with a light heart and without great sorrow, but it was a step which he had never regretted having taken. Subsequent events had confirmed the opinions upon which he acted at that time. The Bill of 1886, condemned as it was by Parliament and the country, had been condemned to a still greater degree by its authors themselves by the production of the new measure now on their Lordships' Table. He almost thought the Government might have expressed gratitude to the Unionist Party for saving them from the discredit of passing the Bill of 1886, which they had acknowledged to have been a bad Bill by their substitution of the present one. But was the measure before the House really an improvement on the former one? Did it comply with any of the tests which the Prime Minister himself and Earl Spencer had at different times laid down as the tests with which any Home Rule scheme ought to comply? The measure was not a real settlement of the question. They had been told that "provisional" was written across every page of it. In the public discussions of this subject, much had been said about giving the management of their own affairs to the Irish people. If that phrase had merely meant a delegation of definite powers to Ireland to manage her own local affairs under proper restrictions, and with adequate securities for the supremacy of Parliament, he probably should not vote as he intended to do that night. But the Bill meant far more than that. It meant giving, not a subordinate, but a co-ordinate Legislature and Executive to Ireland, and in doing that the scheme involved grave dangers to the Empire and jeopardised the integrity of the Constitution. There were British, and English, and Irish questions involved in this matter, and he was astonished that no stress had been laid on them by noble Lords opposite. He had listened in vain for any reference to them in the speech of the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who gave but a lukewarm support, not to the Bill at all, but to the principle in the abstract; as to the principle in the concrete, he took very good care not to commit himself to a single word in it. What was the justification for the Bill? It was said that the Bill was demanded by the Representatives of the Irish people, and he did not deny it; but it was demanded by them as the right of a nation, and the noble Lord opposite who spoke last night stated in precise terms that Ireland was a nation. Why, then, were they denied national rights—for surely it was not contended that the Bill gave all that a nation was entitled to? The nationality was asserted, and, at the same time, the national aspirations had not been satisfied. If there were limits beyond which the demands of the majority should be restricted, they should be the limits of national morality and national expediency, and no Government responsible for the welfare of this realm ought to confer on any part of it rights that would endanger the safety of the Empire or the integrity of the Constitution. He would carry the argument one step further, and ask to what area were these rights to be confined? Why, if these rights were granted to Ireland, should similar rights be refused to Scotland, Wales, and Yorkshire? Still more, why should the right to be maintained in union with England be refused to Ulster when she demanded it by her masses and her classes? Were their Lordships prepared to go against the experience of yesterday? Were they prepared to accept these doctrines for Scotland and Wales, and other parts of the Kingdom? As the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Ripon) had said, though in somewhat different form—

“Federalism is surely a step forward, when it combines unconnected or semi-coherent communities; it is a step backward when you are disintegrating a United Kingdom.”

He would not deal with the other proposition advanced by the Government in bringing forward this Bill, that it was impossible for a British Parliament to deal fairly and justly with Irish problems. He was not there for a moment to deny that Ireland had been the victim of bad government in the past, but during the last 30 or 40 years our legislation had been just and generous towards Ireland, and he felt sure that if this unfortunate somersault had not been executed by noble Lords opposite seven years ago further liberal legislation would have been granted to Ireland in the shape for which the noble Earl (Lord Rosebery) said she had so passionate a desire—namely, local self-government. It takes generations to allay the animosities of centuries. But he would ask noble Lords opposite who talked of the impossibility of our doing justice to Ireland whether they were not somewhat to blame in fanning the flame of separation by encouraging the Irish Representatives in their hopes of getting absolute power in that country, and bribing the tenants by holding out to them that they would get their land for nothing or for pittance value? Was it by encouraging those political and pecuniary motives that the solution of the great problem of Irish difficulties would be facilitated? The noble Lord opposite last night gave the House some interesting statistics with regard to the failure of the Union. Among other things, he said that the failure of certain crops was a sign that the Union had failed. If the noble Lord examined the agricultural statistics of this country he would find that the area under wheat had very much diminished. He thought that the reduction of the area under wheat might with equal logic be attributed to the Union—that the diminished yield per acre was just as much attributable to that event as the reduction of the area under potatoes. Even if the case of the Government was stronger as to Ireland, there would be the question, Would it be safe for the Empire to allow Ireland, geographically linked as she was to England, to have an independent position? He would ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to consult his naval and military advisers whether, under this Bill, the position of England would be as secure as it was now that she had the administration of Ireland. It had been said that the Act of Union was justified both by then existing external danger and by internal revolution. In the present state of Europe and of the world, was it impossible that England might be in as perilous a position at some future day as she was then? Then as to the Parliament constituted by this Bill, a question which vitally affected Great Britain. It was simply pedantry and cant to say that the voice of Great Britain was not to be consulted. When so vast a change was contemplated with regard to the retention of the Irish Members noble Lords opposite could never make up their minds what they would do. They first excluded them, then they included them for Imperial affairs, and then included them for all purposes. It seemed to him that having now nailed their weathercock to the mast they had adopted in the end the most dangerous of those proposals. No Irish matters would come before the Imperial Parliament, and yet a solid mass of Irish Members were brought there who had no local responsibilities. He would like to know what the electors of Great Britain would say when this clause was put before them, and they found that the irresponsible Members from Ireland would have larger powers in the management of Scotch affairs than Scotland herself. It would be remembered that the Reform Bill of 1884 added 500,000 to the Irish electorate, and one most important question raised on this Bill was that Ireland was very much over-represented at this present time in Parliament, and that the loyal minority were very much under-represented. With regard to the loyal minority, they were in a perilous position scattered throughout the different parts of Ireland. He remembered that the Duke of Devonshire, who was then a Member of the Liberal Cabinet, used the argument that he was not inclined to attach too much importance to the exact numerical strength of the Loyalist Irishmen. In any case, he said that representation could not be very large, and the real Representatives of the loyal minority were to be found in the 550 Members for England and Scotland, the vast majority of whom agreed more closely with the minority in Ireland than with the majority. That statement had not been repudiated, and therefore he assumed that it was accepted by the Colleagues of the noble Duke; and he asked whether it was fair, now that the effect of that Reform Bill was beginning to be seen, that those men who said the Bill would expose them to spoliation and oppression, and who had stood by us in days gone by should be sacrificed? Had there been only one Chamber in the British Legislature he had some doubts as to whether the Bill would have passed it. In all the other Constitutions of the civilised world a distinction was drawn between Constitutional and fundamental laws and those which were not. We had no such distinction. The theory and practice of our Constitution was that Parliament was supreme. That being so, a very heavy responsibility rested on their Lordships. They were asked to try an experiment which they could not undo. That experiment involved surrender to the disloyal; it involved betrayal of the loyal. It involved dangers to the Empire and to the Constitution, and before it was passed their Lordships were bound to give the people of Great Britain an opportunity—the first opportunity they had had—of discussing the main lines on which the Bill was based and the manner in which it had been passed. Every effort would be made to discredit their Lordships' House; every device would be used to conceal the real effect of the measure, and to wrap it up in other measures which might make it more palatable; but, unless the flame of patriotism burned low in this country, unless our generation was oblivious of its great Imperial and Constitutional traditions, he, for one, felt little doubt that the verdict of the country would support the vote their Lordships' House was going to give, and would with scorn and indignation reject this dangerous and unjust measure.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY; My Lords, I feel that there is some satisfaction in occupying the position, which probably I hold, as that of the last person who will make a speech against Home Rule in the course of the present Session. But, although it is a position which has in it much of distinction and honour, it cannot be denied that there are inconveniences attaching to it. Many active and powerful minds have passed before on the path that I must follow. I am not only gleaning after gleaners, but gleaning after a long succession of gleaners who leave few ideas that I can venture to submit to your Lordships. But that consideration at least has this counterbalancing value—that, if not out of pity for your Lordships, if not out of a sense of the propriety of the situation, still out of mere poverty of ideas, it is impossible for me to detain your Lordships long upon this last critical night. I confess that throughout this Debate the one idea that has been present to my mind has been—Why have they introduced this Bill? I had hoped for some satisfaction from the various able speakers on the Government side, but, though their speeches were interesting and powerful and showed great intellectual resource, they showed that resource in nothing more remarkably than in the ingenuity with which every speaker avoided speaking of the Government Bill. The noble and learned Lord who spoke this evening made a few perfunctory remarks upon the Bill, but when he came to the matters of real conflict he was careful to point out that he did not agree with the Government on the subject. When he dealt with the retention of the Irish Members, which is an outrage upon England so enormous and so grotesque that I am surprised that it has ever found a place in any proposition emanating from a responsible Government—when he dealt with that he at once said he was not inclined to associate himself with so desperate a cause. He at once said he would have preferred some other arrangement very much. Then, when he dealt with the abandonment of the landlords, with the certain ruin of a whole class to whom, if to anybody, the honour of this country is pledged that their diminished resources should be enjoyed in security and peace—when he dealt with that he said—“You did not support what we gave you in 1886, and although I think your present fate is very terrible, still you must acknowledge you have brought it on yourselves by resisting us.” And the noble and learned Lord finished his account of his own intellectual position by protesting, with a vigour which I have no doubt was perfectly sincere, against anybody desiring to know what was the real opinion of any Cabinet Minister upon any Cabinet Bill. Well, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary last night was even more instructive. I have no doubt that he had in his mind some grave important delivery worthy of the position which he occupies and of the esteem with which he is held, which should guide the Houses of Parliament along the difficult path which the perplexities of modern times have forced them to go over. But when he came to the Bill he did what I have often observed in speakers with a singular facility for the lighter and most humorous kinds of speech. He took refuge in that in order to save himself from the necessity of expressing a grave opinion upon any grave subject whatever. But I admired the skill with which the noble Lord avoided the burning subjects of the day. He was oppressed with the restrictions of the time within which his observations were compressed. He felt that it was impossible to press the House too far, and yet he gave us a full quarter of an hour discussing the tactics of the Opposition in the House of Commons, which I should have thought, of all possible subjects, was the least fitted for discussion within these walls. But the effect was such as to reduce the time at his disposal so much that when he came to the question of the Ulster objection to this Bill he simply turned over his leaves and said that time would not allow him to deal with the Ulster question. With respect to the question of the admission of 80 Members—foreigners—to take care of our English legislation, the noble Lord was equally happy. He said that it was impossible for him, in view of the prejudice of the great numbers on this side, to do anything but discuss principles, and therefore he would not discuss details. And the admission of the Irish members was merely a question of detail, and therefore he would not discuss it at all. It must be admitted that we did not gain very much guidance from the speech of the Foreign Secretary. But I am not sure that in saying that I imply any derogation from the high esteem in which we hold his dexterity and skill. On the contrary, it seemed to me that the problem which he set himself to solve was, “How shall I get through an hour and a quarter’s speech without undertaking any pledge which may be inconvenient to me in the future?” And if that was the problem which he set himself to solve, I am bound to say that he solved it with absolute success. There is not a word or a sentence in the noble Lord’s speech which can be used against him on any future occasion, except that particularly precious remark about the dangerous character of the London County Council, to which we shall refer on future occasions. I will not speak of the noble Lord who introduced this Bill. He had a very painful position to reconcile. He had got himself, by his own confession—though one of the most chivalrous and honourable of human beings—into an admission that he had committed a very mean and treacherous act. I am quite sure that he has not intentionally committed any mean or treacherous act; but it is impossible to refuse one’s sympathy to a man who by his own admission can find himself in a corner like that. But the noble Lord had a peculiar way of dealing with political opponents. He stated their case with great fairness; he said, “Noble Lords opposite say this and say that,” and then he follows it with the formula, “I do not agree with them.” Having got so far, he went no further, and he never offered any refutation of the position or arguments he impugned. With the help of that formula it was easy to construct a defence of the Government Bill, which could not be defended by any other formula whatever. I have omitted one remarkable observation of the Foreign Secretary which affects the position of the Government with which I was connected eight years ago. I must say that this recalling of ancient history is rather hard on one; and it is difficult to carry one's memory back to all that happened in those times. My memory is simply prosaic, and possibly so far defective; but the noble Lord's memory is active and poetical, and it surrounded the history of the year 1885 with a brilliant atmosphere of legend, which I have no doubt will be the delight of poetical critics of the future. But I take this opportunity just to set the facts upon their true footing. The noble Lord represented that we, differing from the coercive policy of the Government of Lord Spencer, broke the continuity of that coercive policy, and thereby cut under the feet of the Liberal Party, and rendered it impossible for them to pursue a coercive policy in the future. I dislike the use of that word coercive. I dislike it, because coercion is usually used to describe the legislation which defends a Government against the political efforts of those who desire to overthrow it. That is the use which the word has obtained in every country in the world. But this is a case where the word is applied simply to the making more efficient of the Criminal Law for dealing with those criminals whom everybody condemns. There is, unfortunately, a small portion of the peasantry of Ireland who have formed this ideal for themselves — a general establishment and sanction of fraudulent insolvency, sustained by attempts at murder. And to prevent the application of that novel ethical code there is no doubt that from time to time the powers of the ordinary Courts have been increased and their efficiency in detecting and punishing crime augmented. If you like to call that coercive you may; but it is not coercive in the sense in which the word has been applied in every political disquisition during the last century in Europe. But, passing from that divergence, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary stated or implied that in 1885 we had summarily interrupted the current of coercive legislation, as I have defined it, and that thus it was impossible for the Liberal Party to undertake such legislation again. What really happened was this. There was a terminable Crimes Act. It was an Act which was to terminate in 1885. It was an Act which was to terminate when the Session of 1885 terminated. It may have been the intention of the Government of that day to renew it; but on the 6th of June, when the Division was taken by which their official existence was terminated, they had not produced upon the Table of Parliament a single clause in order to revive and perpetuate the law to which they were supposed to attach so much importance. If the Bill was not perpetuated it was their fault. They had a majority in Parliament. We had only this consideration to deal with; we had not the majority of Parliament. It was open to us to take the ordinary Constitutional resource and dissolve at once. That would not have given the Crimes Act to us immediately, but it would have given us that Act later. But the question was whether, in view of the Reform Bill which had just been passed, it being certain that another Dissolution would be necessary within a few months, it was justifiable to inflict on the people of this country and Members of Parliament that amount of inconvenience in order to accelerate the necessary strengthening of the provisions of the law by a few months. We thought, in view of the then position of Ireland, that the autumn might be safely passed without any such drastic measure which would have created such great inconvenience; and before we resigned, before our position was attacked, a Representative of our Government in the House of Commons had announced our intention to strengthen the Criminal Law. Those, therefore, who say that they changed their opinions because we had not been sufficiently prompt in reinforcing the Criminal Law forget that they did not change their opinions until after the declaration of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, after that miserable excuse, such as it was, had been taken from them. But what would you think of any statesman who had announced his attachment to the great principle of union between the two countries, and was dependent on the question of whether his political opponents had revived or had not revived for two or three months certain provisions of the law? What would Mr. Pitt have thought if he could have foreseen that his distinguished relative in the present intended so to guide his political conduct that he was willing to shatter at a blow the whole edifice which Mr. Pitt had raised, because the Tories by delaying criminal legislation for a few months had cut the ground from under the feet of the Liberal Party. I confess that the excuse seems to me a sadder remark of the degeneracy of political opinion than all the tergiversation which has taken place during the lamentable eight years through which we have passed. There was yet another defender on the Government side, Lord Ribblesdale. His view, at all events, had the advantage of being so remarkable that I do not think that anybody else had taken it before, or that any one else will take it hereafter. He belongs to what may be called the noble army of confessors in this Debate. Confession is a very interesting element in literature. From St. Augustine to Rousseau, from Rousseau to Lord Ribblesdale, it is a most interesting record of the working of individual minds. But he seems to have conceived the idea that if there was anything in the Union, anything in the policy which Mr. Pitt had taken up 90 years ago after the experience of centuries, it ought to be established and proved by the popularity which it would win among Irish agitators within the space of six years, and when he found with inconceivable surprise that Mr. Healy and Mr. Sexton and their followers were not impressed with the advantages of resolute government in Ireland he at once concluded that Mr. Pitt was wrong, and turned round with all the vigour which a Gladstonian Peer might be expected to display. But I would represent to him that he must not commit the very ordinary mistake of imagining that all men are like himself. You cannot count on the maintainers of Nationalist or Fenian or Moonlighting opinion in Ireland changing their opinion with the rapidity which we have been happy to see Gladstonian Peers and commoners have been able to exercise during the last eight years. Alertness and agility are always admirable qualities. We always desire to see them exercised whether by mind or body, but the peculiar rapidity with which this exercise of turning Dervishes has been exerted by the Gladstonian Party is peculiar to itself, and cannot be paralleled in any portion of the annals of this country, or any other country of which I have ever heard. That was not the most remarkable part of Lord Ribblesdale's speech. The most remarkable part of Lord Ribblesdale's speech was that which it did not contain. It did not contain one single reference to the Bill which he was put up to defend. Being a man of great ingenuity, and not shrinking evidently from intellectual paradox, it is very remarkable that he did not attempt to establish the value of one single clause in the Bill which had been committed to his care to recommend to the House. My Lords, I feel that we are in some difficulty owing to these peculiar tactics on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Of course, if they like to move that a Bill should be read a second time, and then say, in a half whisper, "But we cannot bear it" all the time; it places, I will not say the votes, but the arguments of the House in considerable difficulty, because, though our votes, as we are happy to believe, will entirely sustain the secret wishes of the supporters of the Government, it is very difficult for us to argue against them when we know they absolutely agree with us on every point. Well, my Lords, I ask myself again, "Why have they brought in this Bill?" We have obtained no information from the speeches which they have delivered. I am not surprised at it. But have we any information from earlier discussions? We used to hear something about the Colonies. We were told that there was the remarkable case of Quebec, where the grant of a Home Rule Bill had produced absolute agreement between classes that were formerly divided. I have some doubt as to the historical value of that illustration. I am told that Quebec is not that perfect Garden of Eden which some would induce us to imagine, but that the minority is being crowded out by the majority, and will very soon disappear altogether. I am told also that in Quebec alone of Her Majesty's Possessions on that Continent, a large Party has, through its Leader, avowed treasonable views with respect to the connection of the Colony with the Crown. I should not, therefore, be inclined to take Quebec for my example, even if it were in any degree relevant. But is it relevant? Is it possible to compare the position of a Constitutional Colony under the Crown with the position you propose to establish for Ireland under this Bill? Has there been for the last century any statesman so bold that he would propose to Parliament that a Colony should not only enjoy autonomy such as the British Colonies enjoy, but should also have the privilege of sending 80 or 100 Members to the Imperial Parliament, representing no interests in England, bound by no attachment to England, lying under no responsibility with respect to the possible application of the laws passed here to the community they represent, and yet possessing an absolute vote, a vote as large as that of any of the Representatives of the country, on all questions which in the relations of life concern the people of this country often most deeply? My Lords, it is absurd. Such a proposition would not only have "counted out" a man; it would have sent him to Bedlam. The suggestion is inconceivable, that the interjection of 80 foreigners, who will suffer in no degree, and whose constituents will not suffer from anything they do, should have a special, isolated, and distinct privilege, due not to their character or their achievements in the past, of determining the position of the English Government. It is a matter of intense importance, for they attempt to tell you that this Home Rule is recommended by colonial experience. But colonial experience means that foreign affairs shall be given to England and domestic affairs shall be given to a colony. Never in any quarter of the world did the wildest theorist suggest that 80 Members for a Colony should have the power of legislating on English subjects and interests. That is one of the grounds on which we were told that Home Rule was desirable; but that is a theoretic ground. There was one practical ground which I used to hear in the past, I do not hear much of it now—namely, that we should get rid of all Irish questions and friction with Irish Members. I do not think there is any suggestion of that kind now. How are we to get rid of Irish questions? We have provided for 80 Irish Members, who must have something to talk about, and who must establish their position in the House of Commons in order to make themselves marketable wares in their negotiations with Ministers, and are we to expect that they will be treated as nothing less than foreign adjuncts to the British Parliament? Difficulty has undoubtedly arisen from many questions connected with Irish Government, but hitherto Irish questions have not included some of the matters which you have provided for discussion in the future Irish Legislature if it should exist. There is the religious question. You have provided that there is to be nothing in the nature of a religious establishment or of religious denominational education; these are put out of the power of the Irish Legislature. I am not discussing the wisdom or the unwisdom of such restrictions; but I do not imagine that that is the way to peace and quietness on Irish Questions. Your 80 Members sent mainly by Archbishop Walsh will not be quiet on the question of whether denominational education is to be allowed in Ireland, or whether the existing system is to be overset. They will not be silent on the question whether the Roman Catholic Church ought or ought not to be endowed. I am not saying whether it is wise or foolish, but you are merely deceiving yourselves if you imagine you can shut these things out from the Irish Parliament and allow 80 Irish Members to sit in the House of Commons, if you imagine that you can get rid of the Irish question by so contradictory a policy as that. Again, take the question of Free Trade. In this country we support Free Trade on account of the benefits it has conferred on certain industries; but it has been a sentence of death to agriculture in many parts of the country. How will Ireland look at Free Trade? She has no manufactures; she is all agricultural, and if an Irish Parliament asks itself how it stands with regard to the question of Free Trade I am afraid the answer must be very similar to that which was made by an Irish juryman who, finding himself alone in his opinion in the box, said he had never before met with 11 men so obstinate. We are absolutely alone. I do not say we are wrong by any means; but do you imagine you will shut out the question of Free Trade from discussion by an Irish Legislature, and that, with 80 Members in the House of Commons, without employment and free to do as they like, you have made any provision for getting rid of Irish friction and preventing Irish waste of time? The Irish Question will be with you as it has been in the past, only more intensely than in the past; and it will be so as the result of the provisions you have deliberately adopted. In the speeches of noble Lords opposite I see no hope of escape from Irish friction. I see nothing in the false, misleading, and wholly fallacious parallel instituted with the Colonies to explain the object and aim which the Government have in view in proposing this Bill to the House. But what appears to me to be visible through all their arguments is that it is a policy of despair. They say—"We have not known how to succeed, and we must try something nobody has tried before." That is the position in which their arguments stand. It is true they are proposing something nobody has tried before; but they have no right, in resorting to the policy of despair, to ask you to take a step which involves the existence of the happiness and prosperity of a very large minority of the Irish people and of those who are distinguished by prosperity, by industry, by education, and by success. They have no right to ask you to make these things a subject of experiment, and to set them on the hazard, to be destroyed if they fail, in order to carry out a policy of despair because we have failed. Have we failed? Has the existing state of things failed? The state of things between England and Ireland is this. Ireland is a country which from the first has been deeply divided to the base by perpetual differences and conflicts. It is a society in which unity has never existed. When the English came seven centuries ago they did not diminish these divergencies, but they did not increase them; they existed as they had existed before. When the era of religious conflict arrived it was not true that the differences were caused by religion, but the differences assumed a religious character. They did not differ because they differed on religion, but their views upon religion lent themselves to the native constant, incurable differences and quarrelsomeness of the race. And so it passed through the era of religious dissension, and then came the period of representative Government. Representative Government is a splendid instrument of human happiness when the community is so homogeneous that division on one point shall not imply division on another; but that men will, according as each question is raised, range themselves according to their opinions, and give their voices for the benefit of themselves and of the community without passion,

antipathy, or prejudice. But when there is a deep division, a division of race or a division of religion, a division which no experience can efface, a division which men will not give up on account of any lower secular motive, a division which goes from father to son and lasts from generation to generation, a division which rests upon tradition and sentiment and not upon any mere pursuit of individual interest, then representative institutions, if they are applied without a corrective, are the most dangerous curse that can be inflicted upon such a community. They continue, they deepen, they intensify those divisions, and ascendancy, on one side or the other as the circumstances of the age may give to either side the predominance—ascendancy and oppression are the results of representative government applied to a community so divided if there is no corrective. The only possible corrective is the fusion into a larger community in which such divisions have no influence. When the rebellion of '98 was over, and the miscarriage of that wild, chivalrous, but most unwise dream of Grattan had been exposed, Mr. Pitt had to consider, with the centuries behind him to guide him, how the peace of Ireland was to be insured. To do it with a strong hand was not possible; the date had passed for that. It might have been done a century or two centuries before, but in his day the thing was no longer possible, and no longer desirable if it had been possible. He felt that the only remedy was to fuse these conflicting parties, whom nothing could bring together, in the ranks of a larger community, where their peculiar subject of conflict was unknown, and where, therefore, in a common assembly the issues that were raised upon them could be impartially and equitably judged. That was the philosophy of his policy. Has it failed? It was not fairly tried. There were no words in the speech of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary that I so thoroughly agreed with as when he dwelt upon the fact that Mr. Pitt's experiment was never fairly tried. If Mr. Pitt could have repealed the Catholic disabilities, if he could have endowed the Roman Catholic priesthood, if he could have abolished or commuted the tithe in Ireland, I have no doubt that all the troubles which have haunted the connection between England and Ireland would have been a mere matter of imagination and never passed into history. It was one of the most terrible blows in our history that fate has dealt us the decree that at that moment there should be a Sovereign whose disease was too far progressed to allow him to judge soundly of the circumstances of the moment, and whose disease was not far enough advanced to allow the decision to be placed in other hands. It was a fearful, fearful calamity, and we have staggered under it ever since. But when you judge whether the Union has succeeded you must ask yourselves how long has the true experiment of the Union been in force. The union which Mr. Pitt dreamt of was a union from which the thorn of religious bitterness should have been extracted. The first, the essential step, was not taken till '29; the next step, the commutation of tithe, was not taken till '35; the last step was taken in a manner which, to my mind, was the worst manner, and was not the manner intended by Mr. Pitt; I mean the establishment of equality between Catholics and Protestants—it was not taken in the manner intended by Mr. Pitt, but by that time the Liberal Party had passed under the control of one of its most pitiless and exacting masters, the Nonconformist conscience. I heartily wish concurrent endowment could have been adopted, but it was too late. But at all events, badly or wisely, the full scheme which Mr. Pitt had in view was not carried out till 1870. Therefore, when you judge his work, you must judge it, not as it passed from his hand, not as he intended it to operate; you must judge it as it was affected by the lamentable disturbing influences of the time through which it must needs pass, and yet, with all that deduction, will you tell me that Union has not been a success? I listened very carefully and with very great interest to the noble Lord, Lord Playfair. I was very much interested at his efforts to prove that the Union had not been a success; for I knew that if any man could do it he could. If anybody could have proved that it was the noble Lord and with the figures and statistics and facts which he turned and waved in his hands he could produce any result or impression which he pleased, according to the impulse which he gave them by his own deft manipulation. Yet all he proved was that Ireland had not improved so fast as England and Scotland, that is the whole proof he could give of the failure of the Union. I say, with national humiliation, that England has not improved so fast as Scotland during that period, but that is the result of that extreme superiority in respect of all money getting affairs which is shown by all those who are born north of the Tweed. So it is in Ireland, where undoubtedly nature has not gifted the people with those powers of rapid progress which are displayed both north and south of the Tweed; but the proof is this: Living is happier, houses are better, wages are higher, prosperity is greater, trade has risen, cultivation is more extended; and, if I may turn to the moral side, though we have dark spots like Clare, Kerry, and Limerick, there is no question that it is impossible to compare the Ireland of 1893 with the Ireland of 1801 in respect of order, of law, and of property. The Lord Chancellor himself admitted to-night that though much was said of the impossibility of landlords obtaining rent, and of the injury to landed property which has been caused, yet over five-sevenths of Ireland at this time, amid all the circumstances of depression which we know so well, amid falling markets and inclement skies, rent is better paid than it is in any part of England. Could you have said that at the beginning of the century, and if there is that change, have you not a right to say that the Union bears its part in the glory and the honour which that change demands? That being so, what reason have you for this experiment, whose details nobody will defend, whose results nobody can foresee? What reason have we for it? Lord Ribblesdale was very much struck with the fact that the result of our legislation was that all the Nationalist leaders did not at once fall into our arms. As far as I have read human history, I do not think that has been the way of insurrectionary leaders. My impression is that they have, generally speaking, stuck to their opinions, and that though facts may have left them, they have never left the facts. They have never given themselves up to their opponents so long as there was a shred to fight for. It is an utter blunder, a blunder of the gravest character, to look at the contentment of the people as exhibited at the polls for a test of the success of your commercial, economical, or political legislation. It will be a test two generations hence. The grandsons will love you because you have been just to the grandfathers; but it takes long to change the opinion of a nation, of a people, or of a Party. Gladstonian Peers imagine that it takes only as long to change the opinions of a Party as it takes to change their own, but that is a lamentable error. The mass of mankind are much stauncher than that. Men hold to their beliefs and will not desert them, and a community changes its opinion not in any great degree by a change in the opinion of the individuals of which it is composed, as by the fact that the men who have grown up in one set of opinions and clung to them die off, and others who had no cause to form those opinions succeed and take their place. That is the history of a change in the opinion of a community; and to ask that within the limits of the Septennial Act results of a salutary policy shall be depicted in the change of opinion which local politicians may show, is to exhibit absolute ignorance of the working of human nature in the political world, whether in its highest or its lowest developments. Men do not change like that. I maintain, therefore, that the Union has not failed. It has had terrible difficulties to contend with. It has had the destruction of the food of the people, a destruction unparalleled in any nation, a destruction which has left in the mind of Lord Playfair the somewhat simple-minded wonder why there are not so many potatoes produced after the famine as there were before. He evidently thinks the aphis vastator was a mere agent of the British Government. Ireland has had to contend with a change of commercial policy. Free Trade has hit her very hard; yet in spite of these things, in spite of the utter destruction of the food of the people, in spite of the religious thorn which it has taken 70 years to extract, the Union is marked in all its progress in the moral, legal, social, economical, and commercial position of the people, which I should have thought would have warned the most careless and the most hasty from declaring that it was a failure. If it is not a failure,

what rashness it is to shatter this structure in order to plunge into new experiments of which you know nothing, and the result of which you have no means of predicting. I heard again and again the demand on the other side for some policy of ours. I will repeat it, and I will give the policy which we recommend in the language of two great men. One shall be the language of Mr. Gladstone—"Patient continuance in well-doing," and the other shall be the language of President Lincoln—"Keep on pegging away." Those are the lines you have to follow, and you will follow them more safely than these rash experiments with machinery which you have never tried, with theories which you have never tested, and by placing weapons in the hands of men who have always hated you. I am told by the Colonial Secretary that the first object of government is the satisfaction and contentment of the governed. That is a fine copy-book formula, but, like all copy-book formulas, it requires to be corrected in accordance with particular circumstances. There may be cases in which other people besides the governed have an interest in the condition of the country to which reference is made. But my first objection to this valuable formula is that it is physically incapable of being applied in the case of Ireland. I will defy you to devise any system of government that shall be in the true and literal sense to the satisfaction of the governed, for three-fifths of the governed will like it and two-fifths of the governed will detest it. It is an absurdity, because it is impossible. The mere existence of the loyalist minority, the mere existence of Ulster, would condemn that copy-book formula and make it impossible of application to Ireland. Do not, I entreat you, dismiss as a mere figment of the imagination, or as the mere outcome of a heated brain, the apprehensions which the Ulster people have of the government which is to be established in Ireland under this Bill. I am told that those who will form the Government will be the elected of the people of Ireland, but I know they will be the men, if this Bill passes, who have achieved the victory to which the Government will be due. Go to Belgium, Italy, Greece, America. You will find that wherever there has been a revolution the men who have made the revolution have been the great men after the revolution has been effected ; they have been the men who have been placed in power. Well, do you really know who the men are who will be placed in power ? Our recollections disappear somewhat rapidly in these times ; but you know that a large number of them have had their connection with crime investigated by a Special Commission, and that the exact nature of that connection has been recorded by Judges of the highest capacity and undoubted integrity, and no shred of evidence had ever been produced to negative the decision that was pronounced. This is the Report of the Special Commission—

“ We find that the respondents did not denounce the system of intimidation which led to crime and outrage, but persisted in it with knowledge of its effects.”

That is the judicial decision, given after months of investigation, and you know that among the leading men who are urging forward this Bill a large number were respondents in this examination. There were 38 men, whose names I have here, and who are now Members of Parliament, upon whose brows that condemnation was stamped—38 men, and remember, this Bill passed the Third Reading by 34 majority. It is a Bill which has not only been passed by a South-Irish majority, not only been passed by men elected by the carefully-watched illiterates, not only passed under the orders of Archbishop Walsh, but passed by men on whom this criminal brand had been placed by three of the highest Judges. Is not Ulster right to be afraid ? Would you yourselves wish to submit to such domination ? Would you not struggle against it to the last ? Would you not make every effort in your power to prevent yourselves, your families, your fortunes, and your fame from being placed in such hands as these ? And yet this is what you are invited to do by passing this Bill. My Lords, my time is running short, and the only other point to which I would draw your attention is the large Imperial character of this question. The Lord Chancellor said that this Bill would reconcile to us the people, the statesmen, of America, and that if we went to war we should not have to reckon with so hostile an America as we might otherwise expect. But is there not another possible view of the matter ? Supposing the effect of this Bill were to place Ireland in the hands of those who detested us, and that trouble arose with America, should we not then be in an infinitely worse position than any which a continuance of the present state of things could possibly put us into ? Remember the great privilege of the position of Great Britain. On some sides our coasts lie against those of Continental Powers. But against the great mass of our coasts on the west and north-west we have our own territory in our own possession, and we are practically safe from any attack, and especially in these days when the neighbourhood of harbours is essential for naval action, if one has cause to anticipate it. That is our present strategical position, and it is one of the finest strategical positions in the world. Give over Ireland to your enemies, to those who hate you. Let the ordinary government of Ireland be conducted by those who are hostile to you—I do not say it need ever reach the point of civil war, let it be simply hatred and hostility—then all those harbours of Ireland which lie over against the harbours of this country would be at the mercy of the enemy who attacked you, and unless you chose to undertake the task of reconquering Ireland and shattering by mere military force the structure you are now so painfully building up, you would have no security from the sympathy which the Irish in command of their own harbours could give to the Navies or privateers or cruisers by whom your trade might be threatened. I have seen a paper by a very distinguished naval officer, who knows his work very well, and who says that in any future war the trade route of England could no longer pass along the Channel—the batteries of torpedoes that line the opposite coast would be too dangerous ; that our trade route must be taken to the Western ports of England, to Liverpool and Glasgow and Bristol, and that as long as Ireland is ours and we can be sure that she will not join the enemy, so long will such transference be safe and right. I am not speaking of good will. I accept the proposition that we should in either case have Ireland's good will ; but if we leave things as they are we should have the control of our coasts. If we pass this measure the control of the coasts would pass to those who wish nothing so much as our suffering and downfall. It is surely very rash, nothing can be rasher, than for mere imaginary objects to run such a risk. Nothing could be rasher than to sacrifice that which we deem our secular strength and privilege and to expect that on the other side of the Channel we shall be exposed to the attack of no enemy. That you are asked to give up with no other security for your well-being and safety than this wretched optimist trust in the good will of the people upon whom you have to depend, a trust that would be madness if they were ordinary men, because the incitement and suggestion of making a profit out of it would be too great—a trust that is something more than madness when you are dealing with a race of people and an organisation that for centuries has hated you and longed to obtain your downfall. Those are great concessions. My time is passed. I will not urge you further, but I will ask before I conclude to call back to you what the opinion in this country used to be before these terrible changes took place, when the Liberal Party was still in the hands of Liberal politicians, and not in the hands of deserters who had traversed every zone of political opinion. When the Liberal Party was in the hands of Liberal politicians we might distrust them and disagree with them as to local and interior questions, but we felt sure that in all Imperial questions their heart beat as true to the Empire of England as ours. Let me read to you what was said by a man who was no Orangeman, by a man who lost his own seat at the most critical period of his political life because he would befriend the Roman Catholics, by a man who was armed with every instrument of historical knowledge, and whose opinion was deeply pledged on the side of the Liberal Party, and against those who sit on this side of the House. I will read to you what he said upon the maintenance of the Union, and I will ask you on which side he would be sitting if he had now to take part in politics. When he uttered these words he was sitting on the Liberal side, and Mr. Gladstone was sitting on the Conservative side. Lord Macaulay said—

“The repeal of the Union we regard as fatal to the Empire, and we will never consent to it—never, though the country should be surrounded by dangers as great as those which threatened her when her American Colonies and France and Spain and Holland were leagued against her, or when the armed neutrality of the Baltic disputed her maritime rights—never, though another Buonaparte should pitch his camp in sight of Dover Castle, never till all has been staked and lost, never till the four quarters of the world have been convulsed by the last struggle of the great English people for their place among the nations.”

I read that as the motto which I hope the Unionist Party will adopt. If England withdraws her mandate; if England tells us she wishes that this horror should be consummated, I agree that a different state of things will have arisen. I believe that to be impossible, and that, as long as England is true to herself now or on any future occasion, if you allow this atrocious, this mean, this treacherous revolution to pass, you will be untrue to the duty which has descended to you from a splendid ancestry, you will be untrue to your highest traditions, you will be untrue to the trust that has been bequeathed to you from the past, you will be untrue to the Empire of England.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): If the noble Marquess thought fit at the outset of his speech to make some apology to your Lordships for having to address you after so many speeches have been heard, not only here, but in the other House and all over the country, on this well-worn theme, I feel sure I shall have the sympathy of those whom I address in the task I have to perform. The noble Marquess commenced with some criticism of the speeches which have been delivered from this side of the House; and he, as was very natural, directed his principal observations to the brilliant speech of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary. My noble Friend is like one of those actors who possess in the highest degree both a tragic and comic vein, and if he commenced with a number of witty observations which, I am sure, delighted the House, he did not forget to turn in the latter part of his speech to the graver aspect of the subject. I do not think it is possible that any more impressive appeal could have been addressed to this House than was addressed to it on the general policy of the question by my noble Friend. The noble Marquess taunted the noble Earl with not going into the details of the Bill, and I am glad, as it relieves me of a great many observations upon it; but the noble Marquess has followed his example, and he has confined himself almost exclusively to the question of the general policy on which this Bill is based. This is a question of principle. This House is about to divide on the question, Shall there be or shall there not be any measure of self-government for Ireland? [Opposition cries of "No, no!"] What do I hear? No, no! Is it, then, possible, after all, that the Conservative Party contemplates at some future time some system of self-government for Ireland? That is a precious cheer. The question which has been put to us in speech after speech is whether there shall be any measure of self-government for Ireland. The noble Marquess did not follow the example of the noble Duke who objected to the historical disquisitions of my noble Friend. I think historical disquisitions upon this Bill are not only useful and interesting, but are absolutely indispensable to the well understanding of the question before us. The noble Marquess referred to the taunts which have been addressed from this side of the House as to what we term the coquetting of the Conservative Party with the Home Rule Party in 1885. The noble Marquess said—and, of course, there is no higher authority—that it is an entire mistake to suppose that they gave up in principle what he objects to our terming the coercive policy. He said that circumstances created by the Government of Mr. Gladstone, of which I was a Member, rendered it impossible when he came into Office during that year to continue the Crimes Act. I will refer to what Lord Carnarvon said on the occasion when, as Lord Lieutenant, he took the unusual and inconvenient course of declaring the Irish policy of the Government instead of the Premier. Lord Carnarvon did not say one single word in his speech about the reason for not renewing the Crimes Act being the impossibility of passing it. He said—

"I believe for my part that special legislation of this kind is inexpedient."

That is a declaration of general policy and principle. The only other remark he made was curious when we remember what Lord Salisbury's Government actually did. He said—

"More than being undesirable, I hold that such legislation is practically impossible if it is to be continually and indefinitely enacted."

Could the policy of Lord Salisbury's Government be described in words more accurate or condemned in words more explicit? At that moment Lord Carnarvon was recognised as the exponent of the policy of the Conservative Government, and therefore his must be the view which the Government took. The noble Marquess finds it convenient to forget all that has passed. Of course, I accept the statements made from that Bench that there was no compact with the Irish Party. When men of honour tell me that I am bound to believe it. But I say that the course they took was an extremely unfortunate one, and one which must have led to much misconstruction, because there was a combination of circumstances which showed that a change of policy was singularly adapted to conciliate the Irish Party and to bring about that support which would no doubt be very convenient to them. I do not attach much importance to the words used by the noble Marquess at Newport. I have often studied those words, and I think that it was a very carefully-guarded speech. But, besides Lord Carnarvon's declaration, there was something much more significant. I have no wish to use very hard words, though very hard words are used against us. But there was the Maamtrasna affair, and a meaner action than the course taken by the Opposition in connection with that affair was never taken by any political Party. Their conduct then was the main indication of what their wishes and intentions were. Now, I will turn to more ancient but very instructive history—that of the Act of Union. I cannot mention the Union without remembering what was said by the Duke of Argyll. He used an argument which, if it had not proceeded from his lips, I should have called grotesque. When he spoke of the Union having been carried by bribery and corruption, he said that Mr. Pitt was merely "buying out corruption." Did anyone ever hear such a ridiculous contention? What a pitiful excuse for Mr. Pitt! To think that a great statesman should be defended by the argument that it was a morally defensible and accountable position to bribe for the purpose of buying out bribery! Then the noble

Duke said that we were just as corrupt, because whenever a Party offered measures which were likely to conciliate votes, that Party was corrupt. In the same way, therefore, the Irish Land Act, and the Congested Districts Act, and the Light Railways Act were all attempts to bribe the Irish Members. These arguments only require to be mentioned for it to be seen that they have no weight. But the argument of the noble Marquess is this—that the Union failed because it was not accompanied by the measures with which Mr. Pitt desired it to be accompanied. It is impossible to be certain in such a matter; but as a defence of Mr. Pitt, that is a complete argument. That great statesman had a great policy, and only a part of that policy was allowed to be adopted. But we have not to deal with what would have happened if something had been done which was not done. It is no good saying what would be the state of things if Mr. Pitt had been allowed to carry Catholic Emancipation, the redemption of tithes, the endowment of the Catholic religion, and other measures. None of these things were done; and now we have to deal with things as they are. What are the facts? The facts are these, that the Union, though passed 93 years ago, leaves us in the position of having to consider the condition of Ireland. What is the test of the success of a policy? The test is, "Have you a contented nation; have you subjects of the Crown who accept the system of government under which they live cheerfully and loyally?" By that test the Union must be tried; but instead of this being the condition of affairs we are told that you have two hostile nations in Ireland. One of them is steeped in the old doctrine of ascendancy. ["No!"] The noble Lord who says "No" has not studied the history and the condition of Ireland. The other nation, no doubt, has been frequently disloyal, always unquiet and frequently resorting to practices which we all condemn, because they do not respect the law, not looking upon the law as their defender but as their oppressor. Is that a satisfactory state of things, or a satisfactory result of the Union? How long are we to go on in this way? A noble Lord spoke of hope, but are we to go on listening to that flattering tale for the next 100 years? I do not call that statesmanship; I call it an absolute neglect of the facts of the case, and a refusal to look at the facts as they are. What are our reasons for our change of policy? It is not pleasant, it is not agreeable, to stand up before your fellow-countrymen and say that you have changed your opinions; but I say that it requires much more courage to change your opinions than to remain consistent in your opinions; and frequently the truest statesmanship is not to persevere in that which experience has shown to be wrong, but to have the courage, as great statesmen have had the courage before, on looking at the facts as they are and to say—"No; we find that we were wrong, and we no longer can counsel our countrymen to go in a wrong direction, but we will tell you fairly and honourably what is the best for the nation." Everything that could possibly be held out to us would have persuaded us to take the opposite course. There was not only the loss of political friends, but great social dissensions were created in this country which place many men in a position of extreme unpleasantness. We have been told that we took this course because we sought Office; but if we did so we were not very successful in our efforts, because we passed six years in the cold shade of Opposition. Do noble Lords believe that instead of being actuated by motives to serve the nation to the best of our capacity we were actuated by a miserable petty feeling to get into some place in order to receive a salary. After long years of experience we saw that the system of Government had not succeeded in Ireland, and we saw, as we believed, new evidence that there is not contentment under our system. Election after election there was returned a very large majority of Members who held one opinion opposed to our system. In these circumstances, we thought it to be our duty to propose a change. But I may, perhaps, be permitted to say something based on my own experience. We are told that this change of policy is really impossible because of the character of the men to whom we should have to entrust the new system of government in Ireland. It is a long time ago, but when I was entrusted with the Government of Ireland I had to deal with the Fenian conspiracy. I do not suppose that noble Lords think I sympathise with attempts at rebellion. I put those attempts down sternly and without the smallest hesitation; and so I would, if need be, again. But if you ask me whether I regard all those Fenians as criminals in the ordinary sense of the word, I say that it never entered into my mind so to regard them. I knew there were many desperate men among them, and I also knew that many of them were true Irish patriots who, though mistaken in their views, were not criminals in the ordinary sense. They were conspirators, as there have been conspirators before, and in other and more favourable circumstances these men might have served their country and their Crown with honour and success. We are told that Irish Members have been branded by the Parnell Commission. I know what pleasure it gives noble Lords to cite the Parnell Commission. I say of all unjust proceedings to crush a political Party that was the most unconstitutional that was ever adopted. I have never had but one opinion on the subject. Over and over again the majority of the people in Ireland have been spoken of as our enemies. Enemies! They are our fellow-countrymen, subjects of the Queen, and they are to be regarded as our enemies! The word is frequently used. ["No, no!"] It is of no use to say "No"; they have often been described as such in this House and out of it. You know perfectly well that speech after speech has been made, in which the Irish people have been spoken of as our enemies. I will not say you used, although I believe I could quote words that were used in this Debate, but, at all events, you used such words that showed you regarded the Irish as your enemies. Is it likely you will govern Ireland with success if you have such feelings towards a large portion of the Irish people? The Irish have been branded with crime and spoken of as men who would rob landlords, and who were not fit to be trusted with free government. Then why did you trust them with it? Why did you give them equal votes with their fellow-subjects? I remember when the Ballot Act was passed I said that for the first time you would know what the true opinion of the Irish people was, and you would find out how strong the national feeling was. You cannot now treat the Irish people as hostile without acknowledging that the government of Ireland is practically impossible except by force. Before referring to Ulster I wish to make an apology to the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland for referring to his speech as one of bluster and brag. On reflection, I am satisfied those words have no application to his speech, and I withdraw unreservedly what I said. When the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Londonderry) said that Ulster did not indulge in bluster and brag, I exclaimed "Oh!" which seemed to astonish him. I will read to the House one or two passages from the report of a meeting at Killyman, in the County of Tyrone. The Rev. Leslie Carter, of Armagh, said—

"They, the Protestants of the North, would march to the House of Commons and compel their enemies to be silent while their Representatives were speaking. If Barrett was executed for blowing up a prison the time might not be far distant when, for attempting to blow up our venerable Protestant Constitution, Gladstone and his co-conspirators might be hanging as high as Haman."

The Rev. H. Henderson said—

"The Government were driving the Protestants into civil war, and if they pursued their present policy they would have another Derry and another Boyne."

The Rev. R. C. Donnel said—

"He knew they were perfectly ready to stand by their colours, and that there were men on the platform who were ready to lead them forth against the enemy."

THE MARQUESS OF LONDON-
DERRY: Will the noble Earl give the date?

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: These words were uttered on the 1st of June, 1869, in relation to the Disestablishment Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDON-
DERRY: When I said Ulster never blustered or bragged I was alluding to the Union.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have quoted this to show that on that occasion, at all events, Ulster did bluster, but did nothing whatever. I am not in the least dismayed by bluster, and I am certain that the noble Marquess (Londonderry) would be the first person to despise us if he thought we should be intimidated in the smallest degree in doing what we think is our duty by any threat that 100,000 or any other number of men were to meet together, although it may be unpleasant for the noble Marquess to be reminded of it. I think it was the Duke of Argyll who spoke of this measure as a revolutionary one. But I think the word revolutionary might be applied better in reference to another matter we have heard of. It is no doubt a very difficult and a very grave subject to speak of—the right of rebellion. Now, I am not one of those who will assert that in no circumstances whatever can there be a moral right to rebel, but it is a new thing to me at least that men who have been responsible Ministers of the Crown should use such language as that adopted by Mr. Arthur Balfour at Belfast on April 4 last, when he declared that no rational or sober-minded man would say that—

“What is justifiable against tyrannical kings may not under certain circumstances be justifiable against a tyrannical majority.”

Do you think that language of that kind is calculated to maintain the peace and the order of Ireland, especially when it is spoken by one who has been a Minister of the Crown? I do not say that Ireland ought to be governed as a Colony; Ireland is too close to this country, and it is for that reason we do not propose in this Bill to govern Ireland as a Colony. I was surprised to hear the noble and learned Lord (Lord Halsbury) speak of paper securities as perfectly worthless.

LORD HALSBURY: I think so, but I did not say so.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The Imperial supremacy may be called a paper security, but I maintain that it is the very foundation of the civil government of this country, and I say the supremacy over Ireland would be a real supremacy. Let me say one word about the much-contested question of the retention of the Irish Members. No doubt that is one of the great difficulties in the Bill, but the opinion of the country was clearly in favour of the proposal embodied in the Bill. The noble Duke who moved the rejection of the Bill has certainly changed his mind on this subject.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: I explained that the circumstances are different.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I was rather surprised the noble Marquess said nothing as to the want of sufficient discussion before the Bill came here, or as to what has been called the concealment of our policy during the last six years, before the Bill was brought in. I was astonished to hear a noble Lord make this statement, because in the Manifesto which the noble Marquess issued to the electors he plainly told them that the contest was to take place upon the question whether there was to be a domestic Legislature in Ireland. I maintain that the question was fully before the country, and fully discussed in the country. We are told that a Bill ought to have been before the country, but what Bill? Ought we to have circulated a Bill while we were in Opposition, or ought the Government to have circulated a Bill? The fact is these are new-fangled ideas invented for the occasion. I am surprised that the Conservative Party should try to introduce new principles into our Constitution. The first of those principles is nothing less than the Referendum, which, if adopted, would effect a complete revolution in our Constitution. The other principle is that every measure must have a majority of the people of Great Britain in its favour. But why a majority of the people of Great Britain? Why not a majority of the people of England, and of Scotland, and of Wales, and of Ireland? This is the federal principle which noble Lords opposite wish to introduce, and the reason is that it is not convenient for them to deal with this measure in the old constitutional way. The noble Marquess said that there are strategic reasons for refusing to assent to the policy embodied in this Bill. He thinks that Ireland will be dangerous because, he says, we are to surrender our controlling force. But he is in error, for all military and naval forces are to be absolutely under the control of the Imperial Government. How, therefore, are we placing ourselves at a disadvantage strategically? But these arguments are merely the means by which you try to veil your ineradicable distrust of the Irish people. I ask your Lordships to recollect, now that you are about to throw out this measure by an immense majority, what has occurred on previous occasions, in connection with similar action on your part. In 1880 you threw out the Compensation for Disturbance

Bill by 282 against 51, but the very next year you consented to pass a far more drastic and far-reaching measure—namely, the Land Act of 1881.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : That was not the same Bill at all ; the other was much worse.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : The noble Marquess considers it was much worse ; but I have heard him speak in terms of the strongest condemnation of the Act of 1881. Why cannot you bring yourselves to conceive that is a melancholy condition to have a country in the condition in which Ireland is after your vain attempts for a century to rule her on the present system ? Why cannot you see that you ought not to rest your government of Ireland upon the paper foundations on which it has hitherto been founded, and that you should make up your minds to rest it upon the far firmer foundations—as the experience of the whole world has shown them to be—of giving to a people who are desirous of it the management of their own domestic affairs, when you can do so, as this Bill has shown that it can be done, consistently with the maintenance of the unity of the Empire and the supremacy of Parliament ?

Leave having been given to the Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells to vote in the House, on question whether the word (“now”) shall stand part of the Motion. Their Lordships divided :—Contents 41 ; Not-Contents 419.

QUESTIONS.

INOCULATION EXPERIMENTS IN INDIA.

MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has received an answer to enable him to say by what authority Dr. Haffkine has been permitted to inoculate soldiers at Agra with cholera virus as an experimental precaution against cholera ; by what authority was he allowed to inoculate 250 school children in elementary schools, and were the children voluntary subjects of the experiment ; and if he has not yet received the answer, will he require the authorities to send the information at an early date ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North. Beds.) : The reply to the Secretary of State's Despatch asking for information on this subject has not yet been received. The Government of India has been asked by telegraph to expedite their Report.

MR. HOPWOOD : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether Surgeon Major King has been restored to the position from which he had been transferred for the use of lymph not now sanctioned by the Government ; is the Government aware that the lymph in question is recommended in the Manual of Instruction on Vaccination, published by the Government in India, as formerly by the authorities here ; and is the lymph in question variolous or small-pox in its origin, and how is it regarded by the medical advisers of the Indian Government ?

MR. G. RUSSELL : The question is the repetition of one which was asked me by my hon. Friend on the 11th July, when I informed him that the Government of India would be asked to furnish a Report. The Despatch was sent on the 27th July, and the answer has not yet been received.

DIPHTHERIA IN THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether inquiry has been made by the County Medical Officer of Health for Ross and Cromarty into the serious outbreak of diphtheria at the Port of Ness, Island of Lewis; and whether, should the Board of Supervision investigate into the cause of the outbreak, it will do so through the agency of a member who is a medical man and not entrust the inquiry to a lawyer?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): Inquiry has been made into the recent outbreak of diphtheria at the Port of Ness by the Sanitary Medical Officer in charge of that part of the island—Dr. Ross, of Borve, a thoroughly competent official—and by the deputy Chief Medical Officer of the district, Dr. Macrae. They have notified to the County Medical Officer 18 cases of mild type at Ness and one at Barvas. The infected districts have been visited by Drs. Ross and Macrae, and reported on to Lewis District Committee, and instructions given to Sanitary Inspector as to necessary prompt action and precautions as to disinfection, &c. The Board of Supervision will be made aware of the outbreak at their next meeting on the 12th instant; but, in the circumstances above stated, it is improbable that they will think it necessary to make further investigations.

THE DEER FOREST COMMISSION.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether it is the fact that the crofters and other inhabitants of the country around Thurso were invited by the Deer Forest Commission to attend at Thurso, on Tuesday, 29th August, to give evidence at a sitting of the Commission; whether, on their arrival, they found that no sitting would be held that day in consequence of the absence of the Chairman and Secretary; and why no arrangements were made to furnish information to the persons who attended to give evidence as to when the sitting of the Commission would be held?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: It is the fact that notices were issued in common form for a sitting at Thurso on Tuesday, 29th August, to everyone whose name had been sent in to the Secretary as desiring to attend such sitting and give evidence. In consequence of a necessary change of arrangements it was resolved on Saturday, the 26th, to postpone that sitting, and on the same day the Secretary sent notices of the postponement by post to everyone who had previously received an intimation to attend and give evidence. It is right to add that the postponed sitting was held on Monday, 4th September, and continued into the following day, when everyone interested who came forward was afforded a full opportunity of giving his evidence.

THE CASE OF HENRIETTA WARD.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Henrietta Ward, a married woman with four children, who was convicted on her own confession at the Birmingham Petty Sessions on the 4th instant of stealing boots, and sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment with hard labour; whether he is aware that the woman had, up to the time of her conviction, borne a good character, and that the offence was the first of which she had been convicted; and whether, under all the circumstances, he will take the sentence into consideration, with a view of according to her the benefit of the First Offenders Act?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I have carefully considered all the circumstances of this case, and I regret that I do not see my way to interfering with the sentence.

YORK CAVALRY BARRACKS.

MR. BUTCHER (York): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Government contract for the painting of the Cavalry Barracks at York has been sub-let; whether the sub-contractor, to whom such contract has been sub-let, is paying his workmen employed in doing the work contracted for by such contract wages which in many cases are considerably below the wages generally accepted as current in the trade for competent workmen; and having regard to the Resolution of this House of the 13th February, 1891, what steps the Government propose to take in regard to the matter?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley): A Report was recently received from the local Trades Union authorities to the effect that some work of this kind was being carried out by a sub-contractor. The General Officer Commanding at York has been directed to inquire into the matter.

TRIAL BY JURY IN BENGAL.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any steps have been taken to extend the system of trial by jury in Bengal to districts of that Province where it does not now prevail, and in cases where it does not now apply, as recommended by the native members of the Commission which recently reported on the subject?

MR. G. RUSSELL: No, Sir. The Despatch which I informed my hon. Friend on the 18th May the Secretary of State was expecting from the Government of India on the subject of the recommendations of the Bengal Jury Commission has not yet been received; and the Secretary of State is unable, therefore, to make any statement at present.

SCOTCH RAILWAY RATES.

MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrew's, &c.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, as Chairman of the Select Committee on Railway Rates and Charges, whether any evidence has been taken by the Committee as to the rates in force for traders in the South and East of Scotland, especially between Edinburgh or Leith and Cupar Fife; whether the evidence already taken by the Committee will be circulated to hon. Members; and whether he can hold out any hope of a final Report, at an early date, on the question referred to the Committee?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): Three witnesses have given evidence before the Railway Rates Committee as to the rates in the South and East of Scotland, but not with regard to Cupar Fife in particular. The evidence taken by the Committee has been reported to the House, and has been ordered to be printed; but I cannot say how soon copies can be circulated to hon. Members. The Committee will meet to consider its final Report as soon as possible after the re-assembling of the House in November.

MARKING OF FOREIGN MEAT.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if the attention of the Government has been called to the evidence given before the Select Committee on the Marking of Foreign Meat, and particularly to the unanimous testimony of 44 witnesses, including several leading butchers, as to the frequent supply to consumers of cheap foreign meat as prime English, best Scotch, best Irish, or Welsh mutton, at prices genuine Home-produced articles command; and what steps it is proposed to take to carry out the recommendation of the Committee as to the registration of persons dealing in imported meat?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): My right hon. Friend has desired me to answer this question. The evidence taken before the Committee has not yet been circulated, and we cannot make any statement on the subject until we have had an opportunity of fully considering it.

MAGAZINES OF HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what information the Admiralty possess as to the temperature to which cordite can safely be submitted in the magazines of Her Majesty's ships; whether in any, and, if any, in what vessels the magazines are placed between the boilers; and in what vessels, by means of non-conducting materials or otherwise, adequate precautions have been taken against the magazines becoming so hot as to render it dangerous to store cordite in them?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The answers to the three questions are:—(1.) Cordite can safely be submitted to a temperature of 100 degs. Fahrenheit in the magazines of Her Majesty's ships without any sensible deterioration. (2) In the Sans Pareil, Nile, Trafalgar, the seven vessels of Royal Sovereign class, and the Hood. (3) In all vessels where magazine temperatures of 100 degs. or above have been noted proper precautions have been, or are being, taken to keep the magazines within that limit.

WEIGHING INSTRUMENTS IN GOVERNMENT ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether scales and other weighing instruments used in dockyards and other Government establishments are required to have the stamp of the Local Authority in which they are used in addition to the stamp of the Local Authority in which they were made; and, if not, whether such scales and weighing instruments are being used in violation of the provisions of the Act of 1889?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have no information that scales and other weighing instruments used in dockyards and other Government establishments are required to be re-stamped as referred to in the question of the right hon. Member; and the Board of Trade are advised that the Weights and Measures Acts do not require weighing instruments which are the property of the Crown to be stamped by the Inspectors of Weights and Measures appointed by the Local Authorities.

APPLICATION OF RATES TO PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether County Councils are entitled under the existing law to apply rates to the payment of pensions or grants?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.): If I were to answer my hon. Friend's question in general terms, my reply would be in the negative, unless where such pensions are permitted by Statute; but if I were asked whether a County Council may, under special circumstances, and as part of an arrangement for the retirement of a deserving servant, make to him a superannuation allowance, I cannot say that this would be necessarily illegal.

GREENWICH AGE PENSIONS.

MR. E. J. C. MORTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty if he is now able to state what steps the Admiralty will take to ensure that all those qualified to receive Greenwich Age Pensions shall receive them?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): The Treasury having assented to the recommendation of the Committee on Greenwich Hospital Age Pensions that a sum of £16,000 a year shall be added from Naval Funds to the amount previously available for these pensions, additional pensions to this amount will be granted from 1st October next. An explanatory statement on this subject will be laid on the Table in a few days.

AFFAIRS AT HARBOUR ISLAND, BAHAMAS.

MR. GODSON (Kidderminster): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the attention of the Secretary of State for the Colonies has been called to a letter from Mr. Julius Stafford Solomon, late Resident Justice at Harbour Island, Bahamas, to the Chief Justice of the Colony, in which Mr. Solomon intimates that he has been compelled by the Bahamian Government to reluctantly resign his position as a Resident Magistrate; whether any, and if any what, offence was alleged against Mr. Solomon; whether he is aware that, upon Mr. Solomon quitting office, the Resident Justice at Governors Harbour, Bahamas, was transferred to his post at Harbour Island, and a Mr. Austin Thompson, a brother-in-law of R. H. Sawyer, a member of the Executive Council, was provisionally appointed as Resident Justice at Governors Harbour; whether he is also aware that, after an inquiry recently held before the Executive Council of the Colony into some alleged misconduct of the Postmaster of the Colony, the said Postmaster was suspended from office and Mr. Austin Thompson appointed provisionally to fulfil the duties of Postmaster; and whether the Secretary of State will cause inquiry to be made both into the circumstances attending Mr. Solomon's quitting office and Mr. Austin Thompson's appointment as Resident Justice and acting Postmaster?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Mr.

Yelverton, the Chief Justice of the Bahamas, has in a Letter received to-day communicated to the Secretary of State a letter addressed to him by Mr. Solomon, late Resident Justice of Harbour Island, in which he implies that he has been compelled to resign his office. The Secretary of State is not aware that any offence has been alleged against Mr. Solomon. The Governor reported that Mr. Solomon had retired on a pension, but we have no information of the circumstances which led to his retirement; but, in view of Mr. Solomon's letter, further inquiries are being made. On the retirement of Mr. Solomon, Mr. O'Halloran, the Resident Justice of Governors Harbour, was provisionally appointed Resident Justice of Harbour Island, and Mr. Austin Thompson was provisionally appointed Resident Justice of Governor's Harbour. These provisional appointments have been duly reported to the Secretary of State, but have not yet been confirmed by him. The Postmaster of the Bahamas has been suspended from his office. Pending the appointment of a new Postmaster, the officer administering the Government has appointed Mr. Austin Thompson to be acting Postmaster.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): Was Mr. Solomon retired on account of his age?

MR. S. BUXTON: The only information received by the Colonial Office is that he retired on a pension.

THE BEHAR CADASTRAL SURVEY.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, under the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885, any limits are imposed as to the area within which the Government is empowered to make a compulsory survey at the expense of the landlords and tenants; and, if so, whether the Government of Bengal would be instructed to observe those limits in its operations in connection with the Behar Cadastral Survey?

MR. G. RUSSELL: Section 101 of the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885 permits the Local Government to make a survey and record of rights in a local area without any limitation with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council, and permits the local Government to do so without such previous sanction in four specified cases. Section 114 of the same Act provides for the defrayal of the cost of such operation, in either case, by the landlords and tenants. The Secretary of State is confident that the Government of Bengal are duly observing the requirements of the law in this matter.

A CRIMEAN VETERAN.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of David Gordon, late No. 6,024, who has served in the Crimea, and was discharged from the Grenadier Guards on January 26, 1861, with a good character, and with the record of 10 years' service in the Army certified on his parchment discharge certificate; and, if so, whether he will state the reason why Gordon has been informed in an Official Letter of May 20, 1893, that he is not eligible as an applicant for a special Crimean pension because he has only nine years and 364 days' service in the Army reckoning for pension?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. Woodall, Hanley): Private Gordon served from December 30, 1850, to January 26, 1861—i.e., 10 years and 28 days; but he forfeited 29 days' service, and consequently could only reckon nine years 364 days towards pension. As 10 years is the minimum qualifying service for the special campaign pension, he is not entitled thereto. It must not be forgotten that the number of these special campaign pensions is limited, and, though 10 years is the minimum service qualifying, there are very many of the unsuccessful applicants who have served a much longer time, and whose cases naturally have precedence.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: I wish to ask whether the hon. Member observes that the application made by this man is to be enrolled among the applicants; and whether, although this man's discharge certified that he had served 10 years, the Treasury refuses to hold him eligible because his term of service was one day short of the 10 years?

MR. WOODALL: I admit that it is a very hard case; and if the 10 years, instead of qualifying as an applicant, qualified for pension, we should, of course, press the claim upon the Treasury;

but, as a matter of fact, the man stands a long way behind other claimants.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: May the man not be allowed to be enrolled among the applicants, and then his application would take its chance among the rest?

MR. WOODALL: I will promise to go into the matter if I see the smallest chance of his obtaining a pension in the event of his title as an applicant being admitted.

FOREIGN NAVIES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can state what is the amount estimated for new construction during the present year in the Navies of Germany, Russia, France, and Italy respectively?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Germany, £947,725; Russia, £1,692,124; France, £2,918,120; Italy, £1,000,000. The corresponding estimated expenditure in cash and stores (including contract ships under Naval Defence Act) for this country is, for 1893-4, £2,982,086.

THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the fact that the Report of the Select Committee on the Telegraphs Bill, on which the agreement between the Post Office and the National Telephone Company is to be founded, was arrived at without any evidence being taken either from any Municipal Corporation or from any representative of the telephone-using public, and that the Committee was appointed on the eve of the Dissolution, he will consider the advisability of the reappointment of the Committee to take further evidence in the interests of the public before concluding the agreement with the National Telephone Company?

MR. SAUNDERS (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will give the London County Council an opportunity of considering the proposed agreement with the National Telephone Company before it is completed?

Mr. Woodall

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the desire to that effect expressed in several large Provincial centres, he proposes to lay upon the Table the agreement in regard to telephones made with the National Telephone Company before its final conclusion; whether that agreement is in accordance with the heads of agreement signed by his predecessor and with the Report of the Select Committee of 1892; whether it leaves him at his discretion to grant licences to other Companies and to Municipalities; and whether it extends at all the present licence of the National Telephone Company?

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in the proposed agreement between the Post Office and the National Telephone Company, there is any clause which directly or indirectly interferes with the power of the London County Council to establish and carry on at any time hereafter, if licensed, Telephone Exchanges in the Metropolis?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): There appears to be some doubt as to what was intended by the Report of the Committee on the Telegraph Bill of 1892. I am informed that some Members of the Committee understood by the words used that the agreement should be laid on the Table before final ratification, while the right hon. Gentleman the late Postmaster General and the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, both of whom served on the Committee, and the latter of whom was its Chairman, understood and intended the words which were used to mean that Parliament should be informed of the terms of the agreement after it was concluded. My right hon. Friend is aware that the proposed agreement is intended to carry out the policy for which he became responsible, and, indeed, will be the document embodying in legal form the heads of agreement which he settled with the Company, and which were signed by him on behalf of the late Government before he left Office. Under these circumstances, and as I understand he suggests that the document should be laid on the Table of the House before its final conclusion, and considering the difference of opinion which appears to exist as to what was intended by the Report of the Committee, I have decided to take the course suggested, and to lay the proposed agreement on the Table before it is signed. The draft of the agreement is now under the consideration of the Company. I am advised that it is in strict accordance with the heads of agreement, which were, as I have said, signed by my predecessor, and with the Report of the Select Committee, as well as with the Treasury Minute which was laid before Parliament. It in no way limits or affects the discretion of the Postmaster General to grant licences for telephone exchange business. It does not extend the term of the licence of the National Company. It restricts the operations of the Company to specified areas, and withdraws from them the right to establish and work trunk wires between these areas. But it confers on the Company the right to exercise the powers which are conferred on the Postmaster General himself by the Telegraph Acts of 1863 and 1878, and by the provisions in the Telegraph Act, 1892, relating to Provisional Orders. But this right is subjected in every case to the veto of the Local Authorities specified in Section 5 of the Telegraph Act of last Session.

SIR J. FERGUSSON : I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether power is given to take up streets without the consent of the Local Authorities?

MR. A. MORLEY : No; it is subject to the veto of the Local Authorities.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : Will an opportunity be given to the House for discussing the agreement?

MR. A. MORLEY : As soon as the agreement is come to it will be laid on the Table of the House.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the agreement, though it does not give power to take up streets against the wishes of the Local Authority, does exclude any other Body from doing so?

MR. A. MORLEY : The agreement does not give any special powers that would not be given to any other licencees.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars) : If the Telephone Company get these powers will it shut out any competing Company, or the Municipality itself, should it desire to establish telephones?

MR. A. MORLEY : That is a matter for the Local Governing Authority to decide.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) : Will sufficient time be given to Local Authorities to consider the terms of the agreement?

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) : Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly arrange to have the agreement considered by the House during the Autumn Sitting, and not during the present Sitting?

MR. A. MORLEY : That will depend on when the agreement is made. In reply to the hon. Member for Peterborough, I have to say that there will be ample time for the Local Authorities to consider the agreement.

THE NIGER COMPANY.

MR. T. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will take steps to get at the truth of the report freely circulated in the papers, that natives who attempted to cross the territory of the Royal Chartered Niger Company from one region outside the Company's jurisdiction to another have been summarily shot?

SIR E. GREY : If any specific case, supported by trustworthy evidence, is reported to Her Majesty's Government, they will make inquiries, but they cannot do so on mere hearsay.

MR. T. BAYLEY : Do I understand the answer to indicate that Her Majesty's Government have no Representative in the territory of the Niger Company?

*SIR E. GREY : The Niger Company is primarily responsible for the administration of its own territory. The Government have no Representative in the territory.

PUBLIC HEALTH REPORTS.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the importance of the Reports of the Medical Officer of Health, he will cause such Reports to be sent to the officers of health of the Sanitary Authorities throughout the Kingdom, and also to free libraries and to village reading rooms ?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) : I may say that I sympathise to a great extent with the desire of the right hon. Gentleman. The Local Government Board are in the habit of forwarding Medical Reports to the Local Authorities and the Local Public Officers. I would point out that the Treasury did not agree with my predecessor, Mr. Ritchie, as to a further extension of this distribution. I have not had the opportunity yet of approaching the Treasury, but I mean to make a further effort in that direction, when, perhaps, I may meet with a better fate than Mr. Ritchie when he made a similar application.

MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the nuisance arising from the Manchester Ship Canal has become dangerous to the health of the inhabitants of the County Borough of Salford and the neighbourhood ; and whether, as suggested by the Council, he will direct a Government inquiry to be held as to the best means of dealing with the subject ?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : This question appeared on the Paper only this morning. It will require some communication to take place between the Local Government Board and the Salford authorities, and I must, therefore, ask the hon. Member to postpone it.

DEER FOREST COMMISSION FEES.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland how is it that Mr. Gordon, a Member of the Royal Commission on Deer Forests, is remunerated to the extent of five guineas a day for his services ; whether any other Member of the Commission is in receipt of any sum beyond an allowance of one guinea per day for expenses ; whether the payment to Mr. Gordon was made at the request of the Commissioners ; and is he aware that the exceptional treatment accorded to Mr. Gordon has caused great dissatisfaction both inside and outside of the ranks of the Commission ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : Mr. Gordon is a land surveyor and valuator of great experience. As it is a usual custom in the case of professional men who serve on Commissions where their professional knowledge is made use of, the Treasury has granted Mr. Gordon professional remuneration. The other Members receive the usual subsistence allowance with their travelling expenses, and according to the regulations laid down by the Treasury they cannot receive more. The arrangement that Mr. Gordon should receive professional remuneration was made according to the usual practice, and not at the request of the Commissioners. I am aware that some of the Members of the Commission have been dissatisfied with the arrangement.

MR. DALZIEL : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that of the seven Commissioners four voted against payment, and that the proposal was only adopted by Mr. Gordon voting for the payment for himself, and the Chairman exercising two votes ?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : I can only take cognisance of the resolutions that are communicated to me by the Secretary of the Commission as coming from the Commission, and I could not make any inquiries as to what passed within the Royal Commission, perfectly independent of the Scotch Office.

MR. WEIR : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Mr. Gordon attends most regularly on these days on which he receives a fee, and on the other days he seldom puts in an appearance?

SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton): I wish to ask whether it is true, as reported, that three Members of the Commission have sent in their resignation?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: No; it is not true.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I wish to ask whether it would not be advisable, in cases of this sort, that paid land surveyors should not be allowed to have a vote on the Commission?

[No answer was given.]

FATAL ACCIDENTS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. PAUL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether as the Fatal Accidents Inquiry (Scotland) Bill is not a contentious measure, as it has passed through the Standing Committee on Law, and as it affects the whole industrial population of Scotland, the Government will give an opportunity for passing it, either before the Adjournment or during the Autumn Sitting? I also desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that the Bill was supported in the Grand Committee by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Andrew's University, and also by the late Under Secretary of State for the Home Department?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I answered this question yesterday, when I gave, as a reason for not including that measure in the list of Bills which we hope to be able to pass, that I was informed that alterations had been made in the Bill which rendered it controversial. I have no personal knowledge of this matter, but I obtained all the information I could on the subject.

MR. PAUL: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that I moved in Committee an Amendment in favour of holding inquiries before a jury as well as before the Sheriff, and that I withdrew the Amendment because I was assured by the Representatives of the Government that that would make the measure controversial and prevent it passing?

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I desire to ask whether the House is to take the list of measures announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as the definite and final list?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not propose to add any other measures to that list. I got the fullest information I could upon the subject of the Bill, and I have given the House the result.

MR. PAUL: Will the Government not consider the possibility of taking the Bill in the Autumn Session?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think I can add to the answer I gave.

SEA FISHERIES.

MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.): I beg to ask the Patronage Secretary, as Chairman of the Select Committee on Sea Fisheries, when the Evidence given before that Committee will be printed and distributed; and if he can state whether the Government intend during the present Session of Parliament to give effect by legislation to the recommendations contained in the Report of that Committee?

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire): I have made inquiries of the printers, and they promise that the evidence shall be in the hands of Members not later than the end of this month. The Government do not intend to introduce any new measure, but it is their intention to pass the Scotch Fisheries Bill. The only thing necessary to secure the realisation of that good intention is the support and co-operation of the hon. Member in passing this entirely non-contentious and non-Party measure into law.

MR. ANSTRUTHER: I desire to ask my right hon. Friend if it is not the case that between myself and the Secretary for Scotland there is no contention with regard to the Scotch Fisheries Bill, and that the Amendments which I have placed on the Paper are acceptable to the right hon. Gentleman?

SIR H. MAXWELL: I desire to ask if it is possible to treat as a non-contentious measure a Bill in regard to which there are no less than seven pages of Amendments?

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: I cannot undertake to decide what is the contention between the Secretary for Scotland and the hon. Member for St. Andrews. In reply to the hon. Gentleman opposite,

I have reason to believe that the greater portion of the Amendments to the Bill will be withdrawn.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS

IN IRELAND.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the number and amount of deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks in Ireland for the half-year ended 30th June last exceeded the number and amount of deposits for the corresponding period of 1892; and, if so, to what extent; and whether since the beginning of the current half-year the deposits have exceeded the withdrawals in number and amount?

*MR. A. MORLEY: The number of deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks in Ireland during the half-year ending 30th June last was 195,969, or 2,537 more than during the corresponding period of 1892. The amount deposited in the same period was about £601,000, or about £12,000 more than in 1892. During the first two months of the current half-year, that is, July and August, the deposits exceeded the withdrawals by about 36,000 in number and about £24,000 in amount.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I desire to ask whether the attention of the Postmaster General has been drawn to the Report just laid on the Table of the House, in which it is stated that the amount of deposits is £49,000 less than the amount estimated at the close of 1892; and whether this is the first occasion since the establishment of the Post Office Savings Banks in which the estimated balance was less by £49,000 than it was in the preceding half-year? I would also ask whether the Report stated that certain information is not favourable, and why this information is for the first time withheld; and whether the attention of the Postmaster General has been drawn to the paragraph which stated that for the first time in the history of these banks there was a decrease of £49,000?

*MR. A. MORLEY: That is a question which it is clearly impossible to answer without notice. My attention has been drawn to the Report, but not to the paragraph referred to. If the hon. Gentleman wishes for an answer I must ask him to put down a question.

Mr. Marjoribanks

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I will do so.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that the period of heavy withdrawals extended only from March to June, within which time speeches and letters were published advising the public to withdraw, and whether there has been a great increase of deposits and a great falling off in withdrawals since the public became acquainted with the provisions of the Home Rule Bill?

*MR. A. MORLEY: I do not say how far the speeches and letters affected the result, but the fact is as stated by the hon. Member.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Was it not rather caused by the declaration that the House of Lords would throw out the Bill?

SIR T. LEA: I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman was not the advice to which the hon. Member for Kerry referred given in a letter addressed to the editor of a paper?

*MR. A. MORLEY: The hon. Gentleman referred to newspaper letters.

THE RECENT DISASTER IN THE SHANNON.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he proposes to take any action on the subject of a resolution of a public meeting held on the 4th instant in the Court House, Tarbert, County Kerry, in connection with the recent loss of 17 lives by an accident in the River Shannon, in which the attention of the Board of Trade is directed to the way the traffic to and from the steamer plying to Tarbert Island is conducted, passengers having to embark and disembark in all weathers in an open boat at serious risk, in consequence of the Steamship Company declining to come alongside the pier, and expresses an earnest request that an immediate inquiry be held; and whether he will comply with this request?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have not seen the resolution to which the hon. Member refers; but I have requested the owners of the steamers which ply between Limerick and Tralee to furnish me with an explanation of the conditions under which passengers were embarked. The reply of the Steamship Company was that although the steamer itself has been surveyed and certified by the Board of Trade, the method of receiving and discharging passengers is entirely under the control of the Local Authority.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the Local Authority, and also whether the Board of Trade has any power to hold an inquiry to ascertain whether the system of embarking and disembarking passengers is dangerous to life?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Local Authority would be the authority of the ports to which the vessel traded.

THE ALLEGED CASE OF CHOLERA AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR. KNOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether he can make any statement with regard to the inquiry into the cause of the death of a female cleaner of the House of Commons referred to in the answer of the President of the Local Government Board to my question yesterday; and whether the cause of death was Asiatic cholera?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): Yes, Sir; a very careful inquiry has hitherto failed to discover any connection, direct or indirect, between this case and any choleraic infection. Nevertheless, the scientific investigation made since yesterday gives a very unfavourable aspect to the case. There is evidence that the woman has for some time past suffered from diarrhoea, and was in a weak and unsatisfactory condition of health, and, moreover, that her home was in some respects in an insanitary condition. I may also add that since the reply given yesterday, one of the Board's Inspectors, Dr. Sweeting, has been instructed to communicate at once with the officers of the Vestry as to the measures to be immediately taken with regard to the sanitary condition of the premises which the woman occupied. If these measures have not already been taken and the premises put into a satisfactory sanitary condition this will be done forthwith.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Has the hon. Gentleman observed a noxious smell in the "Aye" Lobby at the present moment?

[No answer was given.]

COMPENSATION IN CASE OF RIOTS.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in cases where disturbances take place, and property is damaged, and the Riot Act read, who is responsible for the compensation to be paid to the sufferers?

MR. ASQUITH: The Riot and Disturbance Act of 1886 provides that where property in a police district is injured by persons riotously and tumultuously assembled the compensation has to be paid out of the Police Rate of the district, and, therefore, the whole of the ratepayers suffer for the acts of a few.

SATURDAY SITTINGS.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a few questions with regard to Business. First, as to the Saturday Sittings. It was usual, in the time of the late Government, to make Saturday Sittings subject to the Wednesday Rule, and I wish the right hon. Gentleman to indicate whether or not it is the intention of the Government to prolong the Saturday Sitting to any important extent beyond the hour of adjournment on Wednesday? Then I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to take the Report on the Foreign Office Vote to-night at a rather earlier hour than usual to-night, as an important question about Armenia, which it was proposed to raise on that Vote, was shut out by the action of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We propose to follow the precedent set by the late Government, and not continue the Saturday Sitting after 7 o'clock. With regard to the other question of the right hon. Gentleman, I should not have moved the Closure on the Foreign Office Vote if I had not thought that the question was practically settled. But, as I understand there was some misapprehension on that point, we will take the Report at 12 o'clock.

MOTION.

ADJOURNMENT.

COLLIERY DISTURBANCES.

MR. BRUNNER, Member for the North-wich Division of Cheshire, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the disturbances in the colliery districts in Leeds, Pontefract, and Dewsbury; but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen:—

MR. BRUNNER hoped that no Party advantage would be taken of his Motion. It needed no argument to prove to the House that this matter of the disturbances in the colliery districts was urgent and important. His most definite object in making the Motion was to urge upon the Government to press forward—and if need be for that purpose to suspend the Standing Orders—the three Bills providing for arbitration which were now before the House. It had been said that the Government Bill was not an effective Bill, because it did not provide for compulsion. The Bill might have its faults, and the other two Bills might have their faults; but he submitted that they could be amended and made good Bills, if put into the hands of a Select Committee of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was not now discussing the question of the position of affairs in the colliery districts, but the nature of some Bills before the House. That would be quite irregular.

MR. BRUNNER said, that for the last three days news had appeared in the papers, which to his mind was deplorable in the extreme, of disturbances in various parts of the country. Three days ago these disturbances began in South Wales; yesterday they were repeated in other parts of the country, and to-day they had news that disastrous riots, accompanied by arson and bloodshed, had occurred in the three districts he had named in the North of England. It was no doubt right the Local Authorities in these districts should claim the protection of extra police and the presence of Her Majesty's troops, but he did not think it would be right for the House to go on with its ordinary business, content with putting down these riots by force without giving an expression of opinion in favour of settling disputes by reason instead of by force. His opinion was that if the House discussed these disturbances in a spirit of sympathy with those who suffered, especially those who suffered innocently on account of them, the result would be a calming of the public mind, and especially—this was what he particularly desired—a calming of the spirit of anger which now possessed the people in those districts. It was no use, he admitted, preaching patience to hungry men, but he was satisfied that if the House, who was no party to the quarrel, should express sympathy with the sufferers, they would be inclined to accept a reasonable settlement at the hands of whoever might offer it. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) said yesterday, with a touch of austerity, that the working men had refused arbitration. They were perhaps to-day in consequence of those disturbances the less inclined to submit to arbitration.

*MR. SPEAKER said, he was sorry again to interfere; but the hon. Gentleman had obtained the leave of the House to move its Adjournment not for the purpose of discussing the general policy of arbitration, or any policy of that kind contained in Bills before the House, but for the purpose of discussing existing circumstances in the colliery districts.

MR. BRUNNER regretted that he should have trespassed on the good order of the House, but he had no doubt the Speaker would recognise that his intentions, at any rate, were respectful to the Chair and to the House. He trusted that the Government, represented as it was by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would at any rate advise the House what it ought to do under the sad circumstances he had brought under its notice, and that the result of the discussion would tend to the peace and good order of the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Brunner.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): If there is a reasonable prospect of proceeding with the Arbitration Bills before the House, there are no Bills that the Government would be more glad to proceed with than these. I have already stated the reason why it was found impossible to deal with those Bills. With reference to the unhappy events in question, there is no doubt that great sympathy is felt by the House for those who have suffered by them, and deep regret that such circumstances should occur. The House will feel, however, that it would not be expedient or wise at this moment to discuss the position of affairs with the imperfect information they have, and, therefore, I hope the matter will not be further proceeded with, and that my hon. Friend, having stated his feelings on the subject, will kindly withdraw his Motion.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) wished to take the opportunity of addressing a question to the Home Secretary with regard to those most discreditable scenes which had been enacted during the last few days in different parts of the country. He could speak with more or less personal knowledge as to what was going on in the West Riding of Yorkshire. He was in that part of the country within the last two days, and in the very parish where he was resident a large mob, numbered literally by thousands, paraded the district to the terror of Her Majesty's peaceful subjects, brandishing formidable weapons, and conducting themselves in a manner which was absolutely inconsistent with a condition of civilised society. He had not been personally a witness of what occurred, but he was informed to that effect by persons upon whose word he could place the utmost reliance, and who had been witnesses of the scenes to which he referred. He certainly had no intention of making any attack upon the Home Secretary, who deserved the thanks of the community at large for the manner in which he had discharged his duty under circumstances like those he was alluding to, and had always placed at the disposal of the Local Authorities who had made application in due form such additional police force as, in his judgment, was necessitated by the requirements of the case, while the Secretary of State for War had in like manner facilitated the despatch of troops to districts where their presence was required. He, however, asked the right hon. Gentleman to satisfy himself, before he gave his official sanction to the payment of the money of the British taxpayer to the Local Authorities, that they had been duly diligent in the discharge of the duty incumbent on them—namely, that of taking adequate steps for the preservation of the public peace. He wanted to know what steps the Local Authorities took to insure the termination of the disturbances and the prevention of the extension of the evils to neighbouring districts under their control, as he was informed the Chief Constable of the West Riding of Yorkshire, who either was, or should have been, perfectly cognisant of what was going on throughout the district, took no steps, or at any rate no adequate steps, to guard against the continuation and extension of the evils. It was 48 hours or more after those large crowds had been paraded in the manner to which he had referred that excesses took place in the same neighbourhood, and in adjoining parishes and other districts of the West Riding. He thought they were entitled to ask what the authorities of the West Riding were about to allow such a condition of affairs so long to prevail, and why they had not followed the example of the authorities in Wales and taken precautionary measures, by means of which such scandalous occurrences would have been averted. He hoped the Home Secretary would insist on a full inquiry into the conduct of the Chief Constable and of the local Magistracy.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, the information given to the House by the right hon. Gentleman amounted to the fact that he saw, a few days ago, an enormous demonstration in one of the mining districts of the West Riding, and that the men were in a state of fierce excitement; but the right hon. Gentleman had not seen those men committing any turbulent or violent acts.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, he had never said that he himself saw what he described, but he was credibly informed by persons on whose word he could rely that they saw the crowds who, he had further been informed, had brutally assaulted men for no other crime than discharging an honest day's labour.

*MR. CREMER said, the right hon. Gentleman's information being of a secondhand character was still less reliable. He wished to ask the Home Secretary if the statement that a contingent of London police had been drafted into the mining districts was true, and if he was in a position to give the House any information which would lead it to conclude that the statements which had been made day by day by the public Press in regard to acts of violence and outrage committed by the miners were true, or whether he believed them to be exaggerated? He had seen it stated that the scenes of violence that were reported to have occurred had been grossly exaggerated.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The House must have observed, after listening to the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and my right hon. Friend, that it is altogether premature to discuss this question. The right hon. Gentleman opposite suggested that the Local Authorities had shown apathy in the matter, and my hon. Friend suggested that the statements published in the newspapers were untrue. It is, therefore, obvious that the House is not in a position at this moment to form any opinion. The course the Government have to take is a simple one. The Local Authorities are the persons who are by law responsible for the maintenance of order and peace, and if they fail in their duty they are liable to be indicted. If they feel that the resources at their command are inadequate for the preservation of order no Government could refuse them assistance. How far there may have been exaggeration in the statements published, and how far there may have been apathy on the part of the Local Authorities, are matters the House cannot discuss at present. I trust the House will be satisfied with my assurance that the Government have put at the disposal of the Local Authorities the force that is necessary for the maintenance of public order. I deprecate strongly the necessity for the use of force, and I earnestly trust that those who have influence with the miners will seize this opportunity of using it. A few words spoken with authority might have far more tranquillising effect than the use of physical force.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) said, he had just come from Wales. ["Order!"] Yesterday he addressed several bodies of miners with regard to their grievances. [Renewed cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER called the hon. Member to Order, as the House was not discussing the position of affairs in Wales.

MR. BRUNNER asked leave to withdraw his Motion, and thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Home Secretary for what they had said.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON said, that surely he might be permitted to state what he had been an eye-witness of. ["Order!"] He begged to say that men who were on strike in Wales were misled by those people of authority to whom the Home Secretary had referred ["Cries of "Order!"]

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) rose to Order. The hon. Member was referring to the strike in South Wales.

*MR. SPEAKER again called the hon. Member to Order.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON said, he bowed to the ruling of the Chair, but continued to refer to occurrences in Wales.

*MR. SPEAKER (interrupting): Is it your pleasure that the Motion be withdrawn?

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (SATURDAY).

Resolved, That this House do meet To-morrow.—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE
DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS II.

1. £25,680, to complete the sum for Colonial Office.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) desired to express the extreme pleasure with which he had heard the declaration of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies that Her Majesty's Government had seen their way to stopping any forward movement against Lo Bengula for the present; that the South African Company had acquiesced in the advice; and that therefore the danger of a bloody war in South Africa between the European settlers and the natives was for the moment averted. He wished to impress upon Her Majesty's Government, however, that in order to preserve the peace in South Africa not only was great vigilance required on the part of the Colonial Office, but a most active and energetic policy was necessary. Nobody in this country knew the real cause of the quarrel between Lo Bengula and the British settlers. In all these quarrels between Europeans and natives one never heard more than one side of the question, and the natives' case was not stated. He was sorry to see signs of a desire in some quarters to get up a feeling in this country against Lo Bengula, and to hound the Government on and induce them to indulge in a disastrous war. Nobody knew what the causes of the quarrel with Lo Bengula were; but, reading between the lines and drawing upon one's experience in disputes of the kind, he felt sure that the Government would exercise the most wise and salutary influence if they turned a deaf ear to any proposal for an attack upon Lo Bengula. He could not help improving the occasion by pointing out the great dangers and difficulties of the policy which allowed of the existence of Chartered Companies. He had some right to speak on the subject, because he opposed most vehemently the first Charter of the kind ever granted, that to the North Borneo Company, and took the sense of the House against it. He had the support on that occasion of the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) and the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill). The affair in South Africa was an example of the serious dangers to which the granting of Charters to companies of this kind in uncivilised territories gave rise. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary had wisely refused to respond to a challenge thrown down by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and to state the general policy of the Government with regard to Chartered Companies. He (Sir J. Gorst) did not believe the Government had any policy on the subject, or that any Government ever had. British Governments had drifted into one Charter after another, and he had no doubt the granting of such Charters would continue until it landed Great Britain in some national disaster, when the country would wake up and the reign of Chartered Companies would come to an end. If a Chartered Company could be left entirely to itself and allowed to suffer the consequences of any injustice or unwise attack made upon the native races, it might, perhaps, govern as wisely as Her Majesty's Government. Every Chartered Company, however, knew that it had the Government at its back. The South African Company knew very well that if it made an attack on Lo Bengula, and he in retaliation slaughtered British settlers, the Government would have to interfere. The policy of Chartered Companies seemed to be one of drifting into national responsibilities which were sure to involve this country in the greatest difficulties whenever the affairs of any Company arrived at a critical position. The position of things in South Africa was an object lesson to this country. If the present strained relations resulted in war, this country would have to lavish its blood and treasure in bringing to a successful conclusion affairs in the initiation of which it had no hand whatever. The Government had not sufficient control over the Companies to prevent them quarrelling with native Chiefs, but the Companies had sufficient control over the Government to force them to come to their assistance and to save themselves from the consequence of their injustice or bad policy. He hoped that vigorous action on the part of the Government might avert the danger at present threatened in South Africa. There was nothing more important to the British settlers there than the maintenance of peace. He hoped the Government would lay the present peril to heart, and that either this or the next Government would arrive at a definite policy about Chartered Companies before a national disaster occurred.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. Buxton, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to thank him for the tone he has adopted in his speech. It compared very favourably with the big-drum beating we had from the hon. Member for Sheffield (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett) last night, and I think it will tend, as far as a speech can tend, towards the result we all have at heart — namely, the maintenance of peace in South Africa. I am afraid, however, I must not take quite such a sanguine view as the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the possibility of averting a war. I hope and believe that war will be averted, but at the present moment it is impossible for me to make any strong statement on the subject. Both the Government and those who are responsible for the work of the Chartered Company are at the present moment working in accord for the maintenance of peace, and I think the result will be to maintain peace. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that what must be deprecated at the present moment are the excited, warlike, and bloodthirsty letters and speeches emanating, I am sorry to say, to a large extent from those who ought not to preach war—I mean missionaries in some parts of Africa. The danger we run at the present moment is that those who are on the spot, many of them being naturally in an excited state of mind, many of them being hot-headed and perhaps not under the proper control of those in charge of the country, may by some indiscreet act get us into war. Unfortunately there always has been, especially in South Africa, a party which has been in favour of these native wars, because unhappily a large number of the people obtain very great pecuniary advantages from such wars. I think it was Sir C. Warren's army in 1884 which was called the "Salvation Army," because nearly everybody in South Africa made a good thing out of that war. There are some who speak as if these raids were a new thing, and as if it were the duty of the Government and of the Company to carry out a crusade against Lo Bengula and the Matabele on account of their recent action. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) says we only hear one side of the question. I am glad to know that in this case we have received through Sir Henry Loch a great deal of information from Lo Bengula himself, and also from Mr.

Mr. S. Buxton

Collenbrander and others living at his kraal. I said last night, and repeat now, that the blame, as far as there is blame, is by no means all on one side, and that while I do not say there was justification for the raiding of Lo Bengula's impi, as far as Lo Bengula is personally concerned he is anxious to live in friendly terms with the whites, as far as we can judge, and that the officer in charge of the impi exceeded his orders in interfering with the white men. I say at present that there is no justification for an aggressive movement, and I am sure that those in charge for the Chartered Company are not in a position to make such a movement. The Government thought it their duty to step in and to say that, at the present moment at all events, they would prohibit any aggressive action likely to lead to war in South Africa. As the right hon. Gentleman has truly said, a war if it takes place cannot be necessarily confined to Matabeleland and Mashonaland. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the position of Chartered Companies and their relations with the Imperial Government. I declined last night to discuss the general policy respecting Chartered Companies, because I did not think this a happy or appropriate occasion on which to do so. I may say, however, I agree very much with the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman. I agree that we have very much in the past drifted into these Chartered Companies, and the experience we have now had of their action is not so encouraging that it is likely any Government will give further Charters. There is, however, this to be said in discussing the question, and it certainly was brought before the Government of the day with regard to the British South Africa Company—namely, that if that Company had not undertaken at the moment the administration and opening up of Mashonaland possibly the Government was not in a position to undertake that responsibility, and the territory might have been lost to the United Kingdom and absorbed in the Transvaal. That we shall all admit would have been under the circumstances a great mistake. I am bound to say that the present position in these days of Chartered Companies, whose responsibility, as the right hon. Gentleman has pointed out, breaks down just when we want it to be effective, is a great anomaly.

As far as the British South Africa Company are concerned, they informed me that they are prepared to carry out their responsibility. I can only trust that, thanks to the moderate desires and actions of those responsible for the proceedings of the Company, and thanks I must say to the action of the Government supported by this House, the great danger may be averted, and that a war which would be a very serious one for South Africa will not take place.

*MR. E. H. BAYLEY (Camberwell, N.) wished to refer to a question relating to Gibraltar. In the first place, he must protest against the mistake that was usually made in referring to the people of Gibraltar as inhabitants of a fortress. As a matter of fact, the guns were placed on the top of the Rock of Gibraltar, and the Colony was at the foot of the hill. It was as inaccurate to say that the people were living in a fortress as to say that the people of the City of London were living in the Tower of London. In the Colony of Gibraltar about £60,000 a year of local taxation was raised, and up to two years ago the ratepayers had a voting power over the expenditure of their own money. Local affairs were managed by a mixed Sanitary Board, consisting of Commissioners partly appointed by the Governor, and partly selected by him from a list of names submitted by the Grand Jury. The ratepayers now complained that two years ago, by a stroke of the pen, they were deprived of their representation on the Board, which was made to consist entirely of the officials nominated by the Governor. The reason why this action was taken was that the ratepayers' representatives on the Board declined to be parties to a flagrant job, which was being forced upon them by the official members—namely, the spending of £50,000 on a scheme for driving a tunnel through the rock in search of water. This scheme had now been dropped. It was said in opposition to the proposal that no water would be found, that the cost would be enormous, that a better supply would be obtained by surface collection, and that the tunnel would render the rock no longer impregnable. The Government had now to some extent retraced their steps by giving the ratepayers a representation of four members, the remaining five being nominated by the Governor. As the ratepayers paid two-thirds of the taxation, they were entitled to two-thirds of the members, or six out of the nine. As it was, however, they were in a minority, whilst the official members consisted of men not necessarily taxpayers or persons holding any stake in the Colony, and who might be here to-day and gone to-morrow. He contended that the principle that taxation and representation should go together, which the Liberal Party upheld in the House of Commons, should be made to apply to all the Colonies of the Empire.

*MR. S. BUXTON: I am obliged to my hon. Friend for his speech, because I am sure he has the same desire as we have to meet the views of the ratepayers of Gibraltar as far as is possible. I must, however, point out to him that when we came into Office, and considered the questions dealing with Gibraltar, there were five subjects in which the ratepayers seemed to be interested. The first was the question of the restoration to the Grand Jury of the privilege of nominating the panel from which the unofficial Commissioners were selected. That privilege we granted with great pleasure. The second was that the Commissioners should have the power of appointing their own Chairman. That was also conceded. The third was the separation of the office of Colonial Engineer from that of Engineer to the Sanitary Board and other offices, and giving the Commissioners power to appoint their own Engineer. That was conceded, as was also the fourth request—namely, that the power of the Governor to veto the construction of a work by the Board and of requiring the Board to defray from the rates the cost of public works now executed by the Commissioners should cease. Finally, it was asked that in future the Colonial Secretary should cease to be a Member of the Board. On that, as on the other points, we were able to meet the ratepayers. There was a further point in which they considered they had a grievance, and I am bound to say I think it was a very serious one. It related to the question of the water and drainage scheme. That is very much a question of engineering, as to the details of which we ourselves are hardly in a position to speak; but the conclusion we have come to is that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the question of the sanitation, and the water supply of Gibraltar, and that on that Commission the ratepayers should be directly represented, not only by their own Chairman, but by one of their non-official members. Finally, there is the question of proportional representation on the Sanitary Board. At this point I must draw attention to one fact, which I think my hon. Friend omitted—namely, that in the original proposal of the deputation of ratepayers it was stated that the question of representation might easily be solved in a manner satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government if the other matters they referred to were conceded to them. We have met them as regards the other matters; but Her Majesty's Government cannot give them a majority on the Board. Rightly or wrongly, we have felt bound to treat Gibraltar as a fortress rather than as an ordinary Colony. I agree with the general principle as to taxation and representation, but we say that the principle cannot be carried out fully here, for we are bound to treat Gibraltar as a fortress. We have no desire and no intention to control the proceedings of the Sanitary Board by the official majority unless in matters which affect defence. There is perfect liberty in other matters—the official majority in all the cases can vote as they like, not being bound by any official view. The Police Magistrate the other day was put on to the Board temporarily to take the place of another official member on leave. This was done under a misapprehension of our desires. We certainly do not desire, in the case of a temporary absence of an official member, to show distrust of the Board by appointing another and a temporary member. I hope the hon. Gentleman will be satisfied that we have endeavoured to meet his views and those of the ratepayers on this question.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) said, he had nothing to say in reply to the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. It was only right the Government should take care and look at the matter from the official point of view, but he did not think they would press their views further than were necessary. His object in rising was to know what steps had been taken to remedy the crying grievances existing in the Crown Colony of St. Helena? He hoped something had been done in regard to these grievances. He did not think the decrease of the population was a matter for regret, but it had transpired that there was great disproportion in the number of women and children and that of men. His suggestion was that the Government should make use of the assistance of the Admiralty to carry off some of the surplus population to South Africa. There was another matter to which he wished to call the attention of the Under Secretary. It was with regard to the Bahamas, and the statements which had been made and circulated among Members by Chief Justice Yelverton, to the effect that the administration of justice was grossly corrupt, that the Members of the House of Assembly were influenced by bribes, and that only six out of the 29 Members in the House were not related to, or connected with, one another. He had had an interview with the Chief Justice, which he found to be extremely painful. He cared nothing for the Bahamas, but when such charges had been made by such a high legal officer it was right that a Commission of Inquiry should be appointed to investigate the accusations on the spot, as had been done in Jamaica in the case of Governor Eyre. The charges were certainly of a very grave character, and he need not recapitulate them, but they were certainly entitled to some reply on this question from the Government. He repeated, that the charges might be true or false; he did not know—he hoped they were false—but, at all events, there should be a proper inquiry into them. Either they were true or false—if true, then there should be a proper reform of administration; if false, then the Chief Justice should be dismissed. That, he thought, was a demand which the Government could not resist. The question was not a Party one; it was simply that it was alleged that a moral sewer existed; if that were the case, then they ought to cleanse it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): We have all listened with great interest, I am sure, to the speech which we have just heard. This is, Sir, an advantage, at least, we shall have in this discussion those who take an interest in the circumstances. The matter would have come upon us by surprise. For some months past we have been deluged by letters, by questions, and by newspaper paragraphs with respect to the matters to which my hon. and gallant Friend has called attention. Although the questions came from different parts of the House, and the letters appeared under different signatures, and some with none, every one of them was due to the intervention of the person with whom my hon. and gallant Friend had that interview which he described as extremely painful. Unlike my hon. and gallant Friend, I feel a great interest in these Islands. A relative of mine happens to be there, and I have heard very much about them. Now, let me, in the first place, assure my hon. and gallant Friend that in spite of the insinuations which have been made there is no general discontent or dissatisfaction in the Bahamas. The feeling is general that the present Governor has performed his duty very much to the advantage of the islands. These are not charges, but very disgraceful calumnies and insinuations. A charge is made against the Legislative Council. Well, Sir, in the Legislative Council, which consists of nine Members, there is no such connection between the Members as has been alleged; but in the Legislative Assembly there are persons who are connected by relationship that did not lead to corruption. That, Sir, is natural. When the population is small it is not possible to obtain competent persons without taking some who may have some sort of relationship with one another. It is more likely that should occur in a place where the population is small than that it should happen here with us. There is a population of, I think, 45,000, only 12,000 of whom are whites. How can you select fit men for a Legislature in a community of this kind without running the risk of choosing from amongst those who are related? I say, Sir, it is not possible—we must take them as we find them, which is largely among those who have relationship one with another. It is only by cowardly insinuation that we are told that this relationship is a disadvantage. I say that the greatest advantage has accrued from the present system. What I complain especially of is the fact that these cowardly insinuations should be made by a public officer—though on half-pay, he is that—at a time when the Governor was absent, at a time when no fair reply could be made. We have heard that this place is a moral sewer. I would like to read my hon. and gallant Friend the remarks made by Lord Herschell (Lord Chancellor of England) when these matters were before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Lord Herschell said—

“With regard to the documents which you are about to refer to, headed ‘Notes by the Chief Justice of the Colony.’ They consist in large part of a number of scandalous allegations about a great number of people in the Colony, and have no possible bearing on the questions of law which have been referred to this Board. They cannot be allowed to remain here on record in this case, because it is impossible to allow a reference of this sort from Her Majesty to be made the vehicle of disseminating scandalous matter of that description.”

I hope, at all events, to take my part in preventing the Committee of this House being made the vehicle of disseminating without contradiction that same scandalous matter which, of course, the Privy Council refused to entertain. I want to say a word or two about the Governor of the Colony, who, I think, is the chief victim of these abominable allegations. I have only recently made the acquaintance of Sir Ambrose Shea, but in consequence of the interest I have in the Islands I have been able to learn a good deal about him. These Islands were of a most God-forsaken character until quite recently. At the time of the Civil War many of the people made considerable fortunes, but, like other fortunes easily acquired, they were not properly spent, and I think very little really permanent benefit accrued to the Islanders by the profits then made. Since that time the Islands had been going down, and only two industries were carried on. One was the sponge industry, which is very laborious and brings very little profit to those who undertook it. The other was the fruit industry, the profits of which vary considerably according to the climate. The inhabitants consist largely of people of colour, who are very good-tempered and contented people, and deserve a much better fate than they have met with. But for years past they have almost been starving in consequence of the trifling amount of employment they have been able to obtain. Sir Ambrose Shea, unlike other Colonial officials, was a man of business before he became an official, and he entered the Colonial Service late in life. As soon as he became Governor he set to work to improve the condition of the inhabitants. He was struck by a plant which was regarded as little better than a weed, but which he thought would produce a very good fibre. I do not say he discovered the plant, but it is certainly owing entirely to his individual energy and action that the help of a number of capitalists, some from America and some from this country, has been secured for the purpose of experimenting with this plant. Thousands and tens of thousands of pounds are being spent, and it is certain that the experiment will be carried out on an adequate scale and with every chance of success. I am not so sanguine as the Governor himself is as to the result that will be obtained. - The attempt is, in my opinion, a great speculation, but whatever its results, the benefit to the Islands of trying the experiment has been enormous. Even if the experiment fails large sums will have been spent and a large amount of employment given to the poor people, whereas if it succeeds much work will be provided, and no doubt the Colony will become one of the most prosperous in the West Indies. All this has been done by one man, and I say that, in the interests of the Public Service, when you find a man goes beyond the red tape of his office and initiates an industry for the purpose of benefiting the people he ought to have the sympathy and support of this House and the full confidence of his employers. He certainly ought not to be made the subject of scandalous and absolutely baseless insinuations.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I never mentioned his name.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I absolutely acquit my hon. and gallant friend of having acted unfairly. I am sure these circumstances were unknown to him, and I am certain that he will agree with me that a man who has done work of this kind deserves commendation and ought not to be made the subject of such attacks as Mr. Yelverton has published throughout the land. This Mr. Yelverton has made attacks on almost every person of position in the Colony.

Mr. Yelverton is Chief Justice of the Bahamas—that Colony has been most unfortunate in its Chief Justices. They are appointed by the Home Government, and I cannot help wondering what genius of discord presides over the appointments of Chief Justices of these small Colonies. The late Chief Justice—the gentleman of the murder case—has been alluded to. He got into hot water in reference to that case, and so great was the feeling of the Colonial Office with regard to his action that he was retired on a pension, which this unfortunate little Colony has to pay to this day. Thus you have a Chief Justice; forced upon the Colony, or appointed without reference to the Colony, by this country, and when the Chief Justice misbehaves himself and the Colonial Office recognise that the appointment is a mistake, it is not this country which pays the cost, but the Colony. After this experience the Colony begged the Local Authorities to be very particular in the gentleman who was to succeed the late Chief Justice, and at the suggestion of the Colonial Office they raised the salary of the Chief Justice from £700 to £1,000, in order to have a really first-class man. Just a word about the title of Chief Justice. Chief Justice is a big word, but in the Bahamas it means a very small thing. The Chief Justice has no Judges sitting with him; he is the only Judge in the Colony, and not only is he Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, but he is the Supreme Court. There are a number of Magistrates who are paid astounding salaries, varying from £50 to £250 a year, and I believe they do justice quite as well as can be expected under the circumstances, and upon the whole their decisions have given satisfaction. The Chief Justice is required to review the decisions of these inferior Courts, and to take the more serious cases. I only regret that we should have to use the title of Chief Justice, because there are some people who are carried away and swelled out with the importance of the name that is given to them. I believe that if Mr. Yelverton had been called a Magistrate he never would have made such a fool of himself. It is only because this briefless barrister who was sent out there has been swaggering about ever since with the title of Chief Justice that he has been swelling himself like the frog in the fable until he has gone very near to bursting. Mr. Yelverton was appointed by the late Government. When he went to the Colonies the first thing he did after being there 14 days was to ask for leave of absence, and he was absent for 4 months. Even the short period of 14 days was enough to show some of the peculiarities of this judicial authority. He is an eccentric person, and one of his eccentricities is that he has a terrible fear of anything in the nature of a contagious disorder. The mere report of a contagious disease within 100 miles of him fills his mind with terror. I do not say he fears for himself, but he is afraid because of his office. A Member of Parliament or any other ordinary person might die of disease; but if disease should attack a Chief Justice there is no knowing but that the constellations might fall. Accordingly during the 14 days of his first visit he wrote to the papers that there was going to be an exhibition in Jamaica, and that the passage of people to and fro might be the means of importing disease into the Colony. He therefore begged the authorities to take the utmost precautions against the importation of disease. I do not wonder that the colonials thought this was an extraordinary performance for this gentleman to indulge in. In 1891, the second year of his appointment, he again obtained leave of absence, and was absent for five months. I may say that the Colony does not object to his absence. What the Colony objects to is the presence of this gentleman, and I believe that, had he been away even longer, no complaints on that score would have come from the Colony. He returned, and again he exhibited a great number of peculiarities, which, in the opinion of the colonists, tended to lessen the dignity of the Bench he was supposed to adorn. He wrote letters to the newspapers, and engaged in controversy on every conceivable subject, and he took the opportunity given by his position to deliver allocutions from the Bench, which are extremely humorous performances. I must refer to two of them. On one occasion he delivered from the Bench a long speech, in which he said that on a recent occasion he had delivered a judgment in favour of a man of colour in the island; that thereupon the grateful man of colour had attempted to corrupt the Bench by offering him a present of six pine-apples, and, with an expression of horror at the conception the man must have had of the character of the Chief Justice, he stated for the benefit of all whom it might concern that he had refused the gift, and he said it was necessary to call attention to the matter, so that the Resident Justices might understand that the Bench must be preserved pure and incorruptible. Well, this was thought to be a display of virtue which was quite unnecessary. It was thought that the Chief Justice might have refused six pine-apples without making such a fuss about it. Later on he wrote another letter to a newspaper. It appears that 500 tons of coal were being imported into the Bahamas for the use of the lighthouse service. The Chief Justice wrote to the local newspaper to say he had heard with alarm of the intention to import this coal. He had reason to believe that coal contained the germs of malarious disease. He did not think it beyond the bounds of possibility that this coal might contain the germs of yellow fever, and that the whole of the Colony might be affected. He therefore entered his solemn protest against the suggestion that 500 tons of coal should be stored at Nassau for the use of the lighthouse service. I do not know how my hon. Friend, if he had been living in the Colony, would have viewed these continual outbursts from this judicial authority. The colonists were not without a certain kind of rough humour, and after this display on the part of the Chief Justice there appeared an anonymous letter in a local paper signed "Colonist," of which I must read one or two paragraphs. The writer says—

"Search the annals of the Bench of every country, of every age, and I defy creation to produce a more noble, more self-denying, and more virtuous exhibition of a tender conscience than was afforded by our Chief Justice in refusing to accept a gift of pine-apples! Some cynic has said, 'Every man has his price.' It is assuring to this community to know that the 'Fount of Justice' in this Colony is above the price of even one dozen pine-apples. Mr. Yelverton's noble words of scornful renunciation should be graven in letters of gold upon the walls of every Magisterial office in this Colony; then, and not till then, will sweet potatoes, pigeon peas, &c., cease to exert their baneful influence on the administration of justice in this Colony. But should we be selfish and confine the influence of such virtue to the limited area of this Colony? No, Mr. Editor; I and others cherish the hope that this beautiful incident will become historical, and the whole world be benefited by this last and greatest proof of the purity of English justice."

The letter goes on to say—

"A great many people of this city are mean enough to say that he should risk his valuable life to attend to the duties of his office in summer as well as winter—they contend that the day of non-resident officialdom is over, and that a man should reside in the Colony that pays him his salary—the law allows six weeks leave of absence, and Mr. Yelverton should be subservient to that law if to no other."

It goes on with the following ironical remark :—

"Fevers, like thunderstorms, have their uses in West Indian Colonies. Fever is regarded by the natives as a merciful provision of Providence to clear the atmosphere of the Civil Service of some officials who are exhaled and emanate from Downing Street."

By those of us who are well acquainted with the humours of political life in this country, I think it will be agreed that, although we may not necessarily approve the good taste of this communication, it does not go nearly as far as our newspaper editors go every day of their lives. On the publication of the letter, the Chief Justice summoned the editor of the paper, Mr. Moseley, to his Court. He demanded that the editor should give up the name of the colonist who had written such an abominable letter. The editor refused, and the Chief Justice proceeded to find him guilty of contempt of Court and to deliver the judgment of the Court. I could not possibly read the whole of the judgment, which fills several pages of the pamphlet I have before me, but really it is a most noble allocution. He says—

"You have grossly insulted this Court and the administration of justice. You talk of the combined wisdom of Governor Shea, Providence, the Board of Health, and the Chief Justice, whom you satirically describe in the second paragraph of your article, quoting from the judgment to which I have referred, as an 'English Barrister,' and to whom you mockingly allude as a 'luminary of the English Bar.'"

He goes on—

"This is your way of criticising the action of the Chief Justice with regard to the case for Eleuthera, to which I have referred. Comment is needless. Had it been the language of some idler from the Shambles I should not have been so astonished. And, then, in that language of mocking admiration which you demean yourself into publishing, you go on to give the Chief Justice what you (or your vulgar correspondent) call words of warning."

Continuing, Mr. Yelverton says—

"Then comes a most horrible paragraph, the wish being evidently the father to the thought."

And he goes on to quote the remark about fevers being like thunderstorms, and adds—

"You go on to suggest that officials should be sent to live in unhealthy offices here, so as to expedite their deaths, and then, in a similar foul strain, in a Colony where it is essential that the law should be maintained and respected, and human life guarded, you wind up a letter which I forbear again to criticise by what you or your correspondents are evidently pleased to consider an insulting allusion to myself and others connected with the Government of the Colony. What is the universal opinion as to such a production? There is but one, and that is emphatic condemnation. This Court is glad to see that, notwithstanding insidious attempts (and the Court is alive to what goes on around it), the heart of the Colony as an integral part of the British Empire is sound."

After the explanation of the circumstances the Chief Justice proceeded to sentence the editor of the paper, for contempt of Court, to be imprisoned during his pleasure, and then to pay two separate fines, and he was to be detained in custody until the fines had been paid. The editor accordingly went to gaol. There was, as may well be supposed, the greatest indignation in the Colony, and a very near approach to a public riot. A deputation, consisting of all the principal inhabitants of the Colony, including five ministers of religion, and a number of Magistrates and Members of the Legislative Assembly, waited upon the Governor, and asked him to release the editor. The Governor very properly telegraphed home to ask whether he had the power to exercise the clemency of the Crown, and thereupon he released the prisoner. There was great rejoicing in the Colony at his action, and flags were displayed in the streets in honour of the occasion. The Chief Justice, furious at the interference of the Governor, not only came home to England to raise before the Privy Council the question whether the Governor had power to release the editor, but, as circumstances have shown, endeavoured to calumniate the Governor and every man of influence in the Colony on account of the view they took of his very extraordinary proceeding. The matter came before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the view they took of it may be gathered from certain interlocutory observations made by some of the Members of that tribunal. The Lord Chancellor said—

“The point to be considered was whether it was contempt to suggest that an occupant of the Bench was wanting in wisdom or was foolish.”

Lord Watson said—

“He should be sorry if every person who happened to call him a fool, in respect of some judgment he had delivered, was to be held guilty of contempt. It would depend on the circumstances.”

The Lord Chancellor further said—

“If a Judge steps into the arena of newspaper criticism, you cannot regard a letter written in the course of a newspaper controversy in the same light as what I may call a volunteered attack.”

In conclusion, after having heard all the arguments, both for and against, the Court came to the conclusion, firstly, that the letter signed “Colonist” was not, in the circumstances, calculated to obstruct or interfere with the course of justice or the due administration of the law, and, therefore, did not constitute a contempt of Court, and that Mr. Moseley was not guilty of contempt of Court in refusing to give up the name of the writer; and, lastly, that the Royal prerogative did extend to such cases. Therefore, the Judicial Committee gave their decision against the Chief Justice. Well, I think I have said enough to justify the Governor of the Colony in the action he has taken, and also to show the Committee the character of the person who now constitutes himself his traducer. I want, in conclusion, to ask some questions of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies. I have not one word of criticism or complaint to make use of respecting the action of the Colonial Office in this matter. They have treated the Chief Justice with consideration, but they have meted out complete justice to the parties. But I wish to point out that the situation at present is intolerable. This man has now been absent from the Colony since June in last year. During the whole of that time he has been receiving half-pay from the Colony. Formerly this payment was voted by the Legislative Assembly. That Assembly has given the Government distinctly to understand that, whatever the circumstances, they will not pay another farthing. But the Colonial Office, who have no money at their disposal, have, until the Chief Justice is disposed of, to find half-pay. They have found it by charging it to the Crown funds of the Colony, so that it is exactly the same thing as though it were paid by a Vote of the Legislative Assembly, as the Crown funds belong to the Colony, and not to this country. We have no right to pay out of their money a Chief Justice whom they would not have at any price. I must say I think the time has come when this interregnum ought to be closed, and the Colony should be told what is in future to be the position of the Chief Justice; whether he is to be sent back or not, and whether they are to be called upon, in meal or in malt, to pay his salary. The Chief Justice, who is at present a public official, is writing to the newspapers letters containing these calumnious assertions. I wish to know whether this is in accordance with the Regulations of the Public Service? Then, Sir, I ask my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, as far as he is aware, there is any foundation whatever for these exceedingly dishonouring charges which the Chief Justice has brought against the Governor of the Colony and against other responsible and respectable persons? I would only say, in conclusion, that I hope my hon. Friend will confirm the opinion I have formed that these charges are groundless, and that they have only been made as an afterthought in consequence of the difficulty into which the Chief Justice has got himself. I will ask the Under Secretary whether, in such circumstances, it can be contended for a moment that a man who has behaved in this way, who has provoked and insulted and libelled so many of the chief persons in the Colony, can possibly be allowed to return to the Colony in the important position of Chief Justice, and whether, under these circumstances, he is in a position to announce that some change will be made in respect of him?

MR. LITTLE (Whitehaven) observed that there was a question of principle underlying this case. The first point he desired to touch upon was in regard to Judges in the Colonies having unlimited power of committing for contempt of Court. That was considered a very grave power, even in England, and within the last quarter of a century, even in the Supreme Courts in England, there had been cases in which there had been grave doubts as to whether that power had been rightly exercised. When they came to these small Crown Colonies, when men were appointed Chief Justices or Justices, some of whom had never had the conduct of a civil action of any kind whatever in the course of their practice at the Bar, and when they gave to these men the same power of committal for contempt of Court that was given to the Judges of the Supreme Court in England, he need hardly point out that grave injustice had been frequently done. Let any lawyer in this House take the Privy Council cases for the last 20 years, and, on consideration of the cases in regard to committals for contempt of Court, he would come to two conclusions: first, that in many of these cases the Judges in these Crown Colonies had done substantial injustice in cases in which they had committed people for contempt of Court; and, secondly, that in some cases that substantial injustice could not be remedied. He mentioned the case of a newspaper editor, who was also a barrister, who was committed for contempt of Court, and imprisoned for a lengthened period, besides being fined. During the time of his imprisonment his wife died; and when he came out, having been imprisoned in this not too healthy climate, he himself died within a short time after he had received the decision of the Privy Council that he ought never to have been committed at all. He could mention other instances not so serious, but which, at any rate, went to show that such a power ought not to be placed in the hands of men appointed in this way. This matter about committal for contempt of Court had been the subject of dispute for years between the Colonial Office and some of the Crown Colonies. One of the Crown Colonies passed a legislative Act and sent it home to the Colonial Office. This Act contained a number of very valuable provisions, giving a man a right to trial by jury, and, among other things, it limited the power of imprisonment for contempt. The Colonial Office, however, was, he believed, still squabbling with that Colony over the question of whether the Act should be passed in the form it was sent over or not. He suggested to the Under Secretary that the time had come when they ought to have a general Act with regard to every Crown Colony providing against this arbitrary power of committal for contempt of Court, and he hoped the Committee would receive an assurance that the subject should be considered. He believed that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had perfectly satisfied the Committee that there were no grounds for the charges made by the Chief Justice. He (Mr. Little) had friends in a neighbouring Colony, and the information he had received in regard to this matter convinced him on this point. Again, he was satisfied that if the Chief Justice had had a case at all he would have been able to have found amongst his brethren of the Bar in that House one who would have taken up his case and placed it before the Committee, and the worst possible point against the Chief Justice was that among the innumerable lawyers that overcrowded the House he had not been able to find one to put his case before the Committee. Dealing with the position of a Chief Justice in the Colonies, he pointed out that while the Chief Justice in a number of cases investigated was outside the Legislative Council, yet in some of the Colonies he had a most extraordinary way of having representatives inside the Legislative Council. For instance, he had the power of appointing men to be Receivers in Bankruptcy whose accounts he had to supervise, and the moment these men were appointed they were simply and purely the servants of the Chief Justice in the Legislative Assembly. The Colonial Office ought to purify the administration in these Crown Colonies by putting an end to such a state of things, which had often resulted in transactions not creditable. The hon. and gallant Admiral had referred to the Jamaica Commission. Within the last 12 months the Colonial Office had sent out a Commission composed of Sir William Markby and Sir Frederick Pollock, and that Commission with regard to another of our Crown Colonies recommended the retirement of two of the Judges, and another was transferred; and if there had been any reason for anything of that sort in this instance, the Colonial Office would have acted in the same way. All who read the evidence given before the Commission to which he referred must come to the conclusion that more supervision was required in these Crown Colonies than the Colonial Office at present exercised in regard to Judges. In that case it was clear that the Chief Justice year after year had been acting in a way contrary to all ideas and all practice of justice, and that another Judge had acted in a way which made him practically the echo of the Chief Justice. But all this had gone on for years, and five years before the Commission was issued there had been complaints from the Chamber of Commerce of Tobago with regard to the administration of justice in that island. He would suggest that instead of having the expense of a Commission, with this long delay before these things could be properly investigated, it might be desirable to establish, in the case of these small Crown Colonies, something in the shape of a Judicial Visitor. That was to say, instead of the Colonial Office getting Reports at home, and endeavouring to form a judgment, a man of judicial experience should be sent out to the Colonies, not to investigate specific charges, but in order to supervise the administration of justice, by seeing that things were being conducted in a proper and orderly manner. From the Report of the Commission to which he had alluded, it was perfectly manifest that if anyone with the experience of the administration of justice had gone to the Colony and investigated the proceedings, the whole thing must at once have been put an end to, instead of having been a source of expense and trouble for a period of five years after the charges against the Chief Justice had been seriously made to the Foreign Office.

*MR. GODSON (Kidderminster), as one who had practised at the Bar for a good many years with Mr. Yelverton, desired to say a few words for him. His statements might be accurate or inaccurate, but everyone who knew Mr. Yelverton would recognise that he would not have made the statements he did if he did not himself believe in the truth of every word of the charges he made. He (Mr. Godson) was sorry to hear the tone in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham took up the other side of the question. He himself was not going to weary the Committee by going into either one side or the other. He took a very serious view of the whole case. Certain facts had been alleged on the one side, and certain facts had been alleged on the other. They were totally inconsistent and contradictory, and that was the very best argument for the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry perfectly independent of all parties, and framed upon the precedent of the Commission to which the last speaker had referred. He did not think there was any foundation for one of the attacks made by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham upon Mr. Yelverton—namely, that these facts were not laid before the public by him or on his behalf until he had had this adverse decision in the Privy Council. In fact, Mr. Yelverton had, soon after his arrival in the Colony, laid these facts before the Governor, who had referred the matter to the very Attorney General whose conduct was impugned. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that Mr. Yelverton could not return to the Colony. Possibly, practically not. Of course, as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, the question of his right to commit for contempt for acts committed outside the Courts having been decided against him, it would make his return unpleasant; but there was, theoretically and technically, nothing whatever to prevent Mr. Yelverton taking up his position again. He admitted that Mr. Yelverton made a foolish mistake; but there was no imputation whatever against Mr. Yelverton's character in any way, professional or private; therefore the assertion made by the Member for West Birmingham was not strictly supported by the fact. It was most important that in all the Colonies, and more especially in a poor one, the Legal Advisers of the Government should be perfectly independent men, and there was nothing more injurious and likely to bring about a miscarriage of justice than that a man in any way connected with the island should be appointed to a responsible legal position. That was the objection he had to the gentleman who occupied the position of Attorney General in this case. He should be free from bias and local prejudice. The Attorney General in this Colony was closely connected with the leading citizens. In one case he had to prosecute his wife's nephew. He could not imagine a case in which a man would be more likely to go astray. Again, take the case in which he prosecuted a man for stabbing another man. It was clear that it was a case of either murder or manslaughter, but the Attorney General, to whom the prisoner appeared to be somewhat distantly related, took good care he should be tried for neither of these offences, and presented a bill from the Grand Jury—which in that island was the Attorney General for the time being—for a very minor charge. The then Chief Justice (Mr. Austin) must have felt that the offence was a very grave and serious one, or he would never have imposed the sentence of two years' imprisonment, the highest sentence the law allowed. He was glad to hear that a gentleman had been sent over by the Colonial Office to take up a judicial position in this Colony who would be independent of any local feeling. He thought that was a very wise and judicious proceeding on the part of the Colonial Office. He would urge that this Attorney General should be removed from the position he occupied, for it was perfectly clear he could not do justice as between the Crown and friends and relations of his who might be brought into trouble. He trusted the Government would grant this Commission, and that they would also give it power to report generally upon the manner in which legal proceedings were conducted in that Colony.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Longford, N.) said, it was not often his fortune to agree with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, but on this occasion he fully concurred with almost everything the right hon. Gentleman had said. He did not intend to go into this long controversy as to the Chief Justice's conduct and the various legal questions connected with it; he only wanted to bear his personal testimony to the integrity and high character of Sir Ambrose Shea. He was the only Colonial Governor he knew of under whose influence and care a Colony had grown up from something like bankruptcy to a condition of actual and increasing prosperity. This result had been brought about in a great measure because of the watchfulness, foresight, and the close and strict business management of Sir Ambrose Shea, who was entitled to every consideration and respect from that House. He only rose to offer his humble testimony to the character which Sir Ambrose Shea bore, and the opinion which all those who knew him had long formed of his integrity and abilities.

MR. S. BUXTON: In regard to the question of the distress in St. Helena, to which the hon. and gallant Admiral referred in his opening remarks, I cordially sympathise with the view he has laid before the Committee. We deplore the falling-off in the trade of St. Helena, and the unfortunate distress which exists in that island. The hon. Gentleman called my attention to what had been done by the Admiralty, and asked whether we intended to take further steps in that direction. I think I have shown already that we have taken steps, and he will be glad to hear that the other day one of Her Majesty's troopships did take off four families—in all 22 souls—from the island to South Africa. This, I hope, is only an instalment; and I may tell him that, as far as we have any control in the matter, we shall take care that these persons taken by the Admiralty shall not be just the able-bodied ones of the family, but the family as a whole. That was, I understand, the case with those taken the other day. With regard to the question as to the Bahamas, there are one or two points on which I should like to say a few words. My hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Little) spoke of the power which is given into the hands of Magistrates and of Judges in small Colonies of inflicting punishment for contempt of Court, and I am bound to say, from my short experience at the Colonial Office—quite apart from this particular case—it does seem to me there is often a monstrous abuse of this power on the part of the Judicial Authorities in our Colonies. If we can see our way to curtail that power—and we have already done something in that direction—I am sure it will meet with the approval of those who are interested in these matters. I quite agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham when he said that it is a great mistake in this case—as in others—that these Judges—and they are gentlemen, after all, of no great authority or position—should be endowed with the title of Chief Justice. In this particular case, as well as in others, the Chief Justice is a mere name. He has really no Judge under him, and he is the supreme and sole Judge of that particular Colony. I think that in this, and in other cases, it has tended to give an undue idea of their powers and authority, and tends, to that extent, to do some harm. I do not know that I can agree with my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Little), who, I understand, wants a sort of Inspector of Judges to go round the different islands examining judicial grievances. I think that would lead to great difficulty, and would result in making matters worse than they are at the present moment. I am bound to say in regard not only to the case before us, but other cases, that I do think the Secretary of State ought to have much fuller power than he at present possesses of removing Judges on his own initiative if he thinks they have done anything wrong. It is quite right that in England the greatest possible sanctity and power should reside in the person of the Judge; but when it comes to the small Colonies and the class of men sent out there, I think there should be a much more expeditious way of getting rid of bad subjects than there is at the present moment. With reference to the particular case to which our attention has been called this afternoon, I cannot follow my right hon. Friend in regard to the position of Mr. Yelverton. He will easily understand that, his case being before the Privy Council at the present moment, it would not be right or expedient on my part to enter into the merits or demerits of Mr. Yelverton as a man or Chief Justice. In regard to one question he has raised in reference to his salary, I can only say I feel as much as he does, or as anyone interested in the Colonies can do, the very unfortunate position in which the Colony has been placed by the delay that has taken place in deciding this particular case of Mr. Yelverton. But I think he did give credit to the Colonial Office for having endeavoured to expedite matters. We were, however, confronted with difficulties; it was with the utmost possible difficulty we could make any progress; every step we have taken had to be taken under the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, and such delay as may have occurred has really been due to exceptional or necessary courses, and certainly in no sense has it been according to our desire or intention. I should like to see the question settled as soon as possible; but until it is settled I do not see how it can be taken otherwise than that the Colony should pay the salary. There is no fund from which it can be paid; but I hope the delay will not be long, and that the Privy Council will soon have come to a conclusion. As regards the speech of the hon. Member below the Gangway, he brought forward some cases of general administration. I am glad to be able to avail of this opportunity of paying tribute to the great ability which Sir Ambrose Shea has shown in the discharge of his duties as Governor of the Bahamas. I quite understand that the hon. and gallant Member (Admiral Field) has not fathered the charges which have been made, but it is greatly to be regretted that the charges have been made.

ADMIRAL FIELD said, he was most careful to guard against the possibility of fathering the charges. He only sought for information and inquiry.

MR. S. BUXTON: Yes; I understood that, as I have said; but it is a pity these charges should have been made without inquiry. The hon. and gallant Member asks that we should grant an inquiry. I am bound to say that the Colonial Office has given the matter attention for a considerable time past; and we ask the Committee to leave the responsibility in the hands of the Colonial Office. No case has been made out for so serious a measure as a Committee of Inquiry. I deplore, Sir, that in the past judicial posts in these small Colonies have been filled up by relatives of those in power in particular Colonies. It is impossible, however, to remedy that just now. What would be the advantage of a Committee of Inquiry in that case? For the purpose of dealing with these posts on account of relationship? We intend in future to put in outsiders rather than those in the island, and I do not think we can go further than that. There would, therefore, be no advantage to be gained by a Royal Commission or any Special Committee. Well, now, Sir, reference has been made to the late Postmaster General of the Bahamas.

That is a lamentable case, but the evidence against Mr. Smith for seduction and abduction has not been held to be conclusive, Mr. Smith was ultimately acquitted of the charges made against him; but, Sir, the circumstances of the case rendered it impossible that he could be reinstated. Then, Sir, there are the charges made in connection with relatives of the Attorney General of the island. It has been conclusively proved that there is no foundation for those charges. That is all I need say. I now ask the Committee to leave the responsibility of the government of this Colony in the hands of the Colonial Office. Any specific accusation will always receive careful attention, and, while I do not think there is any difficulty to call for this inquiry that has been asked for, I am sure the House will acknowledge that we are doing our best to prevent a recurrence of these scandals, and I hope that the matter will be allowed to remain in our hands.

ADMIRAL FIELD said, he must protest against the way in which the Under Secretary had censured him for not having inquired into the truth of the charges he had brought before the Committee. He had had no means of doing so. He had read the statements laid before him, and he had had an interview with the Chief Justice, and he only brought the matter before the House for the purpose of securing inquiry.

MR. S. BUXTON said, he did not censure the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He merely expressed a desire, if he recollected aright, that there should have been inquiry before such serious matters were brought before the Committee in this form. He thought it was somewhat hard that accusations of this kind should be brought before the House, and that not even a prima facie case should be made out in respect of them.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) said, a considerable time had elapsed without having this matter dealt with, and he would express a hope that the Colonial Office would not delay much longer.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, it was the bounden duty of the Chief Justice to have had those charges investigated at once by the Colonial Office. Had he taken the proper steps they would not have remained over so long.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, he had just a few words to say about the large contribution for Imperial purposes of the Straits Settlements. These Settlements had to pay the whole of the cost of their defences, and he thought that was unjust. The contribution had recently been raised from £50,000 to £100,000. It seemed to him strange that because Singapore occupied a most important position it ought to have this exceptional charge thrown upon it. The Straits Settlements had recently spent £80,000 upon fortifications. They practically paid one-fifth of their revenue for these purposes, and in order to do so had to draw upon their fund which was reserved for sudden contingencies, and had also to stop public works. This was not fair treatment in the case of a Crown Colony. Even in proportion the Straits Settlements were not fairly treated. He fancied the War Office was the offender in the matter, and he should like to hear from the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any remonstrance had been addressed to the War Office in respect of the grievous burdens which had been imposed upon these Crown Colonies? They should be able to find a fair solution. The position as it stood was not fair, and he hoped they would have information on the subject.

*SIR C. W. DILKE said, he wished to say in a few words that, in his opinion, no case had been made out for exempting this wealthy Colony from paying for its own expenses.

SIR J. GORST replied, that the complaint of the hon. Member for Preston was that Singapore had not only to pay the cost of defending Singapore, but also to contribute a large portion of her Revenue to defending the British Empire.

MR. S. BUXTON said, that the delay in the case of the appeal of the Chief Justice of the Bahamas being heard before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was due to the length of the list of causes in that Court. The question as to the amount of the contribution of the Straits Settlements was under consideration. The contribution had been raised to £100,000, but it was only to run for three years. The Colonial Office was very anxious to deal liberally with the Colonies. However, all questions of this kind had to be considered by the Colonial Office in consultation with the War Office, and the Treasury and the Colonial Office had to abide by the decision come to by these Departments.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies had not told the Committee what was the cost of the military charges against Singapore. It should be remembered that the troops were kept at Singapore not only to keep the native population in order, but to preserve a great Imperial strategical position. Nobody would deny that Singapore ought to pay her own military charges; but what the colonists complained of was that they should be made to pay also the cost of maintaining this strategical position, which was, of course, a purely Imperial matter. The real point was to ascertain what the amount of military charges at Singapore might be, including the coal-ing station, which must be Imperial. If the House knew this amount, then it could judge whether the sum of £100,000 imposed on Singapore was fair or not. This question was an extraordinary instance of the vicissitudes not only of human affairs, but of human sentiment. Singapore was once included in the Indian Empire, and it then had to pay no Imperial charges whatever. But the British merchants and traders residing there thought they ought to have the status of a Crown Colony. Their wishes were acceded to, and as a consequence they had to pay Crown Colony charges. They had now begun to lament the step they had taken, and with them it was a case of "out of the frying-pan into the fire," and they realised the proverb of King Stork and King Log. But that was no reason why they should not be protected and relieved of burdens which they were not justly called upon to bear.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): I find myself entirely unable to agree with the views expressed on this matter on this side of the House. I have had occasion to go carefully into this matter, and I would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies not to listen too favourably to these views.

Vote agreed to.

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that before the next Vote—the Vote for the Privy Council—was put, he wished to explain that it was the intention of the Government to move to reduce the Vote by £1,000 in respect of the salary of the Lord President of the Council. The full amount of the salary had been put down on the Votes, because it was impossible to say at the time they were prepared how long the present arrangement would last, or how long the present Government would remain in Office. But, as six months had now elapsed, the Government were able to reduce the Item for the salary of the Lord President of the Council by half.

MR. HENEAGE asked whether, if the Secretary to the Treasury moved this reduction, he would be precluded from moving the Amendment of which he had given notice—namely, the rejection of the entire salary of the Lord President of the Council?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman will be in Order.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, his object was to abolish altogether the salary of the Lord President of the Council. At the time the Minister for Agriculture had been constituted, he objected altogether to any fresh taxes being put on the Votes on account of the new Offices, because he held that there were some sinecures that might be abolished, and the money paid in salaries for these sinecures devoted to the Agricultural Department. He held the opinion that the Office of the Lord President of the Council had become a sinecure, just like the Office of Lord Privy Seal. It was stated by the Secretary to the Treasury that although £2,000 was asked as salary for the Office, the money was not drawn by Lord Kimberley, and would not be drawn by him so long as he also held the Office of Secretary for India. If Lord Kimberley could perform the duties of the Secretary of State for India and President of the Council, anybody else could perform the duties of the two Offices also; and if Lord Kimberley did not want to draw the salary, nobody else would require to draw the salary. He therefore objected to the salary altogether. He held that the Lord President of the Council was not required at all. He thought the Office should be abolished, and the duties attached to it transferred to some other Office. The Lord President of the Council a few years back was not only an officer of a very high rank, but he had important duties to perform. He was responsible for everything connected with agriculture and education. Now he was responsible for neither, for there were two separate Offices and Ministers for Agriculture and Education. In fact, now the only duty attached to the Office of Lord President of the Council was a ceremonial duty. It might be said that the Office was a very ancient Office, and that on that account it ought to be continued. The same thing was said when he proposed the abolition of the salary of the Lord Privy Seal; but after a time that salary was abolished, and the Office of Lord Privy Seal was now held by the Prime Minister in addition to other Offices. The outcry had also been raised against the abolition of the Office of Judge Advocate General. It was said that it was a high and ancient Office, and that they could not possibly get on without it. But the Office was abolished, and they had got on without a Judge Advocate General for years—or, at least, there was no one in Parliament held the Office. He did not want to take away all the salary of the Lord President of the Council. He would like to see a rearrangement of the salaries attached to the various Offices of the Government in accordance with the duties discharged by each Office. He thought it was monstrous and ridiculous that Ministers like the President of the Board of Trade and President of the Local Government Board should have only the same salary as the Chief Commissioner of Works, the Postmaster General, the Secretary to the Admiralty, and the Secretary to the Treasury. He begged, in conclusion, to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000 in respect of the salary of the Lord President of the Council.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £1,000" (Salary of the Lord President of the Council).—(Mr. Heneage.)

SIR W. HARCOURT: I very much sympathise with my right hon. Friend as to the abolition of sinecures. The Office of Lord Privy Seal is a sinecure, but the Office of Lord President of the Council is not. Orders in Council are extremely numerous, and require a responsible Minister to answer for them. The fact of one Minister discharging two Offices and only drawing the salary of one, as in Lord Kimberley's case, is not a sufficient ground for abolishing this ancient Office. If the argument of my right hon. Friend were to hold good, it would follow that the Office of First Lord of the Treasury ought to be abolished, because it has sometimes been held by a Minister who at the same time was Chancellor of the Exchequer. Under these circumstances, the arrangement which has just been indicated by the Secretary to the Treasury is solely of a temporary character.

*SIR C. W. DILKE said, he would like to see the Office of the Lord President abolished and its duties distributed among various Departments. Each Head of a Department should, moreover, be answerable for all Orders in Council which were issued in relation to his special Department.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, his sympathies were divided between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Member for Great Grimsby. On the one hand, he could not help recollecting that the Lord President of the Council held an Office that was of the highest antiquity and of great importance. There was a time when no act was done by the Crown except with the consent of the Privy Council. At that time the Lord President of the Council was a person of great importance, but at present the Lord President of the Council was but a mere shadow of his former glory. Under these circumstances, it seemed to him that the time had arrived to put an end to the Office. The Lord President of the Council had nothing to do, and in doing that he was assisted by a large number of other persons. Restricting his observations to the Lord President, he was unable to see what duties he could possibly perform. He could see no reason for the President, or for such Office, or for the messengers; and unless a better case were made out for this shadow of a name than had been made up to the present moment, he thought the Committee would be inclined to carry out the policy the Government were pledged to by reducing the salary as proposed by the right hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage).

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that even if they took away the salary, they could not by that means abolish the Office of Lord President. They ought to look at the question in a broad spirit. The present Government had in its ranks the noble Lord who held the Office of Secretary of State for India, who had also undertaken the duties of Lord President of the Council, and who, therefore, did not require any salary in respect of the latter Office. But only six months of the present year had gone past, and supposing they reduced the salary as proposed, and then, before the other six months were over, another Government was to come into Office, or the present Government made a re-arrangement, it would create great difficulty in dealing with this question upon its own merits. To his mind, the chief objection to the proposal of his right hon. Friend was that it tied the hands of the present Government in case of a re-arrangement of Offices, and it also tied the hands of any other Government that might come into Office and might wish to have the Offices arranged in a different way. He thought there were strong reasons why the salary should not be taken away; and if the arrangement continued to the end of the next six months, of course the remainder of the salary would fall into the Exchequer. He did not say whether there should not be a general re-arrangement of Ministerial salaries. That was a large matter for the consideration of the Cabinet and, perhaps, for an inquiry by a Committee of that House; but he ventured to say they could not deal with it on a Vote for the salary attaching to the Office.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) ventured to think that while economy was perfectly right in practice—and many small economies would, in the aggregate, provide funds for some very useful purpose—still that economy might be carried too far. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told the Committee that there were many and important, if not laborious, functions attached to the Office of Lord President of the Council. This Minister had frequently to attend Her Majesty on business which could not be performed without the functions of the Sovereign. He had to explain to Her Majesty very many important matters of State, and, moreover, there had been many Lord Presidents who had taken a very considerable share of the work of their own Department and done good and useful work in the administration of education. He would put it to the Committee whether it was not desirable there should be an Office in which a statesman of long experience and high standing should be placed without his being charged with very onerous functions? He was quite sure the Office of Lord President had generally been filled by a statesman whose counsels could not well be dispensed with in the Government, and who, perhaps, would no longer have undertaken an Office which was charged with heavy Departmental duties such as belonged to the Post Office. The noble Lord who at present acted as Lord President of the Council had such great experience that no doubt he might be able to conduct the duties of both Departments without being too great a tax upon him. But it might not always be convenient to place in the Office of Secretary of State for India a Minister who could perform the Offices of both Departments; and it might be readily conceived that there might be times when the duties of the Secretary of State for India would be so absorbing that it would be impossible to perform the functions of President of the Council in addition. For his part, he recognised the appropriateness of the views expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he thought it would be a great mistake to abolish the salary of the Office.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he had been asked what was the business of the President of the Council. The President of the Council was still the head of the Education Department, and represented it in the House of Lords. He was supreme in the Department if he thought it right to interfere. To practically revolutionise the organisation of the head of the Department was a matter that ought to be done with full consideration. It was an extremely important question. They could not, after a five minutes' conversation, knock off the head of the Department.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) said, it was quite clear, from what had been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the post of Lord President of the Council was not a sinecure. He desired to call the attention of the Committee to quite a novel point, which he thought worthy the consideration of Committee of Supply. They had here a nobleman performing the functions of two important State officers—the Secretary of State for India and the Lord President of the Council. The salary of the Secretary of State for India was paid by the Indian taxpayer; the salary of the Lord President of the Council was paid by the British taxpayer. As the duties of the two Offices were discharged by the same individual, there was obviously an opening for economy. The whole of the economy was for the benefit of the English taxpayer, and no corresponding benefit whatever was to be derived from it by the Indian taxpayer.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, if he rightly understood the matter, the Government were not going to pay any of this salary during the current year; and if they could get an assurance from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that during the Recess, or at any other reasonable time, the Government would re-consider the whole question, they ought to be satisfied for the present. It appeared to him that if a Minister who had to lead the House of Lords and take charge of the whole affairs of India, with its 280 millions of people, was also able to undertake the duties of Lord President of the Council, there could not be much to do in the latter capacity. He wanted to see this Office done away with, and the Minister of Education, or whatever Minister did the work, should get the salary, if it was necessary to pay any salary. The Lord President of the Council was one of the Offices created years ago for the purpose of giving the money of the taxpayer to some nobleman or other person belonging to the West End of London. Such Offices should be abolished, and the salaries given to those Ministers who had to do the work, and who were responsible to Parliament. He gathered that, although the Government were not going to pay this money, they were going to keep it on the Vote. This was a dangerous thing to do, because if the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Exchequer were over-influenced by somebody who wanted a good salary and nothing to do, he might be led astray. Again, if the Department had got the money to spare on one item, they might spend it on another about which Parliament would then know nothing, because they would not be asked to vote it, which was a very objectionable practice.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, that as a reason for this Vote they had been told that the Lord President of the Council was really the head of the Education Department; but it would be interesting to know to what extent the Lord President of the Council had really, in later years, been accustomed to take upon himself any responsibility for the actual work of the Education Department, or had any active work in shaping its policy. All the real work was done by the Vice President.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, there was no doubt that the Lord President exercised a most active influence, and really he might say he was almost the principal factor in the Education Department. The Education Department was a Committee of which the Lord President was the head.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS asked, under the present Government, what part did the Lord President actually take in relation to the work of the Education Department? If he took little or no part in the work of the Education Department, it was evident that his services were not necessary. What would be the difficulty in making the Vice President President and giving him the full responsibility for the work of the Department. The proposal of the Government was that the Committee, by its decision to-day, should leave attached to this Office a salary of at any rate £1,000 a year; but unless they could show more substantial reasons for this course, and could show that work was really performed in connection with the Office, the Committee would act wisely in declining to grant further salary to the Lord President.

MR. BARTLEY, who spoke from many years' service in the Department, said, it seemed to him that it would be altogether a mistake to leave the position of this matter as it was. The Lord President of the Council was nominally the head of the Department; but, as a rule, he did not take an active part in its administration, the educational work of the country being left to the Vice President under him, particularly if the Vice President happened to be a strong man. But the mischief came in here—the Lord President would want to interfere very often without knowing all the circumstances, and he very often did so interfere. The Vice President was the real head of the Education Department, to which his whole work was devoted; but instead of being, as he ought to be, the absolute head, he was only the second head, and the Lord President could now come down and interfere with the educational work as to the circumstances of which he might know nothing. This anomaly would have to be done away with, and the Vice President, who did the work, would have to be the head of the Education Department instead of having this sham head.

MR. HENEAGE said, he never intended to abolish the Office of Lord President, because it was absolutely necessary that there should be that Office, as its occupants had certain statutory duties to perform; but what he did contend was that these duties were so few and occupied so little time that the Office could very well be combined with another Office; and, therefore, there was no necessity for giving two salaries to two men to do the work. The Secretary to the Treasury had told them that the Government wanted this £1,000 in case the present holder of the Office declined any longer to keep it, and they had to appoint someone else. If this contingency should occur, the Government had a Minister at the present moment with absolutely nothing to do—namely, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who could hold the Office until the end of the year, so that the Government would not require the money. His idea had always been that the men who did the work should have the credit and also the power. If the Government did not want the money, why could they not accept his Motion? If they would not, then half a loaf was better than no bread; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would undertake to say the money should not be used, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

*MR. NAOROJI (Finsbury, Central) pointed out that the Secretary of State for India performed certain other duties for which rich England saved £2,000, and made poor India pay him £5,000. What the Government ought to have done would have been to have given a corresponding relief to the people of India for utilising the Secretary of State for India, whose services belonged entirely to India. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take care that such an injustice should not be done.

MR. A. C. MORTON asked for some pledge that the Government would consider this question.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he regarded the present arrangement as altogether temporary; but he could not give a pledge that this money should not be used. It was not intended to be used; but, supposing there was such a catastrophe as a change of Government, he could not give any undertaking which would bind the succeeding Government. All he could say was that there were many circumstances connected with this Office which required consideration.

MR. HENEAGE said, he would not put the House to the trouble of a Division; but next Session he hoped to bring forward the question, with the view to having the whole of these subjects considered by a Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES objected to the item of £1,623 for quarantine expenses, which he characterised as one of the most indefensible abuses which existed in this country. On the Motherbank in the Solent there were four old battleships, with a superintendent, a mate, and a small staff of seamen who cost £1,153. There was never anybody in these ships but six or seven ancient moss-grown mariners who had nothing to do except keep the ships clean. Nobody used them, and people wondered why on earth they were there! They were there because 1,000 years or so ago some foolish person conceived the idea of quarantine. In these days such a relic of barbarism should not be kept up. Quarantine was not only useless, but it was positively mischievous and dangerous. It was useless because, if they were going to have yellow fever and the plague or other evil things imported into this country, they would not come by the Motherbank, but by the Dover and Calais boats which ran four, five, or six times a day, and carried thousands of passengers. Therefore, if quarantine was a proper method, it would be quite useless to keep up this establishment at Motherbank. Quarantine was only kept up by foreign nations in order to furnish them with a cheap method of taxing foreigners by requiring fees to be paid to their Consuls by ships for visé-ing Bills of Health. He did not think any gentleman would get up and defend the system of quarantine at all, or this form of it represented at Motherbank. If there was to be any form of quarantine at all it was not the Privy Council that should undertake it, but the Local Government Board. At the present time the Local Government Board was stirring in the matter, for they were going down to different ports and ordering certain things to be done in order to carry out the system of quarantine, the expenses for which had to be borne by the Local Authorities. These particular four ships with the superintendent and moss-grown mariners, together with expenses for the hire of boats, &c., cost £1,623. He believed nobody could defend such an outlay, or show that it had ever been of the slightest use. He believed it was a mere survival from the time of George IV., which had been allowed to go on until now, when he hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would consent to the reduction of the Vote by this sum. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,623 for the quarantine expenses.

Mr. Gibson Bowles

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That £5,910 be granted for the said Services."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that the quarantine establishment to which the hon. Member had referred was set up under an Act of Parliament passed a considerable time ago. He admitted that public opinion had changed very much of late years with respect to quarantine, but this system at Motherbank only applied to two very serious diseases—namely, to yellow fever and the plague, and affected no vessels except those coming from the West Indies and Central and South America. There were Conventions with Foreign Powers in respect of this station, and it would be necessary to consult them before they could abolish it, and, moreover, legislation would be necessary. His hon. Friend said these four vessels were never used. He was sorry to say that was not the case. Five ships had been in quarantine for yellow fever from the year 1889 to 1892—which was coming very near to the present time. One ship was in quarantine in May, 1889; two in April, 1891; one in January, 1892, and one in February, 1892. Then, again, with respect to the cost of maintaining these vessels, he was informed that the Customs had the service of the men when they were not engaged in quarantine duties, so that they were in continuous occupation. That being so, it was not such an extravagant and wasteful matter as the hon. Gentleman seemed to think. Again, there was a provision in this Vote for the inspection at Liverpool, Southampton, and certain other ports, under stated conditions, of vessels coming from the countries he had named by a medical officer, which acted as a prevention against the admission of the two diseases. The service was kept up by Statute, and it would be impossible to alter it without legislation. If the hon. Gentleman wished to raise the question he would suggest he should do so next Session by bringing forward a Motion for a Committee of Inquiry.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES was quite disposed to adopt the course suggested. The right hon. Gentleman spoke as if it was compulsory by the Act of George IV. to keep these four ships going, but as he read the Act there was nothing whatever in it to prevent this reduction being made. Moreover, such a system could not be effectual as a prevention of disease, as the enormous passenger traffic was left untouched by these quarantine arrangements. He would, however, acting on the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*CAPTAIN NAYLOR-LEYLAND (Colchester) said, he had one or two matters to bring before the Committee in relation to this Vote. He would like to address, first of all, some observations with regard to the new Labour Department of the Board of Trade. This Department ought to be of the greatest use to the workmen of the country. He appreciated what had been done. But there had been sins of commission and omission. They had heard at the last Election of the appointment of a Minister for Labour—a Minister for dealing with labour questions alone? That would be the natural outcome of the creation of a Labour Department. What had been done in this direction? Nothing. All that the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Mundella) had done was to change the name of the Commercial Department into that of the Department of Labour. After doing that the right hon. Gentleman came forward and said—"See what a good boy am I!" They ought to have a responsible Minister for Labour, but the right hon. Gentleman had practically done next to nothing. There was only one Department of State which was bound to look after labour as matters now stood, and, for his own part, he was grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what had been done. There were four things which the Department did, and four things only, and it seemed to him that if nothing else was to be expected they had better not have such a Department. The first point was the issue of

The Labour Gazette, a monthly publication which no doubt contained a great deal of information, and which would be useful if circulated amongst trade centres. The other three points—and this was an extraordinary thing—were all matters of inquiry. It had been said that this was essentially "a Government of inquiry," and that was true. The Government forgot that the first duty of Parliament was to legislate, and whenever they were asked to do anything they always declined to legislate, and said—"We are going to inquire." The second point in the operations of the Department was to undertake special inquiries into important subjects bearing upon labour. It was not at all necessary to have a Department of the State to do that, for if there were subjects connected with labour that required inquiring into, a Select Committee, a Departmental Committee, or a Special Commission would be sufficient for the purpose. The third duty of the Department was to carry out such inquiries as might be ordered by Parliament from time to time, and the fourth duty was to issue a Report of its proceedings. If the President of the Board of Trade were to get up and tell the Committee that these four points covered all that the Department could do in the interest of the working classes, as a Member of the Opposition he was glad to hear it, but from the point of view of the labouring classes it was a circumstance to be regretted. If they wished to make this Department a reality and not a sham, they should take away whatever work connected with labour other Departments had to do, and place all the work under the jurisdiction of a responsible Minister. They should, for instance, take the factory legislation out of the hands of the Home Secretary, they should take the Board of Hygiene from the Local Government Board and the Labour Correspondence from the Board of Trade, and they should relieve the Colonial Office and the Foreign Office of all their labour business, and when they had done that they might be said to have a nucleus of the proper Labour Department. They would then have a Department which would have the confidence of the working class of the country, and that was one of the first things which a Minister for Labour ought to possess. He contended, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite was guilty of the sin of omission in not having set up a proper Department of Labour. All the right hon. Gentleman had done had been to take the Commercial and Statistical Department as it was and add to it four Inspectors. His next point against the right hon. Gentleman was his sin of commission. He had 25 Labour Correspondents, as to whose appointment he was to be congratulated, but he could not be congratulated on the method he had adopted of appointing these gentlemen. They were in every sense of the word Government officials, and they received Government pay of from £15 to £20 a year. The very first thing that ought to be demanded of them was that they should occupy the position of Government officials, and be non-political in every sense of the word. But what was the fact? Why, that 17 of them were without doubt Gladstonian Liberals. He could find out nothing about the other eight, but it was quite likely that they were of the same political complexion. In one case in his own district a man named Joseph Robinson took a van through the Harwich Division. He held meetings in every village, and said to the villagers—"You are going to have an election very soon. If you vote for the Gladstonian candidate you will get £1 a week wages, and a 3d. loaf for 1d. The rich will become poor, and the poor rich." Shortly after that—three days as a rule—the Radical candidate for the Division went into the village, and said—"Mr. Joseph Robinson was here a day or two ago, and told you about the Radical candidate, who was going to give you £1 a week in wages. I am the gentleman of whom he spoke." No doubt this was fair political warfare, but what he objected to was that after the General Election—directly the President of the Board of Trade came into Office—the first man he appointed as Local Labour Correspondent was this man Joseph Robinson. This was showing a regard for one's political friends, and an appreciation of their merits which was startling. But Mr. Joseph Robinson's case was only one out of 17. The abuse of which he complained had been 17 times repeated; and though he believed that Mr. Robinson had resigned, that did not get them away from the fact of his appointment. Perhaps the President of the Board of Trade would be able to say, in the first place, why Mr. Robinson had been appointed, and, in the second place, why he had resigned. He did not wish to be hard on the President of the Board of Trade, for he believed that "evil communications corrupt good manners." He was very much afraid that the right hon. Gentleman had been associating lately with the Chancellor of the Duchy. If that was so, he would tell the right hon. Gentleman that he had a most dangerous associate, because, if there ever were flagrant cases of the appointment of political allies to Government offices, they had been perpetrated recently by the Chancellor of the Duchy. He begged to move that Item A be reduced by a sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £1,000."—(Captain Naylor-Leyland.)

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, he agreed with the hon. and gallant Member who had last spoken with regard to the appointment of Labour Correspondents. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for the appointments whoever actually made them; and they reflected anything but credit on the Department. In Birmingham a gentleman of great ability had been appointed, but a gentleman distinguished by extreme partisanship, who had brought serious accusations against the Small Arms Factory, every one of which had been disproved. This gentleman's reports would be read in connection with the individuality of the writer. This gentleman's great merit no doubt was that he had the honour of doing his best to defeat him (Mr. Jesse Collings) at the General Election. A hundred men could have been selected in Birmingham, each perfectly qualified to furnish the necessary information, but the appointment had been made as a reward for services rendered to the Gladstonian Party. Then as to The Labour Gazette. People who understood these subjects must laugh when reading the monthly reports of some of the Labour Correspondents. He did not understand the majority of the Reports, but this was the sort of thing that was reported about Birmingham—

"Engineers and machinists are slack; there is an improved demand for bedsteads; galvanised iron makers are receiving good orders."

These contributions to The Labour Gazette were little jerky paragraphs, which did not contain as much information as the daily papers of Birmingham, the latter obtaining their facts from merchants, manufacturers, and others—sources of information to which the Labour Correspondents, as a rule, were not admitted. To his mind the Department had been lowered through the way it had lent itself to political partisanship.

MR. AUSTIN: What did your Party do?

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, it was not a question of what their Party did. If the hon. Member referred to the Unionists he would challenge him to bring any charge against them.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question before the Committee has reference to a reduction of Item A—the salary of the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The reduction touching the administration of the Department.

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; but only so far as the present President of the Board of Trade is concerned.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for all appointments made, and every branch of the Administration came under review. He now wished to raise a question of great importance to the shopkeepers of the United Kingdom; he referred to the administration of the Weights and Measures Act of 1889. This might appear, at first sight, to be a matter which did not affect the general public, but really great inconvenience was occasioned by this administration, and great annoyance was given to shopkeepers and manufacturers. No doubt the President of the Board of Trade and the Board of Trade generally were anxious to do the best they could for the administration of the Act, but the complaint was that they took too much of an official view of the grievances complained of. This was not a question of securing just weights and scales and measures, for they were all agreed as to the necessity of that. Parliament had interested itself in the matter from the earliest times, and there were 40 or 50 measures on the Statute Book dealing with it. The Act of 1889 said that—

"Weighing instruments shall be stamped and certified by an Inspector under this Act."

Now, the grievance was that when a weighing instrument was stamped—at the place at which it was made or anywhere else—if it was taken into another locality that stamp was no longer of any use. The local Inspector insisted that he should put a stamp on, and, therefore, the weighing instrument was stamped for the second time, whether or not the balance were just. He had read the Act of 1889 carefully, and he did not think it required this second stamping. The difficulty arose, he thought, from the model regulations which the Board of Trade had issued, and that, he believed, was the opinion of the hon. Member for North Hackney, who had spoken some time ago on this subject, and who had given it most careful attention. The Act of 1878, which had not been repealed, was, he believed, referred to in the Act of 1889 as the principal Act—

THE CHAIRMAN: The matter the right hon. Member is referring to comes under the Item I., K., or L., but the present reduction is moved on Item A.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, they had pursued this matter up to the point of the President of the Board of Trade saying "aye" or "no" to the remedy proposed. Therefore, they were concerned with a pure act of administration, for which the President of the Local Government Board was responsible. The Act of 1878 said that the stamping of any weight or measure by an Inspector would hold good in any part of the United Kingdom until such weight or measure was found to be unjust, and that the weight or measure should not be liable to be restamped. He was aware that that applied to weights and measures, but would the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade say whether the non-extension of that to scales and weighing instruments was not an oversight? Was it deliberately intended that scales and weighing instruments should be excluded? If so, that opened up another question. But seeing the frequent reference to the Act of 1878 as the principal Act, it seemed to him that the omission was accidental. Beams and scales were made in Birmingham, London, Bristol, Liverpool, but principally in Birmingham. In these cities the beams and scales were sent to the Inspectors—who were trained men having staffs under them—and were duly stamped and certified as correct. That might be on a Monday. They were sent on the Tuesday, say, into Dorsetshire. The moment they arrived at their destination, the Inspector there said—

“I do not care whether they are just or unjust—they bear the stamp of the Inspector of the place of manufacture, a properly-qualified man, and therefore, presumably, the instruments are just, but I must put my stamp on them as well, and failing that being done you, the owner, are liable to fine and punishment.”

He would mention the two cases which happened near Birmingham. When the notice was sent out requiring tradesmen to have their scales seen to under the Act, one tradesman sent all his scales to the Birmingham Inspector to have them verified and stamped. That was done at the cost of 60s. Another tradesman sent his scales to a maker to have them adjusted who in his turn sent them to the Inspector's office to have them duly stamped. These two sets were returned and within a week the Inspector of Balsall Heath, just outside Birmingham, sent to these tradesmen to tell them they were liable to punishment unless he put his stamp on the instruments. That was the first case. The second occurred at a place called Sturchley, about three miles from the centre of Birmingham. A chemist desiring to have his scales accurately adjusted sent them to a manufacturer to get them put right and stamped at the Birmingham office. When they were returned he was told by the Inspector at King's Norton that he must send his scales there to be stamped, as the Birmingham stamp was no good. It was obvious that these tradespeople were subjected to serious delay, expense, and annoyance by the arbitrary action to which they were subjected. He had to-day asked a question as to whether the weighing instruments used in the Government offices, in the dockyards, and the Post Offices were liable to be stamped by local Inspectors, and the reply was no, they had an Inspector of their own. How would that work? If the dockyard authorities purchased goods in Portsmouth or Plymouth they would be weighed in scales bearing two stamps, but they would be weighed again in the dockyards to see if they were right in scales which did not bear a second stamp, and which, therefore, by the ordinary standard which applied to tradespeople, were illegal. The Act of 1889 aimed at doing away with anomalies, and he believed that to a large extent it did remove them, but the fault was with the administration.

MR. MUNDELLA (interrupting) said, he had been most unwilling to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but the matter in question was one the Board of Trade had nothing to do with. It was under Statute. He should be most happy to consider what the right hon. Gentleman had to say, and he could assure him that he (Mr. Mundella) was the last person to put any obstacle in the way of trade. The Local Authorities made the bye-laws under which this re-stamping was required, and without altering the Statute it was impossible to change those bye-laws. The County Councils in the country districts were responsible for the bye-laws.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, this statement brought him to the point. The bye-laws were revised by the Board of Trade, and rightly so, because the nearer they approached to uniformity in this matter of weights and scales the better it was for the trading community.

MR. MUNDELLA : Hear, hear !

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he complained that the right hon. Gentleman took an official view of the matter, and the object of this discussion was to try and induce him to look at it from a trader's point of view. When the right hon. Gentleman was convinced, he was sure no one would be more anxious to get rid of the difficulties which existed, and which referred not only to Birmingham manufacturers, but to the various trades in the United Kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out on a previous occasion that scales and weighing machines were liable to injury in transit, and that, therefore, they should be examined and stamped in the district in which they were used as well as the district in which they were made. In reply to that it was only necessary to point out that the greatest care was taken in packing them, the work being entrusted to none but the most experienced and skilful packers. There was considerable liability to injury, however, in sending the machines in the carriers' carts from the tradesmen's premises to the places of business of the local Inspectors. Weigh-bridges and platforms it was, of course, necessary to adjust and stamp after they were fixed, for they were machines that had to be sent away from the manufacturers in parts, and that required to be built up afterwards. No doubt the local Inspector was the proper person to stamp machines of that kind. Some definition should be adopted to separate the two classes of scales. It was not for him (Mr. Jesse Collings) to suggest a definition. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had got over greater difficulties than that, and no doubt he would be able to provide a satisfactory definition if he took the matter in hand. But, certainly, these were matters which carried great annoyance to the traders throughout the country. The powers of the Inspectors varied, and the lives of the shopkeepers in many districts were made a burden to them, for they had to submit to the harassing regulations rather than incur that which would almost mean ruin to them—namely, a report that their scales were unjust. In a letter he had received on this subject from Birmingham the writer said—

“Mr. Mundella does not appear to understand our grievance. Our contention is that there should be one fixed standard in testing weighing instruments, and that an instrument stamped by an Inspector in one district should not be rejected in another on account of its not having the local stamp.”

He went on to say—

“It is an extortion and an injustice.”

The tradesmen of the country had other grievances. For instance, it was complained that the Inspector in Plymouth had refused to verify balances, saying, in the first place, that all scales should have the borough number on them; and, secondly, that the balances registered the weight in two places. Well, to his knowledge, for the past 40 years balances had always registered the weight in two places. Some of the Inspectors did not know their business. He was aware that they had to pass an examination—those employed after the passing of the Act—but they were not all acquainted with the properties of different kinds of weighing instruments. This question was thought of far more importance in Germany, France, and other Continental countries, where they had a Commission of scientific men to determine the qualities and properties of different weighing instruments as they were invented. But in this country it was all left to the Inspector. Take an instance. There was a scale used in nearly all Post Offices—a modern invention, which was extremely nice in registering called the “accelerative scale.” In some districts in Yorkshire and the North of England the Inspectors recommended that scale as being good; but there were other places in which the Inspectors warned the traders that if they used that sort of thing they would not stand it. His contention was that this matter should not be left to the Inspectors, or, at any rate, there should be some appeal to the Board of Trade. There was a scale borrowed from the French called the “vibrating scale,” which was still more nice and accurate; but this, like the others, was subject to the opinion of the Inspectors whether it was good or not. As to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that this was a question of Statute and not of administration, he would remind him that the Board of Trade had already, in answer to an appeal made to it, issued regulations putting an end to a grievance. The same thing should be done in regard to inspection. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that he had power over all the bye-laws and regulations that any Local Authority might choose to make. First of all, these regulations must be submitted to the Board of Trade to be amended or rescinded. If the Board of Trade would insist upon the rules all over the country being made uniform, the traders would know what they had to put up with. Most of the existing rules had been passed directly after the Act came into force, and when there had been little experience of its operation. No doubt the rules were as good as could be passed at the time. But since then there had been an enormous amount of experience of the working of the Act, and he thought it the duty of the President of the Board of Trade to frame the regulations in accordance with that experience. The big towns from which the scales were issued in the first place, all possessed capable Inspectors, and the weighing instruments were stamped by those officials. The Inspector in a small district should not be allowed, for the sake of the fee, to say—"I do not care whether your scale is just or unjust; and even though it has been verified by a capable Inspector, I will test it again, and put a second stamp on it, and if you do not submit I will summon you before the Borough Justices, and have you punished for using an unjust scale." The last time this subject was raised he was asked—"Do not you want scales to be examined by Local Authorities at all?" Yes; when a scale got old it should be examined locally, re-adjusted, and stamped. But this was not a matter of adjustment; it was one of pettifoggery and unnecessary interference with scales already adjusted and stamped.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): I can quite understand that the right hon. Gentleman, representing as he does a great centre of industry where these weighing machines are made, should have thought it his duty to bring the matter at some length before the Committee; but I would express the hope that the question may not be much further pursued, because it is one of a far wider character than is covered by the Vote now before the Committee, and there are many other points in the Vote to which hon. Members desire to call attention. What the right hon. Gentleman has really done in his speech this evening is to reiterate the principle which deputations from Birmingham brought before me when I was President of the Board of Trade, which may be a good principle in itself, but which is quite contrary to the Weights and Measures Act of 1878 and the amending Act of 1889. The principle which the trade of Birmingham desire now to establish is the principle of the central administration of the Weights and Measures Act as against local administration. [Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: Not at all.] The right hon. Gentleman desires there should be, as in Germany, a Commission which shall inspect these different weights and measures and weighing machines.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: When I referred to the Commission I referred only to the giving an opinion on any new invention, or new kind of scale which modern scientific and mechanical skill might have invented, and I argued that we should not leave it to these Inspectors to say—"This is a new thing; I do not want it." That is quite a different matter.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: I really know; I have had it all before me. They desire there should be a central and not a local administration of these Acts. [Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: Not at all.] At any rate, he wishes that the stamp of the Inspector at Birmingham, which is the centre of the trade, should run throughout England. He wishes that the Inspectors in other parts of England should perform their duties in the same way as the Inspectors of Birmingham, and that they should be as competent as the Inspectors of Birmingham. He complains they are not so. The whole of his speech, I will venture to say, pointed to the administration of these Acts under central control. That is contrary to the Acts themselves. It might be a very good change, and I am not arguing whether it is or not, because this is not the time to do so. When I brought in the Amendment Act of 1889 I deliberately determined to base that Act on the system which I found in existence, because I was quite sure that if I had attempted to take from the Local Authorities the powers they possessed under the original Act I should have had no chance of passing that amending Act. Take this point of stamping weighing machines. The right hon. Gentleman proposes practically to deprive the Local Authority, say of my County of Wiltshire, of the power to stamp weighing machines in their county, although under the Act they are responsible for the administration of the Act, and for seeing, through their Inspectors, that the weighing machines are correct. That is what is suggested, and that they should take in all cases the stamp of the Inspector at Birmingham, where the weights are made. That is depriving them of the authority they now possess. He wishes, as I have said, further control by a Central Authority over all these Local Authorities in the matter of their bye-laws—in the matter of their Inspectors and their qualifications. I do not desire to enter into this question of Central Authority, but I do hold very strongly that what the clients of the right hon. Gentleman really wish would not be attained; and even if it were possible to comply with their request as to stamping their machines, they would still press for a further approach towards central administration, and that could only be achieved by an entire alteration of the existing laws.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I may say I have been asked by my constituents to support my right hon. Friend in his application to the Board of Trade. I think my right hon. Friend who has just spoken has somewhat misapprehended the intention and object of the right hon. Member for Bordesley. Certainly we do not desire that this system should be centralised in its character. What we desire is that the practical working of the system should not be changed from what it has been for a very long course of years. Within very recent times—in fact, the period during which my right hon. Friend has been at the head of the Board of Trade, the working of the system—I am not saying the law—appears to have been changed.

MR. MUNDELLA: I can assure my right hon. Friend it has not been changed in the least. The regulations are just the same.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I did not say the regulations had been changed. Perhaps if the right hon. Gentleman listens to what I say he will understand me. I said the working of the system appears to have been changed. I am not now talking of the Board of Trade, or any interference by the Board of Trade. As a matter of fact, until very recently, scales which had been stamped in Birmingham were not required to be stamped a second time at Plymouth. But now, under the existing working of the system, Birmingham and Plymouth are just as far apart, just as far separated, as France and England, and the stamp which has been put upon the scales in Birmingham by a qualified official is treated as absolutely of no value whatever by another qualified official in Plymouth. That is calculated in a most serious way to interfere with trade. My right hon. Friend says—and I quite believe him—that it is not the object of the Board of Trade to interfere with commerce. Of course it is not. It is their business to facilitate commerce, and whenever any difficulty of this kind arises to find some practical way to overcome it. I do not know whether it is due to a change of opinion among the Local Authorities, or what, but undoubtedly there has been a change in the practice. There is no pretence, as my right hon. Friend opposite appears to imagine, on the part of Birmingham to say that the Local Authority at Plymouth is not to be allowed to examine a scale, and is to take for granted the correctness of a scale because it has the Birmingham mark. They may test the scales as often as they like, and if found to be incorrect they may see that an alteration is made. What we complain of is, that without going into the question whether the scale is correct or not, they insist upon putting a second mark upon it and obtaining a second fee. And if you can suppose the same set of scales, as might happen to be the case, in the course of one month went from the North of England to the South they might pass through the jurisdiction of five different Local Authorities and every Local Authority would affix a separate stamp and take a fee. That is perfectly ridiculous and absurd. There is no objection to any one Local Authority ascertaining that the stamp of a previous Local Authority has been correctly affixed, but then they ought not to demand when they find the scales correct either a fee or the right to stamp a second time. I hope I have made it clear what is the contention of the Birmingham trade, and I think it will be found to be the contention of every other locality in which this particular article is manufactured. The difficulty has only arisen of late. I am not complaining of the Board of Trade. It may have arisen from local circumstances, a sudden excess of zeal on the part of Local Authorities on finding out a field where they might gather fees. But whatever be the reason, it is the business of the Board of Trade to find a remedy. When I went to the Board of Trade the present Lord Farrer told me that, although the Board of Trade was not the first titular office, it was the proud boast that everything they did was done on commercial principles and the principles of common sense. I hope that has not changed. Here is a common-sense view of the situation. Under existing circumstances trade is being seriously hampered; it was not hampered before. I admit there has been no alteration of the law, and, so far as I know, no alteration of the regulations of the Board of Trade. But if under the law an interference with trade has arisen, owing to new circumstances which did not arise before, it is the business of the Board of Trade to remove it. We do not want to centralise the matter or interfere in any way with the right of the Local Authority to deal with matters within their own province; but it is perfectly ridiculous to treat every Local Authority as if it were an absolutely separate Kingdom in itself, and as though a Local Authority in one place was competent to take absolutely no notice of what was done by a Local Authority in another place, especially when each of these Local Authorities is working under statutory regulations, which insure that the work shall be done by qualified officials. I hope my right hon. Friend will not give anything like an official answer to this, but will promise to look into the matter with a view to finding some remedy for what really is a considerable grievance.

MR. MUNDELLA: I think I had better dispose of this matter at once, as there are other subjects which Members of the Committee are anxious to reach. I can only confirm what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir M. Hicks-Beach). When the Act of 1889 was passed it gave powers to the Local Authorities to make bye-laws regulating both the use of scales and weights and measures. Weights and measures need not be re-stamped, but scales were specially omitted. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Jesse Collings) says that if I was familiar with what was done at Birmingham I should know that a scale always arrived in an accurate condition at its destination. I would remind him of a letter of complaint which he sent to me not long ago in which these words occur—

“Scales are made to such a nicety that they very easily get out of order.”

County Councils have almost invariably, under the Act passed by my right hon. Friend opposite, adopted this bye-law, which I am advised they have a statutory right to pass—

“In any district where there is a properly certified Inspector, and where the offices are open to the public every week-day, the Local Authority may require that any weighing instrument lawful to be used for trade in their district shall be treated and stamped by their Inspector, although such weighing instrument may have been stamped in the district of another Local Authority.”

When the right hon. Gentleman a few weeks ago brought this matter under my notice I referred to what was done by the Local Authorities. And do let me point out to the right hon. Gentleman that they have a right to protect the consumer, and a very important duty is incumbent upon them in that respect. I took up the last Report of the London County Council with respect to this question of the Weights and Measures Act. They say—

“The Acts require that all weights, measures, and weighing instruments shall, before being used in trade, be verified and stamped by an Inspector of Weights and Measures, and during the year the numbers of these appliances dealt with by the Council's staff were as follow:—
Number of weights verified and stamped, 228,628; number of measures verified and stamped, 456,280; number of weighing instruments verified and stamped, 22,684; number of weights rejected as unfit for stamping, 28,614; number of measures rejected as unfit for stamping, 171,913; number of weighing instruments rejected as unfit for stamping, 5,094.”

Twenty per cent. of the number, therefore, were rejected. Surely it is of the utmost importance to London that the County Council under this Act shall carry out that careful inspection which they have done hitherto, and which is so essential in the interests of the consumer. Let me point out to the right hon. Gentleman that even these figures I have quoted are much below the figures for the year before. Instead of being 22,000, as this year, the number last year was 53,577. The large number in the earlier year, as stated in the County Council's Report, was due to

th fact that the requirement for verifying and stamping weighing instruments had only recently come into force ; and, as those appliances already in use are gradually verified and stamped, a reduction in the number must take place, as new scales only will require to be stamped. No doubt there has been some complaint, and I should be only too happy, if I could see my way without injuring the consumer, and without depriving the County Council of the duty they owe to their own constituents, to prevent, or relieve from, this necessity of re-stamping. I see some difficulties in the way, and I do not want to make promises I cannot fulfil. Suppose, for instance, that the Inspector examines a number of scales, say in an ordinary shop, and finds some accurate and some inaccurate, and gets the whole properly re-adjusted. What is the best way of testifying that they are re-adjusted so that when another Inspector comes round he may know they are in good condition? Why, that on such a date they were duly re-stamped by the Inspector, and surely there should be some mark upon them to show that they were accurate and in good condition. That is really what is practically being done. I am not in a position to break the law, however harsh it may be with respect to some of the manufacturers, but I am most anxious to relieve manufacturers of any difficulty in respect of the transmission of weighing instruments and scales, and, where accurate, to avoid the necessity and cost of having them re-stamped. I will submit the Act as it now stands to the Law Officers of the Crown, and ascertain whether the Local Authorities have the right to re-stamp or not. If they have, it will be my duty to inquire whether the re-stamping is considered by the Local Authority a matter of such importance that the Act must be adhered to or not. I respectfully say that, after all, this is not a matter of administration, but a matter of the construction of an Act of Parliament, and I do not think I can at once, on the demand of the right hon. Gentleman, reverse the practice of my predecessor in the working of the Act for the last four years. I can only promise my right hon. Friend to deal with the case in a reasonable time, and after a proper investigation the whole matter shall receive attention.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked where in the Act two stamps were required?

MR. MUNDELLA : Two stamps are not required, but the Act gives power to make bye-laws requiring re-stamping.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS said, the President of the Board of Trade did not quite realise what the right hon. Member for the Bordesley Division asked for. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the testing which took place, say by the London County Council, with a view to ascertain whether a consignment of scales from Birmingham were accurate or not. But, supposing one of these scales was sent to Croydon, the person endeavouring to sell it without the stamp of the Croydon Authorities was apparently liable to a penalty. That appeared to him to be perfectly ridiculous, and it was doing the work twice over. The right hon. Gentleman said the law required this to be done, that the Local Authorities had power to insist on it. But the bye-laws and regulations under which the Local Authorities acted required the assent of the Board of Trade, and that being so, this was a matter of administration by the Board of Trade, because the Board of Trade ought to have the power to prevent obnoxious legislation, having no practical utility, being insisted on in their bye-laws. It was not sought to do anything which would diminish the protection the consumer received in relation to the accuracy of the scales, but what was contended was, that the necessity of insisting on these repeated tests was an unnecessary interference with the trade of the country, which the Board of Trade ought to stop.

MR. M. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.) wished to make a few observations in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Colchester (Captain Naylor-Leyland), and the Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. Jesse Collings), as to the appointment of local labour correspondents. These appointments had been persistently attacked during the Session, but he, as a representative of the working population, heartily endorsed the action taken by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who had earned the gratitude of the workers by appointing these correspondents to give an insight into the condition of the industrial population. He was inclined to think, if they went a little below the surface of this question, it would not be difficult to find the cause of the attacks on these appointments. He thought it was because there was not enough of the Birmingham mixture in them, rather than any desire to advocate the cause of the workers, which actuated the attacks of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on these appointments. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Jesse Collings) had declared there was a good deal of political bias in these appointments, but he thought, if they only looked at the miserably small salaries of £15 or £20 a year paid to these men, that the House had little right to raise the question of politics with regard to them. There were 25 correspondents in the United Kingdom, and the total income of the whole of them was only £500 a year. He thought the best answer to the attacks of gentlemen in the House of Commons was the fact that not a single complaint had been made by any single Trade Society in the United Kingdom against a single one of the correspondents appointed. They had met with the general approbation of the workers, and he would therefore deprecate altogether the attacks which had been made upon them. The Member for Bordesley Division talked as if these appointments almost threatened the Empire. If the correspondents were all sound Tories, he wondered would so much be heard about them. He did not think so, and he would only hope that the number would be extended, and that the salaries would also be taken into consideration by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade, since the appointment of the right hon. Gentleman, and indeed all Departments of the Government, had done all in their power to further the interests of the workers in the United Kingdom, and he saw no cause for the complaints made by hon. Gentlemen in that House.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that he had nothing whatever to do with the selection of the labour correspondents. A Committee of the Board of Trade, of which the Comptroller was Chairman, and of which Mr. Burnett was also a member, made that selection, and the names, irrespective of Party politics, were then submitted en bloc to him for his approval. He had never heard of Mr. Joseph Robinson until he heard of his resignation. He could not understand what ground of complaint could be made against the labour correspondent at Birmingham, for Mr. Burnett had himself gone down there and selected him. It was monstrous to say that these appointments were flagrant political appointments, and he was certain that if his predecessor came back to Office he would not interfere with one of them. As to the permanent officials, there had been three additional labour correspondents appointed. One was a very able lady, who had taken University honours; another was Mr. Drummond, a well-known working-class leader and a Conservative; and the third was a gentleman about whose politics he knew nothing whatever. It had been said that 17 out of the 25 labour correspondents were Gladstonians. That was very much the proportion of Gladstonians amongst working men generally; and he had no doubt that that proportion would go on increasing. But whatever the correspondents were, their appointments were due to no action on his part. He would challenge any Member to say that The Labour Gazette had shown any tinge of partiality in respect of political or labour questions. Under these circumstances, he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite had no cause of complaint.

ADMIRAL FIELD said, he thought the President of the Board of Trade had taken the criticisms about the payments of these labour correspondents somewhat too seriously. For his part, he would be the last to accuse the right hon. Gentleman of any Party feeling in the matter. He did not care twopence whether the labour correspondents were Radicals or Conservatives, so long as they were the best men for the posts, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman had used his patronage very well. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to turn his thoughts in another direction. The right hon. Gentleman was the father of the Mercantile Marine. The Mercantile Marine was not virtually under the guardianship of the right hon. Gentleman, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman and all concerned with the Board of Trade ought to give their consideration as to how far the Mercantile Marine could be made serviceable to the nation in the crisis of a great war. The right hon. Gentleman had some able advisers. Above all, he had a distinguished naval officer in his service, and he wanted the right hon. Gentleman to put that officer into the Intelligence Department of the Admiralty with the view of settling, as it was suggested by Lord Charles Beresford in a recent address, the question of trade routes, and forming a plan of action for the merchant ships in the event of war. He wanted the right hon. Gentleman to direct the naval officer to consider this question in concert with the Admiralty. There was another important question to which he desired to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. Lord Charles Beresford, in the address already referred to, had stated the signalling in the Mercantile Marine was deplorable. In fact, there was hardly anyone in the Service instructed in signalling. Lord Charles said that, in order to test the signalling of a Mercantile Marine, he signalled 32 merchant ships in the course of a voyage, and only seven of the 32 took the signal in and answered. In a time of war, if a cruiser could not make itself understood by the merchant ship, the result might be deplorable. Signalling was, in his (Admiral Field's) opinion, bad enough in the Navy, but in the Mercantile Marine it was very bad. He thought that one officer at least in every merchant ship should be educated in signalling, and should be able to pass an examination in signalling—

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: So they are.

ADMIRAL FIELD said, he could not accept the hon. Member as an authority on the subject. He thought a distinguished naval officer like Lord Charles Beresford a more competent judge. There was a Report on lighthouses and the inspection of lighthouses furnished to the House, in which it stated that the light on the Deal Pier Head and the lights on the Dover Admiralty Pier were insufficient, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would see that the recommendations of the Report were carried out. He also wished to know whether anything had been done to carry out the recommendations of the Light Commission upon lighthouses and lightships with regard to establishing electric communication between lighthouses and lightships from the shore?

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said there was no item in the Vote under consideration more important than the item relating to the inspection of ships' provisions under the Act of 1892. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Inspectors had been appointed under the new Act, and what were the ports at which it was proposed to station them? He also wished to know what progress had been made with the building of the Patent Office?

MR. MUNDELLA said, he could assure the hon. and gallant Member for Eastbourne that there was a most perfect understanding between the Admiralty and the Board of Trade on the subject of trade routes for merchant ships. He could also assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that instructions were given and examinations held in signalling in the Mercantile Marine, and that all merchant vessels ought to be in a position to respond to signals. But he intended to make further inquiries in the matter. On the subject of lighthouses and lightships, the whole of the lightships were attended by Trinity House, and there was nothing in the Vote for that Department, while, as he had stated the previous day in answer to the question, a good deal of work had been done in establishing electrical communication between the shore and the lighthouses. It was intended to lay on the Table a Supplementary Estimate for the work. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol, on the subject of the inspection of ships' provisions, he had to say that as soon as he came into Office he gave his immediate attention to the Act which had just been passed. Steps were at once taken to obtain a competent class of Inspector in order that the Act might be put into proper operation. A staff of 14 Inspectors had been appointed, and they were stationed at the five principal ports of the country—London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Cardiff, and Shields, and they had definite instructions that the inspection of the provisions of all ships were to be carried out. Between July 17 and September 2 of the present year 273 ships had been inspected, and in 96 cases provisions were condemned, while 13 ships had some slight defect in their provisions. When these defects were pointed out to the shipowners they were at once remedied, and indeed he hoped to be able to carry out this most important matter in connection with the comfort and well-being of seamen without making it burdensome or oppressive to the shipowners. Only one vessel had been detained, and that only for a short time?

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH asked whether it was only proposed to appoint Inspectors for the ports mentioned?

MR. MUNDELLA said, it was found to be very easy to send an Inspector to any port when necessary, and it was believed that the 14 Inspectors would be able to carry out the whole work. With regard to the Patent Office he had not the information required, but he would obtain it, and give it to the right hon. Gentleman on Monday.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said he only wanted the right hon. Gentleman to give his attention to the matter.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, it was somewhat difficult to follow the course of the Government in this matter. After listening to the right hon. Gentleman he had come to the conclusion that, at any rate, the appointment of Labour Correspondents had been handed over to a Committee the political convictions of which were pretty well known, and behind which the right hon. Gentleman sheltered himself.

MR. MUNDELLA: It is very unfair to say that political opinions of the Government have never governed anything which they have had to do, and it is not fair to say that we have acted from political motives, or that I have endeavoured to screen myself behind them. As far as I am concerned, I do not know their political opinions. I am responsible for every officer in the Department, whatever his opinions may be.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, he would refer the right hon. Gentleman to the case of Mr. Giffen. Did the right hon. Gentleman not know Mr. Giffen's politics? The right hon. Gentleman's ignorance was sublime. He would not, however, pursue that subject, though he could not follow the gallant Admiral in dismissing so lightly the undoubtedly important question of the manner in which these Labour Correspondents had been appointed. He, however, desired to refer to the subject of electrical communication with lightships, and to the fact that in this matter a large number of the recommendations of the Royal Commission had not been acted upon. He would like to have an explanation of this. The right hon. Gentleman, not content with the Royal Commission appointed by the previous Government, nominated a Departmental Committee, apparently to whittle down, as far as possible, the recommendations of that Royal Commission. He did not think the subject had been properly considered. It was of the greatest importance that they should have proper facilities in every respect as to saving life. The whole subject relating to these lifeboats and lightships was of great importance, and he hoped the recommendations made on the subject would be thoroughly carried out. He need not refer to the well-known cases of the Enterprize and the Sea King, or to the many instances in which the absence of communication had led to lamentable loss of life and property. The Commissioners specified five vessels which they recommended should be immediately connected, but the Government proposed to ignore three-fifths of those recommendations.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, he wished to call the attention of the President of the Board of Trade to the great advantage derived by the steamers of the most important Steam-Packet Companies from the telegraphic communication which had been established between Tory Island and the mainland. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to undertake that, until the Royal Commission reported, if any accident should happen to the cable he would not allow the telegraphic communication to suffer. He thought his request in this matter was very reasonable. There were many great advantages gained by what had been done; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would recognise the importance of this communication in such a way that it would be possible for them to have it continued without possibility of interruption. He hoped the undertaking to which he referred would be carried out.

MAJOR DARWIN (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said, he would like to ask what were the difficulties which the Board of Trade experienced in bringing the Cheap Trains Act into operation? When he called the attention of the President of the Board of Trade to the fact that the fares on the underground railway between Earl's Court and the Mansion House were illegal, the right hon. Gentleman said he would have the case examined by a Committee of the House. That Committee never reported, and the illegal fares were still being charged. In reply to a second communication on the subject, he was told that the Board of Trade had no power to bring the matter before a Court of Law. He believed that the Board of Trade had the power, because the law declared that they "shall" undertake a prosecution in cases where it was needed. It was practically impossible for private persons to undertake these prosecutions. The first and second-class passengers were season-ticket holders, and the third-class passengers were not in a position to institute prosecutions of this sort, so that the Railway Companies could practically in the case of small fares defy the law unless the Board of Trade stepped in and saw that the law was properly enforced. Section 17 of the Act of 1844 provided that where a Railway Company was acting in excess of the power given by such Act, and if it should be to the public advantage that the Company should be restrained from so acting, the Board of Trade should certify the same to the Attorney General, who should take proceedings to restrain the Company from acting in an illegal manner. In 1864 certain maximum fares were laid down by the Company, but they were charging above these fares, and in all the correspondence no one had been able to point out under what powers the excess fares were being charged. The Company stated that in certain cases they were really charging under the fares, but that could not be an excuse for charging over the maximum in others, though it might be an excuse to come before a Committee and ask for a re-arrangement. He thought it was evident it must be to the public advantage that the Board of Trade should interfere when illegal fares were being charged. Under the Act it was incumbent upon the Board of Trade to take action in such circumstances, and he should like to know why they had not done so?

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) desired to put a question to the President of the Board of Trade on a matter of some importance, and which the right hon. Gentleman would remember having been concerned with a short time ago, when a deputation waited upon the President of the Board of Trade in reference to an Amendment of the Trade Marks Department. The proper administration of that Department was a question of great moment to the trading community. He ventured to say that on the occasion of the visit of this deputation there was disclosed to the right hon. Gentleman an amount of delay, laxity, and confusion not altogether consistent with the proper management of the Department, and which was not completely explained by the head of the Department present at the time. The right hon. Gentleman gave his cordial assistance, and said he would take the earliest opportunity of going into the question. He hoped they might now receive the assurance that the Department had been put on a different and improved basis.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN desired to ask a question on this Vote. He thought he was right in saying that the expenses of the Patent Office, as shown by the published Estimate, were calculated for the year at £59,861, and the receipts were shown at £183,000. Then there was a note to the effect that the Patent Office publications would add another £6,000 to that. That meant that while the expenditure was, roughly speaking, £60,000, the receipts from patents were expected to reach £189,000, and the difference was the profit derived by the State from inventors, which amounted to £130,000 a year. It was perfectly certain that public opinion would not allow that profit to go continuously into the Exchequer, and the question was what way should it be disposed of? He did not know what view his right hon. Friend took, but when he (Mr. J. Chamberlain) was at the Board of Trade, a Patent Act was passed by which the sum for initiating a patent was most considerably reduced, so that at the present time a provisional specification could be obtained for £1, and a patent for one year for £5. That he entirely approved of, but he held then, and he had always held since, that it would be most undesirable largely to reduce the fees upon the later terms of a patent. The late President of the Board of Trade took a different view of the matter, and the subsequent payments were, under his management, very considerably reduced. He was of opinion that such a course tended to allow a number of useless patents to remain and interfere with further invention; and his own view was that while they should allow an invention to be secured for a short time for a very small sum, and afterwards, unless the patent proved itself to be of sufficient value to justify considerable further payments, it was very much in the interest of the community at large that the patent should lapse, and he would continue the higher payment for the later period. His interest in the matter was this: Having got this balance of £130,000, he was afraid great demands would be made upon it to reduce the subsequent payments which he thought the Government would be unable to resist. He would much rather that some of that money, at all events, should be spent on what, he believed, would be a much more valuable policy — namely, in proceeding more rapidly with the publication of specifications and abstracts. He shared any blame there was to be borne for it; and although they did something in his time at the Board of Trade to accelerate matters, he did not contend they did all that might be done, and successive Governments were somewhat to blame; but it was something like a public scandal that such publications had been so long delayed. He thought, with the enormous profit in the hands of the Treasury, something might very easily be done to secure a much earlier publication of these specifications.

MR. MUNDELLA (who was very indistinctly heard in the Reporters' Gallery) was understood to say that he thought the change made by the Member for West Birmingham in the direction of reducing the initial cost of a patent was extremely wise, as had been shown by the result. In consequence of that diminution of cost, there had been a great increase in the number of patents. He agreed, also, that the later patents were patents which ought to pay the full fees. This diminution had resulted in the receipts being something like £87,000 less last year. [MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: There is still a profit.] Yes, there was still a profit. Without pledging himself to any course, he might say he thought the patentees who had the advantage ought to pay some of the tax. He was quite anxious to facilitate as much as possible the use and introduction of inventions, but at the same time some benefit should go to the State. With regard to the early publication of specifications and abstracts he was entirely with his right hon. Friend. He also thought they should be a better quality of publication, those now issued having, in his opinion, become very shabby and quite unworthy of a country like England. He considered they ought to take steps to make the drawings and illustrations more creditable. With respect to the Royal Commission on Lighthouses they made certain recommendations, but it was impossible to carry out all these at once. The duty devolved on the Board of Trade and the Post Office to carry out these recommendations, and they appointed a small Committee to consider them and Report upon the best method of carrying them out. He had asked the members of the Committee not to wait for a formal Report in regard to the matter, but to make a Report as soon as possible, and then a decision would be at once arrived at. With respect to the question of illegal fares on the Metropolitan Railway, he had not been able to satisfy himself that the fares were illegal. Several Acts overlapped each other, and under these the Company claimed that the fares were legal. Care should be taken to look into the whole matter, so that it might be put on a satisfactory basis. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit) had asked as to the administration of the Trades Mark Department, and he could assure him that the matter was being vigorously taken in hand, and a searching inquiry made into

it. He hoped they should now be able to take this Vote.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH desired to say a few words on the question connected with the electric communication of the shore with lightships, because he was responsible for the appointment of the Royal Commission. He understood from the right hon. Gentleman that although he could not, of course, carry out all the recommendations of the Commission at once, yet he would do what the Member for Thanet desired, and carry out this particular recommendation connected with regard to lightships as soon as possible.

MR. MUNDELLA : Certainly.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH : With reference to the question of his hon. Friend (Mr. Macartney) as to Tory Island, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would bear in mind that a great distinction existed between maintaining this communication for the purpose of light and for the purpose of sending messages. The cable on Tory Island was established by Lloyds purely for trade purposes, and he did not think the Government ought to impose on the general taxpayer the burden of retaining communication for trade purposes, and, therefore, as the Royal Commission was appointed merely to consider the question of communication of this kind for the saving of life and property, their Report on Tory Island would be from that point of view. Any communication for trade purposes should be paid for by the shipowners.

SIR W. HARCOURT was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the observations he had made on this subject. He could only say that as guardian of the public finances certainly there were circumstances at the present time which made him very unwilling to indulge in Supplementary Estimates, and one of the rare exceptions he had made had been in favour of these lightships. A Supplementary Estimate for £10,000 had been laid on the Table that day to establish communication with the lightship on the Goodwins. He would appeal to the Committee to allow the Vote which they had been discussing to pass, and he would then promise, at 12 o'clock, to report Progress and proceed with the Report of Supply.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.), said, he had set down on the Notice Paper a Motion for the reduction of the Vote. He only wanted to call the particular attention of the President of the Board of Trade to the repeated omission of the Railway Department of the Board of Trade to put pressure on the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Company, to obviate a danger which existed in consequence of which several deaths had occurred at Tilbury Docks, one fatal accident occurring only last week. The Railway Company ran four lines of railway through the dock, which lines were absolutely open, there being no guard or fence, gate or watchman, and accidents were continually occurring. He and his constituents had not only memorialised the Board of Trade, but they had written continuously and memorialised the Tilbury and Southend Railway Company but without result. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would take steps to compel the Company to obviate this scandalous danger.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that as regarded signalling there was an admirable national code of signals which the Mercantile Marine used, and in the use of which they were fully competent. No doubt the electric communication with lighthouses was very advisable, but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not fix his whole attention on that and divert it from the rule of the road at sea.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the hon. and gallant Member for South-East Essex to accept his assurance that the Board of Trade had again and again put pressure on the Tilbury Railway Company in respect to the matter he had mentioned, and they had done so only during the present week. He should be very happy to communicate the result to the hon. Member.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

4. £16, to complete the sum for Bankruptcy Department of the Board of Trade, agreed to.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [7th September] reported :—

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE
DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS II.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) said it was understood that his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) would raise the question of Armenia, but, as the hon. Member was not here, he thought it was right he should raise the question, and that they might have some statement from the Government in regard to it. Her Majesty's Government, he thought, must have something to say upon a question of this kind. He had no doubt the facts relating to that country were in the possession of Her Majesty's Government, and he trusted they would have an assurance from Her Majesty's Government that the various questions involved would be dealt with in a proper manner, and, above all, that Papers would be laid on the Table without delay.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): On this question, Sir, I should like to say I cannot promise that the Papers will be immediately laid on the Table of the House. They required much consideration. Very strong measures were taken by the Porte—not only strong, but somewhat indiscriminate, which culminated in the trial at Angora. The right hon. Gentleman is aware of the state of matters. The accused were not allowed to produce witnesses, and Her Majesty's Government considered whether they should not make representations to the Porte in the interests of justice and mercy. These representations were strictly limited to the case of persons as to whom there was no doubt in the mind of any reasonable man that they were innocent. In two cases the results, as is known, were eminently satisfactory. The practice of making representations at Constantinople under the Treaty of Berlin does not invariably produce good results; and it is, I am sure it will be acknowledged, a practice which should be carefully guarded. Her Majesty's Government have taken care, as one of the Treaty Powers, to discharge their obligations. That is a fair statement of our position, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman and his friend will be satisfied that we have not been at fault.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he would point out that if Her Majesty's Government were required to interfere in Armenia by the Treaty of Berlin—the 61st Article—and he did not believe they were—if that was the case, however, surely they would be justified in interfering on the side of Turkey under the 11th Article. What had been done in that direction? He would like to know had anything been done? He had to complain that, with regard to the Pamirs, to Afghanistan, and to Siam they had not been able to obtain any information from Her Majesty's Government. He would like to point out that, in these matters, the strongest position this country could take up was to decline secret negotiations. He knew that was not the opinion all round; but it was his opinion, and he strongly urged it upon the Government. He was sorry they had not more information on these subjects—the subjects that had been mentioned—for it was his conviction that no Minister could carry on a worthy foreign policy unless he had the people of England behind him, and that could not happen unless the people were kept informed of what was going on. He would venture to express a hope that Papers on the various subjects would be laid on the Table without delay.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, there was a strong feeling in Madagascar, as well as in England, that the Slave Trade was increasing in consequence of the laxity on the part of the French Government in putting a stop to it. He thought Her Majesty's Government should be in a position to deal with a question of such serious importance, and he ventured to intervene merely for the purpose of asking them to do so. The question was a serious one, and, for his part, he should be very glad to have something done in regard to it.

Resolution agreed to.

MADRAS AND BOMBAY ARMIES BILL.

[Lords.] (No. 413.)

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): I rise to move the Second Reading of this Bill, and in view of the advanced period of the evening I will say as few words as possible in making the Motion. The measure is of the simplest possible character. Its object is to unite the Presidential Armies of India into one. To the civilian mind it seems obviously of enormous advantage that all those Armies should be commanded from one centre. The history of the Bill may be stated briefly thus: In the early days of our Empire in India three Armies sprang up in the course of nature. It was an almost inevitable growth—that there should be an Army in each Presidency. Bengal had a certain primacy, which was attributable to the fact that it was under the command of the head of the Bengal Army that the English troops in India served. This system of three Presidential Armies went on unimpaired until the Mutiny. It was then found in practical experience prejudicial to the military service that the three Armies should not be really as well as nominally under one control. After the Mutiny there was expressed on all hands a desire for a closer union of the three. The development of railways and telegraphs made that union easier and more natural. For years the history of the matter has been one long series of recommendations by the Government of India, met by successive concessions on the part of this country. In 1869 the three Military Accounts Departments were amalgamated; in 1876 the Remount Departments were amalgamated. Then came the Afghan War. In 1879 a Commission was appointed; in 1881 the Government of India reported in favour of the union of the three Armies, but it was refused on the ground of insufficient authority. In 1884 the three Ordnance Departments were amalgamated; in 1885 the Government of India reported again in favour of the union, but it was declined, because of the difficulty of legislation; in 1886 the Punjab Frontier Force was transferred to the Commander-in-Chief. In 1888 the Government of India reported again, and then Lord Cross, at that time Secretary of State, though he said that the exigencies of Public Business would not enable him to propose legislation, suggested certain practical steps which conduced to the attainment of the end desired. In 1889-90 the Transport, Clothing, Military Works, Military Education, and the offices of Judge Advocate General were amalgamated. When that was done the amalgamation was practically complete. All that we now ask is that the House of Commons will join with the House of Lords in giving legislative sanction to an arrangement which by this time is pretty nearly established. We have by this time a vast amount of authority on our side. We have the authority of four Viceroy—Lord Lytton, Lord Ripon, Lord Dufferin, and Lord Lansdowne, and of the most distinguished Indian Generals, including Sir D. Stewart, Lord Roberts, and Sir G. White. In another place the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief has expressed himself favourable to the change. The Bill has come here with the full sanction of everybody interested in Indian and military problems. I have said all that need be said about the essential parts of the Bill. There remains one question, accessory and ancillary—namely, whether or not the Commanders-in-Chief shall retain seats in Legislative Councils. On that point I am bound to say the authorities are not quite so unanimous as they are with regard to the main part of the change. The Government of India, reviewing all the circumstances and balancing the authorities were not in favour of these military officers retaining their seats, and my noble Friend the Secretary of State when he moved the Bill in another place moved it with the condition that the officers should lose their seats on the Legislative Councils. However, he found that military opinion was opposed to him, and he made a concession on the point which stands in the Bill. I am prepared to maintain that concession. It is not a light matter to disregard the wishes and advice of the Government of India on the point, but I feel that the main purpose of the Bill is so important that it would be a pity to jeopardise it by making an alteration which would ensure the rejection of the measure in the House of Lords. I would ask the House to agree to the proposition I now make, with the added condition that the Generals commanding in Madras and Bombay shall retain their seats on the Legislative Councils.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. G. Russell.)

MR. NAOROJI (Finsbury, Central): Will the Legislative Councils oppose this clause, and will the Generals be paid?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: The Generals are not paid extra salaries in respect of their services on the Legislative Councils; therefore, their removal, if brought about, would not of necessity involve a saving; but it might be held by the authorities in India that when these Generals are relieved of certain duties they might also be relieved of salaries. That, however, is speculative, and I cannot say that that view will be taken.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH (Bristol, W.): I only rise to say that I think my hon. Friend the Member for the Kingston Division of Surrey (Sir R. Temple) is very anxious to offer to the House some observations on the Bill. I think, in view of his great authority, the Committee stage might be postponed to Monday instead of being taken to-morrow.

MR. G. RUSSELL: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Sheriff Courts Consignations (Scotland) Bill, without Amendment.

Burghs Gas Supply (Scotland) Act (1876) Amendment Bill, Elementary Education (School Attendance) Bill, with one Amendment to each Bill.

Mr. G. Russell

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 4) BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

PISTOLS BILL.—(No. 425.)

Read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

NAVAL DEFENCE AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 450.)

Read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 454.)

Read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

COUNTY SURVEYORS (IRELAND) BILL [Lords].—(No. 453.)

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed, with an Amendment.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS BILL [Lords]. (No. 457.)

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed, without Amendment.

COLLEGE CHARTER ACT, 1871 (COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS).

Copy presented,—of a Petition of Sir Joseph Barnby and others praying Her Majesty in Council to grant a Charter of Incorporation to the College of Organists, together with a Copy of the Draft of the Charter [by Act]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 411.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) asked at what hour to-morrow the Government proposed to take the Report stage of the Colonial Vote?

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire): After Supply—I suppose at about 7 o'clock.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, 9th September 1893.

The House met at Twelve of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

COAST LIGHT COMMUNICATION.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): I desire to ask the Secretary to the Treasury a question upon the Supplementary Estimate circulated this morning. On the Board of Trade Vote on the previous night the question of telegraphic communication with light-houses and lightships was discussed, and it was understood that a Supplementary Estimate would be taken for that purpose. I find that Supplementary Estimate proposed to be taken is for £10,000, which, it appears, is to be added to the grant towards the Mercantile Marine Fund. Of course that may be only a matter of form, but I hope it is not to be taken as an indication that the Government consider the cost of the telegraphic communication ought, in any case, to be a charge upon the Mercantile Marine Fund. That was not my intention, and I hope it will not be done, except, of course, where the communication is desired for Board of Trade purposes?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (SIR J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The Supplementary Estimate was put in the form in which it now appears for convenience of discussion. The £10,000 will be kept entirely separate from the Mercantile Marine Fund.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: It has really nothing whatever to do with that Fund.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): That is so. The Mercantile Marine Fund will not bear one farthing of the expense of the telegraphic communication. The Board of Trade intend to execute the work by degrees, and the Treasury will supply the money, for which the Board will account.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): If the Board of Trade is going to carry out this work, why not make it a Board of Trade Vote? I shall object to the Vote on that score.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): Who will account for the expenditure of the Vote?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Board of Trade.

MR. HANBURY: Then why not put it on their Vote?

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I hope we shall get proper time to consider this Vote before the House rises.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: It is proposed that the Supplementary Estimates will be taken the same time as the Votes, which is the invariable practice.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Is there not a deficiency in the Mercantile Marine Vote this year, and is this Estimate intended to meet it?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Certainly not.

THE MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, as a large number of shipping traders are anxious to have time to consider the new Amendments to the Merchant Shipping Bill, the right hon. Gentleman intends to push on the measure before the Adjournment, or whether he will postpone its further consideration until the Autumn Session?

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take the Second Reading of the Bill before the House adjourns for the Autumn Sittings. The Bill is one more for consideration in Committee than on the Second Reading, and I know that many shipowners desire to look into its provisions.

MR. MUNDELLA: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is of the utmost importance that the Bill should become law within a reasonable time. There is no intention on the part of the Government to hurry it on. What we propose is that the Second Reading shall be taken before the House adjourns for the Autumn Session, and that then it shall be referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses, who will go through the clauses to see that it is purely a consolidation measure.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not the fact that the Bill consists of over 700 clauses, that it has only been in the hands of Members for a few days, and that there is absolutely no urgency for it; and whether, under these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman does not think it advisable to defer the Second Reading, which would affirm a principle involving, amongst other things, new penalties, until such time as the shipping community can consider the Bill?

[No answer was given.]

CHOLERA.

MR. A. CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether he can give any further information as to the reported case of cholera in the House?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derbyshire, Ilkeston): No, Sir. I have nothing to add to what I said yesterday.

SCIENCE AND ART VOTES.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council whether there are not some Votes for Science and Art to be taken?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): Yes, Sir.

SIR R. TEMPLE: When will they be taken?

MR. ACLAND: In their Class order.

THE BOARD OF TRADE VOTE.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I desire to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the fact that some questions connected with the Board of Trade have been left undiscussed, he will allow the Report on that Vote to come on at some hour this evening when it can be properly discussed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): As we have all undergone tremendous inconvenience by meeting on a Saturday, I hope we will make the best progress with business we can. The Vote for the Board of Trade was taken with the general consent of the House.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I desire to raise a question on the Bankruptcy Vote last night, but refrained in deference to the understanding that the Vote would be agreed to at 12 o'clock. I therefore hope that the Report of the Vote will be brought on at a time to enable me very briefly to raise this question.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I can only again express the hope that this unfortunate Saturday Sitting will be availed of to expedite business as much as possible.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY,—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS II.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

*MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, there were a number of matters in this Vote on which it would be desirable to dwell; but he would not now touch upon them, as he was anxious not to interpose any obstacle in the way of a business-like despatch of Supply. He wished, however, to call attention to the position occupied in connection with agriculture by the Department for which the Committee were now asked to vote Supplies. He had not been one of those who went into ecstasies at the prospect of the appointment of a Minister of Agriculture. He never could bring himself to believe that the mere change of the designation of the official whose duty it was to represent in Parliament the Agricultural Department would do any practical service to those engaged in agriculture; and he never shared in the expectation, which had been entertained by many agriculturists, that the establishment of a Department of Agriculture would relieve the difficulties under which agriculturists had so long suffered. He was bound, however, to admit that the Department had been very fortunate in securing as its first President one so thoroughly conversant with agricultural matters as his right hon. Friend the Member for Sleaford, and he thought the agricultural community had also every reason to be satisfied with the arrangements made by the present Government for the representation of the Department. As the Representative of the Associated Chambers of Agriculture, he was bound to give expression to their sense of the unswerving courtesy with which their representations had been received by the right hon. Gentleman the present President of the Board of Agriculture. But that brought them to the question — what had the right hon. Gentleman done? The Government announced at the commencement of the Session that they intended, for the purpose of inquiring into the widespread and universally admitted agricultural depression, to appoint a Select Committee of the House. He ventured to put down a notice distinctly challenging the wisdom of that decision. His main ground of objection was that the appointment of such a Committee was calculated to produce unnecessary delay in the way of the adoption of practical measures of relief. Since then the Government had so far changed their plan as to substitute for the Select Committee a Royal Commission. He did not object to a Royal Commission to the same extent as he objected to a Select Committee. On a Royal Commission the services could be secured of able, competent, and recognised agricultural authorities, whose views and opinions would command weight amongst all sections of the community, whilst he could conceive of no tribunal under the sun less competent to conduct such an inquiry, or whose judgment would carry less weight, than a Select Committee of the House. There were extremely few Members of the House, taking the House as a whole, and including the Front Bench at which he was standing, whose opinions on agricultural topics would possess any intrinsic value, and the number of those Members who possessed the technical knowledge adequate for a Committee of the kind, and at the same time retained a free and independent judgment on the subject, was still fewer. It was notorious that the exigencies of electoral requirements had compelled many Members of the House to smother the opinions which it was well known they possessed. Therefore, while there were few Members of the House who could be classified as agricultural authorities, fewer still dared to state their own views on the subject. He would ask why the Government needed the assistance of either a Royal Commission or a Committee in this matter? A very able staff was at the disposal of the Minister of Agriculture in his Department—a staff containing several gentlemen to whose opinions on agriculture the country would attach far greater weight than to the opinions of any Select Committee. Where, then, was the need for this inquiry?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) : To inquire into bimetallism.

*MR. J. LOWTHER said, he would not declare himself on one side or the other of the violent controversy about bimetallism. He desired to keep a perfectly open mind for the arguments advanced on the subject. He thought that upon every subject which could be profitably gone into by the Commission the right hon. Gentleman had advisers at his disposal in his Office.

SIR W. HARCOURT : There is the question of the relief of local taxation.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked, was the Royal Commission to advise also on the subject of bimetallism?

SIR W. HARCOURT : No.

*MR. J. LOWTHER said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to take a view of the Commission distinctly opposite to the view of the Minister for Agriculture. It now seemed that the Minister for Agriculture would derive from the Royal Commission no assistance on the question of bimetallism, which apparently vexed the soul of the right hon. Gentleman. He admitted that the question of local taxation was very important; but anybody who imagined that prosperity would be restored to agriculture by peddling or tinkering with local rates were entirely on the wrong tack, though he had always contended that relief from that source was equitably due to those engaged in the agricultural industry. At the National Agricultural Conference, which was held last winter, all these subjects were discussed; but the one point that really aroused interest at the gathering was the gross injustice under which the agricultural community laboured in having taxes, local and Imperial, placed upon their industry, whilst those against whom they had to compete abroad were exempt from their imposition. The resolution adopted by the Conference did not inevitably involve Protection—a question which he was prepared to argue out anywhere—though he admitted it led up to Protection, which was the only real solution of the difficulty. The resolution declared that the Conference was of opinion—

"That the unfair competition of untaxed foreign imports with home produce and manufactures which are subjected to heavy internal taxation is an anomaly and an injustice."

The Resolution further declared—

"That all competing imports should pay a duty not less than the rates and taxes levied on the home production."

That resolution was adopted by the most representative agricultural assembly that had ever gathered together in the country, and it called attention to an injustice which it was within the power of the Government to deal with, without infringing to any extent on the doctrine which they had so much at heart—the doctrine which by some strange misnomer was called by the term "Free Trade." There were set out in the resolution of the Conference two alternative plans by which the desires of those who passed the resolution could be carried out. Either taxes should be placed on imports, or home products should be relieved from all taxation, whether Imperial or local.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is a matter of policy which cannot be discussed on this Vote. The question of the appointment of a Royal Commission is in Order, but not the policy of the Government.

*MR. J. LOWTHER said, he would return to the question of the Royal Commission. A Royal Commission on Agriculture sat under the Duke of Richmond several years ago, and cost a large sum of money. He supposed the Committee would be asked to undertake a large expenditure also for the proposed Royal Commission; and he would ask whether the able staff at the command of the Agricultural Department could not supply the Government with sufficient information to make some substantial and practical proposal to Parliament without undertaking this expense? He was quite aware that the views which he held in regard to the real cause of agricultural distress were not universally admitted even by those with whom he acted on most political questions; but there was no doubt that most of the agricultural community were with him, though they might not proclaim their views from the housetops.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is now out of Order. He is dealing with a question of policy.

*MR. J. LOWTHER said, he quite recognised the strict justice of the Chairman's ruling; but it was difficult to separate the question of policy from the question technically before the Committee. The Government wanted to make a show of doing something for the agriculturists, beyond that which Parliament charged them to do under already existing Statutes, and they hoped to fulfil that something by appointing a Royal Commission. But he would point out to the Minister for Agriculture that though he might have 100 Reports from 100 Royal Commissions, he would never succeed in relieving agricultural distress unless he relieved the agricultural community of the very heavy disadvantages under which they laboured.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, he gathered from an observation made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Commission about to be appointed to inquire into agricultural depression would be able to inquire also into the question of local taxation. It was quite true, as his right hon. Friend the Member for Thanet had said, that no relief could be given through local taxation which would make any material improvement in the position of agriculturists; but it was none the less true that if local taxation was placed on a footing so that the farmers would not feel that they were unjustly treated it would be a step in the right direction.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he is now discussing a question of policy.

Mr. J. Lowther

COMMANDER BETHELL said, he was rather drawn out of the proper course by the remark of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He suggested that the Board might follow the example of other countries, notably Germany, where experiments were carried on in the growth of cereals and other agricultural matters. He had no wish to belittle what had been done by Local Authorities, but some experiments were beyond the power or means of Local Authorities, and such experiments he considered should either be made by the Central Authority, or the Local Authorities should receive assistance in conducting them. No one would deny that if our agriculturists were to compete successfully with the agriculturists of other countries they must have the light of the best scientific research that was possible thrown upon their industry. He gladly recognised what the President of the Board of Agriculture had done during this Session to prevent and stop the disease among swine, and assured him that that part of the agricultural community which he represented were grateful to him for carrying out the policy of his predecessor.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said, the agricultural constituencies of Scotland would, he was sure, thoroughly appreciate in the right way the so-called friendly attitude of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and would understand the way in which they had consistently blocked all the attempts of the Minister for Agriculture to do something for the agricultural community. He had paid a visit to the North not very long ago, and he knew that the farmers there looked forward with great interest to the appointment of this Committee; and, contrary to what was said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Lowther), there were Members in that House capable of giving an opinion on agricultural matters, and the farmers would willingly have entrusted their case to them. He thought a great deal of time had been lost which might have been judiciously occupied in the consideration of this question by a Committee. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman was so far repentant that he had now given his blessing to the appointment of the Royal Commission, from the labours of which he anticipated great good. He would like to ask what the Government were going to do to carry out the Resolution passed by the House in favour of an inquiry into the working of the Agricultural Holdings Act? That Act had not carried out the expectations formed with regard to it. It had undoubtedly broken down, and there was an intense desire on the part of the agriculturists of the North that this inquiry should be carried out. He wanted to know whether it was to be carried out by an independent inquiry, or whether it would be one of the matters that would be handed over for consideration by the Royal Commission? He represented, perhaps, the leading cattle feeding, if not cattle breeding, county in Scotland, and the Minister of Agriculture would probably not be surprised if he asked him to give some information as to the present position of the Canadian cattle question. Had he anything to tell the House in continuation of the very interesting Papers which he presented a short time ago? As to the present condition and as to the continued results of the investigation of the lungs of these animals, he presumed that the animals were being still scientifically investigated, and he should like to find out whether there had been any more cases of disease discovered in lungs which the right hon. Gentleman's advisers pronounced to be pleuro-pneumonia? A perusal of the Papers presented had not removed his doubts as to whether these cases were pleuro-pneumonia or not, or whether they were not cases of sporadic lung affection partly developed by the journey, and not absolutely of an infectious character. Was there any further evidence communicated to the right hon. Gentleman which would enable them to come to a more definite conclusion on that point? He regretted that the Minister of Agriculture had not seen his way to accept the invitation of the Canadian Government to send out two experts at the expense of that Government to investigate this question. The Canadian people considered that they were now on their trial in this respect, and they believed that such an investigation would, at all events, do no harm, and would satisfy not only the Canadians, but the people in this country. He hoped the door was not absolutely and finally closed against the acceptance of the Canadian offer. In this matter Canada was placed between the devil and the deep sea, and she would be glad of the opportunity of clearing her character, and of showing that pleuropneumonia had not and did not now exist in Canada. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the Commission inquiring not only into that point, but also into the point whether the frontier regulations were sufficient to prevent the incursion of pleuro-pneumonia from the United States into Canada. Finally, he wished to ask how much longer the restriction on the importation of Canadian cattle into this country was likely to continue?

*MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) said, he did not propose to follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thame in his observations with reference to the appointment of the Royal Commission. He did not suppose that any great result would follow from the labours of that Commission. No doubt something had to be done, and it was necessary for the Government that the Commission should be appointed; but how far it would realise the expectations of the Liberal County Members, who had made large promises of what might be expected from the Government, he was not prepared to say. Allusion had very properly been made to the restrictions put upon the importation of cattle disease into this country from abroad, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not too hastily relax those very judicious restrictions. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture had, under considerable pressure, displayed great firmness. He hoped that before they threw open the ports of this country to the unrestricted importation of live cattle, if there was the least suspicion of disease, they would cause every inquiry to be made, so that the breeders of this country should not run unnecessary risk. In the early part of the Session he called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the lamentable increase of glanders and farcy in London. The disease not only inflicted loss on the owners of horses, but it involved a serious danger to human life as regarded people brought in contact with horses and persons driving and travelling in hansom cabs; and it was, therefore, of the greatest possible consequence that it should be grappled with. There were Orders providing for the slaughter of animals affected; but, unfortunately, the question of the compensation to be given rested with the Local Authorities, and in London the County Council had thought fit to refuse to give compensation out of the public funds to induce owners who suspected that the disease was incubating to give notice to the Public Authorities. The County Council relied on supervision and inspection to stamp out the disease. But the far more effective course would be to offer every possible inducement to the owners of horses to give notice of any suspicion of the existence of the disease, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would press the practical importance of that view upon the County Council.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, that none of his constituents rode in hansom cabs except when they visited an English town, but, as Chairman of a Sanitary Board for some years, he was quite aware that sickness in animals was not reported unless proper compensation was given for the slaughter of those animals. If they wanted to stamp out glanders in London, they would have to compensate the owners, or they would have everyone against them. He hoped the Board of Agriculture would not be coaxed by the remarks of the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson). They had had immense trouble and expense in stamping out pleuro-pneumonia.

DR. FARQUHARSON said, that all he asked for was inquiry.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that if the hon. Member merely asked for inquiry, he did not think there could be too much inquiry into the subject. With regard to the Swine Fever Bill, or Act, he wanted to know whether it would be administered by the Central Authority in London or not?

MR. H. GARDNER: Its whole object is to transfer to the Central Authority the power now exercised by the Local Authorities.

COLONEL NOLAN pointed out that the Act had not been in use in Ireland before, and was a new one so far as they were concerned.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) wished to offer a complaint from the dairy farmer's point of view, in which he was personally interested, and he would confine himself principally to the point of the small protection the makers of butter got. He had no complaint to make personally against the right hon. Gentleman or his predecessor; his sole complaint was that the Board of Agriculture had not got sufficient powers for the protection of the makers of butter in this country. He would like to know if the matter was entirely in the hands of the Board of Trade? He believed the Board of Trade had very little authority. It had no power of classification as regarded the Customs. The only headings in the Customs statistics were butter and lard; but there were many articles which came between these two. Something should be done to inform them to what extent importers adulterated their butter with margarine; and when that adulteration exceeded, say, 15 per cent., they ought to be obliged to state the fact in their bills of lading, for adulterated butter did even more mischief than margarine itself. Then there was no protection against the adulteration of butter inland. The whole control rested with the Local Government Board, and under that Board was exercised by the Local Authorities, who administered their powers very loosely. The result was that the English dairy farmers had to encounter most unfair competition. It was monstrous that, with regard to a matter affecting so large a portion of the farming interest, the President of the Board of Agriculture should have no power to give protection against this very serious and unfair competition. In the few cases in which the retail dealers were prosecuted they very often escaped on the plea that the adulterated article was supplied by the wholesale dealer; and the prosecution was not carried further. Not only should these matters be placed under the control of the Board of Agriculture, but that Board ought to have an analyst of its own. At present, analyses were made at Somerset House, and everybody had complained with regard not only to butter, but to milk and other articles. Dr. Bell allowed a percentage of adulteration that was perfectly absurd. He believed that in milk Dr. Bell allowed from 15 to 20 per cent. of water; at any rate he was told so by the public analysts. That gentleman took the very worst kind of butter and milk, and said it was possible in the very worst cases for it to be pure butter or milk. Dairy farming was becoming more and more an important portion of the farming industry of this country, and all such matters ought to be under the control of the Board of Agriculture. France, Sweden, and other foreign countries were doing everything in their power to protect their dairy interests, and the large importation of Danish butter was especially due to the great interest shown in regard to dairy produce by the Board of Agriculture of Denmark. In regard to the importation of butter and articles of that description, the Minister for Agriculture should have power to protect the farming interests of this country quite independent of the Board of Trade.

*MR. JASPER MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow) said, the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire was not quite correct in attributing continued opposition to the Committee proposed by the Government on Agricultural Depression, as the right hon. Member for Sleaford, in reply to a question of his, said he would withdraw his opposition on the condition of a more restricted Reference, and he found that other Members who had blocked the Motion consented to do the same. He would ask if the term "depression" was not a misnomer, and if, after the speeches made in the House, the Commission should not be on agricultural distress? He wished to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he would give effect to the Report of the Committee of the House on uniformity of weight? That Committee had reported just when the agricultural meeting in London had come to a close, or he would have been troubled with a deputation. [Mr. H. GARDNER pointed out that this was a matter for the Board of Trade.] He thought it ought to be a matter for the Board of Agriculture, and he hoped the President of the Board of Trade knew that the Chairman of the London County Council had agreed to join a deputation, and he believed the President of the Board of Trade would find the subject congenial to his mind. He felt they owed an acknowledgment to the President of the Board of Agriculture for his attempt to grapple with the fraudulent sales of artificial manures. He was placed in a difficult position between the trader and the farmer. He regretted, however, that the Treasury did not see their way to encourage the Board prosecuting fraudulent sellers, as it was well known the Board of Trade did under the Merchandise Marks Act. The cases might not be exactly similar, but they heard from the remarks on margarine how Acts passed with the best intentions failed, and he thought Bills passed by the House should not be inoperative. The journals of the Royal Agricultural Society were full of cases of fraudulent sales of artificial manures, and regrets that there had been no prosecution. He should like to ask what checks would be placed on the movement of swine under the Swine Fever Bill which came into operation in November? He felt they were indebted to the President of the Board for the interesting leaflets he issued following the precedent of the Board of the last century, and he would suggest the circulation should be increased amongst the members of the local Farmers' Clubs.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH (Bristol, W.): I am not disposed to complain of the President of the Board of Agriculture for having recommended the appointment of a Royal Commission on the question of the depression in agriculture. The right hon. Gentleman and I know how grave is that depression in some parts of England, and I confess myself I could not have discovered, without a great deal of preliminary inquiry, any adequate remedy. I now wish to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to one of the burdens of agriculture, which has already been inquired into by a Royal Commission, and that is the question of tithe rent-charge. The President of the Local Government Board played a very useful and active part as a Member of the Royal Commission which inquired into that subject, and the Commission, which was carefully constituted, and well able to deal with the question, made a unanimous Report nearly two years ago. No one who is aware of the heavy burdens of tithe on agriculture will deny the great importance of the subject. Early in this Session I asked Her Majesty's Government whether they were prepared to introduce a measure on the basis of that Report? I received a sympathetic answer from the First Lord of the Treasury, inviting me to present a Bill; but of course it is impossible for any private Member to attempt satisfactorily to deal with such a subject, and there was an end to the matter. I know the number of subjects which claim the attention of Her Majesty's Government, but this is a matter of real and pressing importance. The right hon. Gentleman has the Report of the Royal Commission signed by one of his own Colleagues, and I believe the Prime Minister himself is favourable to legislation. It is a moment in which legislation might be attempted with great advantage to the tithe-payers, because, the tithe being so low, better terms might be agreed to by the tithe-owners than on other occasions. I wish to press this matter as one which has already been inquired into, and which cannot be put off by referring to the new Commission. When I was President of the Board of Trade there was no one more persistent in his references to this subject than the right hon. Gentleman himself. He was continually insisting on the necessity of the redemption of the tithe rent-charge on fair terms, and continually urging the late Government to bring in a Bill for dealing with the subject. I do press him now to do something to carry out in Office the opinion he held when in Opposition, by taking an early opportunity of submitting to the House, and taking every means in his power of passing into law a measure based upon the Report of the Royal Commission.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire) said that, since the last Debate on the subject, the Papers which had been issued by the Board of Agriculture, so far from convincing them that the President of the Board was right and that they were wrong, seemed rather to strengthen their case. He rose to dispel an illusion which seemed to have got possession of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). The hon. and gallant Gentleman said that this was entirely a question of the ports. Of course, Canadian cattle must be landed at the ports, and the ports, no doubt, reaped the benefit of that; but, on the occasion of the former Debate on this subject, the gallant Gentleman said that those who were against the exclusion of Canadian cattle were largely interested in Shipping Companies.

COLONEL NOLAN: I did not quite say that. On looking over the reports I saw I was so represented, but what I said was "shipping interests," which is quite a different thing.

MR. CROMBIE said, he was glad to obtain that statement from the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and perhaps he (Mr. Crombie) might say that those who were interested in this question—at any rate, he spoke for himself and his hon. Friend (Dr. Farquharson)—had no personal interest whatever in any shipping Company.

COLONEL NOLAN: But your constituents?

MR. CROMBIE: There is no Shipping Company in either of our constituencies, and we are simply advocating the views of our agricultural constituents, and I am perfectly certain we shall not misrepresent them.

*MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) had urged the extreme importance of passing a measure for the redemption of tithes. The tithe as it at present stood—as those acquainted with the subject knew—was based upon corn. If the tithe were redeemed, the redemption would have to be based upon gold—and that at a time when gold was steadily mounting up in value. It would be much better to keep tithes as they were at present, than to attempt their redemption under such circumstances. Some time ago some people were very anxious to have tithe fixed at par; but they had since learned that if they had taken that step, what appeared to them at that time to be likely to be a relief would really have added seriously to their burdens. Tithes were going down now continuously every year; and he hoped that until the currency question was put on a different footing no effort would be made to change the terms from corn to gold.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) observed, that in view of the existence of glanders in London, there was a great objection to allow horses to drink at water troughs in the streets; and if the Board of Agriculture could do anything in the matter their action would be welcome. With regard to the importation of Canadian cattle, the change seemed to be that our Canadian friends desired to relax the restrictions with regard to disease. That was not so. All that was asked was that there should be inquiry, and as many eminent medical men in Canada said that there was neither tuberculosis nor pleuro-pneumonia there, it was only right that all doubt on the subject should be removed by investigation. With regard to the dairy question, that was a matter for the Local Authorities; and if the law were carried out properly the Local Authorities and Magistrates ought to put a stop to adulteration, and we ought to encourage the production of these articles in this country. As to the delay in appointing a Committee to consider this depression in agriculture—it was due entirely to the opposition of the Tory Party.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think this matter is not in Order on this Vote.

MR. A. C. MORTON would not pursue the matter further. In regard to the Small Holdings Act and the Allotment Acts, the Liberal Party, at any rate, without regard to any Commission—

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member will find that the Board of Agriculture has nothing to do with either Acts, and, that being so, of course it is not open on this Vote to discuss them.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he should have liked to have obtained some information as to the working of these Acts. Another matter he should have wished to mention was the reclamation of slob lands in tidal rivers. He contended that the Department over which the right hon. Gentleman presided was of as much interest to towns or cities as to agricultural districts, and, indeed, more so, because the towns were being flooded with labourers who could not find work in the country because of the land not being properly cultivated. He would urge the President of the Board of Agriculture to obtain powers which would enable him to assist as much as possible the cultivation of the land of this country by the tillers of the soil.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I have no reason to complain of the discussion which has taken place this afternoon, and

I must thank very warmly right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite for the kind words they have been good enough to say not only upon this but upon other occasions as to the administration of my Department since I came into Office. I can assure them and the Committee that it has been a great encouragement to me to receive these congratulations since I assumed an Office which I accepted with great diffidence. The right hon. Gentleman who initiated this Debate referred at some length to the appointment of the Agricultural Committee, which has since also been spoken of by other Members. But with all deference to the Committee, I think it is hardly necessary I should go into the disputed points in regard to it, because that Committee is defunct. We have appointed a Royal Commission, on which we shall have the assistance of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, so that the Royal Commission will certainly be a non-Party one, and ought to receive the confidence of every member of the agricultural community. The right hon. Member for Thanet was somewhat critical with regard to the Commission. He wished to know why it was we wished to appoint a Commission at all, and how it was that with the very valuable officers—whose advice I gladly recognise—at my disposal, the Government thought it necessary to propose a Royal Commission to the House? Sir, there are subjects—as I ventured to point out while the right hon. Gentleman was speaking—which the Royal Commission no doubt will inquire into with the assent of the agricultural interest of the country which do not come under the purview of my Department. Though we trust there may be no great discussion in that Commission on such subjects as bimetallism and Preferential Duties, still by our terms of Reference we have not excluded any discussion of these subjects. I was asked a question as to the burdens on land. The questions of local taxation and of burdens on land are, I know, subjects of interest to the agricultural community; but they do not lie absolutely in my Department, and I am certain it will be to the advantage of the agricultural interest generally that these subjects should be discussed by a Commission which, I venture to think, has the thorough confidence of the country in its composition, and which contains amongst its members some experts of the very highest rank, and which will be able to report to the country on this much-vexed and interesting subject generally. Then there was a question put to me, which I may answer at once, with regard to the Agricultural Holdings Act. I had the honour in the Debate on the Address, on behalf of the Government, to say that though we were very favourable to legislation to reform the Agricultural Holdings Act, we did not wish to take that responsibility until the subject had received preliminary inquiry. That view had the approval of the right hon. Member for Sleaford and the Conservative Party generally, and it is to the Royal Commission, which is so admirably constituted to inquire into this matter, that we look for some advice on the subject. I do not think it necessary for me to go very much further into the subject of the Royal Commission, and I will endeavour to answer as briefly as possible the questions put to me from various quarters of the House. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Commander Bethell) drew the attention of the Committee—and I think very rightly—to the great value of scientific education in agriculture, and he referred to what foreign countries did in that respect. I have often said that I thoroughly recognise the advantage of scientific education as bearing on the prosperity of the farming interest, but I do not, on the other hand, quite lend myself so much to centralisation, as I fancy the hon. and gallant Gentleman seems to wish. It has always been the boast of this country, and especially with regard to the agricultural interest, that private enterprise has done wonders with regard to the farming interests generally in all parts of it. I need only refer to the experimental work done by Sir John Lawes at Rochester, by Sir John Gilbey, and by the Duke of Bedford at Rothamstead. I am happy to say that by permission of the Treasury the Department has been able to buy a number of copies of the records of the excellent work at Rothamstead, which will be distributed to the various Bodies having to do with agricultural education. That is a good step on our part in the right direction, and that, I think, in some way answers the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The vexed question of closing the ports to Canadian cattle and kindred other questions have occupied the attention of the House at some length during this Session. I can only say that while I thoroughly recognise that the desire of those hon. Members who wish to see the present restrictions removed is to benefit Scotch farmers by the introduction of Canadian store cattle, at the same time, I am bound to say I feel it necessary to adhere to the decision I announced on a previous occasion. I am bound to rely on those three eminent men given me by the country as veterinary advisers to the Board of Agriculture, and to their opinion I am certainly resolved to adhere. I should be absolutely rash if on such technical subjects as these I were to over-ride the opinions of three of the best experts this country can produce. Indeed, if I adopted such a course I should not be fit to hold the Office I have the honour to hold. My hon. Friend talks about an inquiry, which I admit, as put forward by him and others, has a plausible appearance. I remind the Committee that I have in no way shut the door with regard to this question of Canadian cattle. The whole question turns upon the difficulty of examination. That is as far as I can go; but I will, of course, be glad to have any communication from the Canadian Government on the subject. Now I come to the question of glanders. In answer to the hon. Member for North St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton), there are only two courses open to us—either to go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or else allow the County Council to take the matter into their own hands and pay compensation. The hon. Member is aware that the disease is one chiefly confined to the Metropolitan area, and I think will see that it would hardly be fair to impose general charges in reference to a matter which is purely local. On the other hand, how are we to compel the County Council to pay for putting down the disease when they, as the representatives of the rate-payers, do not feel called upon to act for this purpose? At the same time, I am glad to say the number of outbreaks has been less in the present year than last year, and, so far as I can see, there is a distinct improvement in the last two years. The cases reported—the fresh outbreaks—are 973, whereas the number last year was 1,106. He will be glad to know that in comparison with other years there is a decrease in the number of cases of glanders. Well, as to the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan), I have to say that the Act is about to receive assent, and it will be administered by the Local Bodies in the same way as the Pleuro-Pneumonia Act is carried out. I do not know how the authorities in Ireland are guided in that respect, but I presume they will act on the same principle. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), the question is not one for my Department; it is one of general administration—of general policy—upon which I do not feel justified in expressing an opinion.

MR. HANBURY asked, was it a fact that the hon. Gentleman had no power to protect them in the way indicated?

MR. H. GARDNER: I think I may say that I am always glad to use my influence to the best advantage in dealing with these matters. I have, at any rate, tried to use my influence in the past as best I could. As to the question of weights and measures, it is a question for the Board of Trade. I am glad to hear the testimony paid by the hon. Member to the value of the pamphlets published by the Department, and the answers to questions in connection with Secretaries of Agricultural Societies and labourers throughout the country. In answer to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks-Beach), who put a question with regard to tithe-rent charge, I refer him to a previous reply on the matter, in which it was stated that there was no hope of bringing in any legislation this Session. Speaking, so far as I am concerned with the Department, I think I may say that we are most anxious to deal with this matter as speedily as possible. Well, Sir, I think I have answered all the questions put to me, and, thanking the Committee once more for the attention with which I have been listened to, I venture to ask the Committee now to allow this Vote to pass.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he would ask whether there were any Returns as to small holdings under the Act passed last year, also as to labourers' allotments, which are understood to be increasing fast? They had an item on the Paper for a salary of £700 for a Director of Statistical Intelligence. They should have some information regarding that. Also there were three items under sub-heads of this Vote for agricultural education. He presumed it did not relate to the higher branches of instruction, but dealt with elementary branches, which were very backward.

MR. H. GARDNER said, the Department was specially debarred from dealing with education in those schools. If the hon. Baronet would refer to the Paper, he would see that this had nothing to do with elementary schools. The Returns asked for by the hon. Baronet had reached him, and he would have them laid before the House.

*SIR R. TEMPLE said, they should have more information as to the duty done for a salary of £700.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he did not expect the right hon. Gentleman to say much in reply to his question as to tithe-rent. On the question of Returns, he would point out that it was very difficult to get such Returns in adequate time, and he thought they should have some remedy for that state of things.

MAJOR JONES (Carmarthen, &c.), who was very indistinctly heard, was understood to ask a question in relation to an expenditure of £300, and also as to what had been done in relation to Welsh claims on the Department?

MR. H. GARDNER said he would be glad to give his consideration to the matter raised by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks-Beach). He would also be glad to consider Welsh claims, as he recognised the good work done by the College at Aberystwith.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he thought it was distinctly incumbent upon him to say a few words dealing with this question, and he was all the more ready to do so since, as having no practical knowledge of agriculture, he was on an exact par with the President of the Board of Agriculture himself. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that he had no power to deal with some of the most important matters in relation to agriculture—adulteration, for instance, which he said he had no power to prevent—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

Sir R. Temple

The Committee divided :—Ayes 110 ; Noes 24.—(Division List, No. 299.)

Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present ; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough) moved to reduce the salary of the Chief Commissioner by £500, in order to draw attention to the administration of the Department. The traditional policy seemed to him to be that in the event of anyone going to the Department with a complaint of what he regarded as mal-administration of justice, they endeavoured, if possible, to choke him off, and utterly disregarded any complaints he might make. He complained that there was no adequate supervision exercised by the Charity Commissioners over the Trustees of the various Charities of the country, or over the accounts which they presented. In one case in the Harborough Division the Charity Commissioners had permitted the Trustees of a Charity to neglect sending in an account for two years, and then the account was of the most meagre character. Another case was the following : In March, 1892, a meeting was held in the village in which he resided relating to the administration of a Charity known as the Hanbury Charity. At a public meeting a resolution was passed asking the Charity Commissioners to inquire into the system of education provided under this Charity ; and although an inquiry was held in May, 1892, the draft scheme was not published until June, 1893. When they would get the scheme into operation Heaven only knew ! Meantime, the children in the village were suffering. Moreover, the Charity Commissioners were out of sympathy with the masses of the people in the villages. They did not act in accordance with the spirit of the age. In the new scheme to which he had alluded there was a clause to the effect that the new Trustees should be elected at a Vestry meeting held under the monstrous system of the old cumulative vote instead of "One Man One Vote," the principle which had been adopted in the Local Government Bill. It was high time there was an inquiry into the administration of the Charity Commissioners. He claimed that the poor people in our villages were entitled to at least as great consideration as regarded the time of the House as were the inhabitants of Siam, the Bahamas, or other places.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, he believed that there was no body of men who did their duty with more entire self-devotion or with a more enlightened view than the Charity Commissioners did. He served some years ago upon a Committee which inquired carefully into these matters, and the result was eminently satisfactory to those who had confidence—as he had—in their action. He did not believe that any persons were strangled with red tape. He did not know what was the nature of the case to which reference had been made; but he did know that sometimes when schemes had been delayed it was from the desire of the Commissioners to meet the wishes of all parties interested, and so to devise a scheme which would be generally acceptable. He congratulated the Commissioners upon the fact that there was no claim this year for the City Parochial Charities. If the Commissioners had done no other work than that of carrying out the Parochial Charities Act for London they would have deserved well of their country. He was sure that all who took an interest in the cause of technical education, and desired to see the advance of useful education in the Metropolis, would be deeply grateful to the Commissioners for the part which they had taken. He rejoiced that they had seen their way to modify the scheme for St. Paul's School. He saw the first scheme with great regret, and was glad that such a modification had been made as would at once continue the work of that great school, and at the same time found another school to supply a want. It would be satisfactory to the Committee, he thought, if some account were given of the present position of Christ's Hospital. That was a scheme of the most gigantic character, and it was a great achievement to carry it into law; but they had not heard much of the operation of the scheme during the last 12 months. He felt great regret on reading the scheme of the Commissioners respecting Merionethshire, believing that some portions of it were not in accordance with the enlightened feeling of the age as regarded religious instruction. He thought that the restrictions imposed upon Welsh boarding schools, under the Welsh schemes, in respect of religious education by the Commissioners were not in accordance with the spirit of the times, and he was sure they were contrary to the general principles of religious freedom. He hoped that in any future scheme a more liberal and enlightened view would be taken of the matter, and that the pupils in these schools would be permitted to receive instruction according to the principles of the denomination in the faith of which their parents desired them to be brought up. He was grateful to the Commissioners for the action they had taken in respect of the large endowed schools, but thought they might with advantage abstain from interfering with some of the minor schools, which were doing good work in their way, and whose operations were acceptable to the inhabitants of the villages in which they were situated. He felt reluctant to make remarks of an adverse character concerning the action of the Commissioners in some particulars, and had only done so because he believed that thereby their popularity and efficiency would be increased.

*MR. BENSON (Oxfordshire, Woodstock) said, he would like to know whether the Commissioners had done anything to remedy the insufficiency of their staff to deal with accounts sent in from Endowed Charities? It seemed to him it would be well if the Charity Commission would insist that proper accounts were sent in from every Endowed Charity. It would be a useful check on Trustees who were inclined to be careless, and it would help the Commissioners to see how their schemes were being carried out. He could confirm what had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, that in some cases the accounts were not sent in at all, and in others they were of the slightest and most unsatisfactory character; and he wished, in conclusion, to bear testimony to the invariable courtesy with which the Commissioners furnished information, or considered any matter brought before them.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley), said, he was as opposed as ever to the policy of the Charity Commissioners, which policy, he believed, bore heavily on the poorer classes of the country. He was not forgetful of the good work the Commissioners were doing, but Trustees of Charities in a large number of cases were afraid to go to the Commissioners for advice and assistance in carrying out reforms, because they at once took the endowments out of the hands of the Trustees, and would only accept a cut-and-dried scheme in respect of such Charities. In the matter of accounts, he believed the Charity Commissioners during the time they had been in existence had been the means of saving hundreds of Charities that would otherwise have been lost. He agreed that in many cases they were not as strict as they ought to be; but seeing the thousands of accounts they had throughout the country, some allowance ought to be made. Those most concerned were the children of the gutter, and it was for them he (Mr. Jesse Collings) would plead. The Charity Commission was a Department of State, dealing with enormous interests and an enormous amount of money. He believed there was no instance outside Russia of a Department of the State so much beyond the control of the Legislature as the Charity Commissioners. They did what they liked, and were practically irresponsible to this House. But the discussion of their policy in the House created public opinion, which was reflected on the recent schemes of the Charity Commissioners, which of recent years had been more what they ought to be. Besides having charge of the administration of Charities they were a Judicial Body. By this fact great expense to the Charities was saved, but their proceedings should be made public and their decisions open to appeal of some kind. Every one of the schemes of the Commissioners should be laid on the Table of the House, and be available for reference in the Library. During the past year 209 schemes were dealt with by the Commissioners, and the House knew nothing about them—certainly not 5 per cent. of them had been laid on the Table. They should also, every Session, be referred to a Select Committee of the House, which might examine them, hear objections, and modify the schemes, or send them back to the Commissioners for modification. Questions as to the enclosure of commons had been dealt with in this way, and he hoped they would have an assurance on the point. With regard to the last Report of the Commissioners, there was a great improvement on the tone of the last 30 years. It was more humane in character, recognising that there were human beings with human wants and sufferings, and was not the high and mighty falutin document the Report of the Commissioners used to be. For this reason,—for the reason that the Commissioners were beginning to realise what was owing to the poor—he was glad to welcome this Report. They acknowledged that there was no point to which their attention was more constantly devoted than the improved application of funds distributed in precarious and isolated gifts to the poor, whether in money or in kind—in other words, in “doles.” This was a point upon which it was said public opinion was unanimous. The Charities left to the poor might be changed in form, but they should be kept sacredly the property of the poor as much as any other property. Doles were included in the list of purposes enumerated in Section 30 of the Endowed Schools Act of 1869, and it was to them that the Act of 1882 applied. But some people appeared to think that, because elementary education was now being given, the poorer classes ought to be deprived of all their endowments. In his view those endowments still belonged to the poor, and ought to be applied for their benefit. The truth was, that the country owed millions to the poor; and if all the endowments for their benefit were applied according to the wishes of the donors, the fund that would be obtained would go a long way towards solving the question of old-age pensions in rural districts. They spoke of a few cases in the Report. The Charity Commissioners seemed to think that because since 1870 public elementary education had been supported out of the rates the poor in the rural districts did not need further educational facilities, and Charities were diverted to the purpose of higher education, of which the classes higher in the social scale reaped the benefit. But he reminded them that the poor paid their share of the cost of public elementary education. He also complained of the unwise interference of the Charity Commissioners in other matters. He must protest against the action of the Commissioners. There was no distinction between doles and education, and it was not fair that there should be any distinction where the interests of the poorer classes were concerned. He took the case of the Craddock Wills Charity at Cardiff, bequest dating back to 1710, and he would refer the Government to the terms of the bequest. They had it shown them that the advantages were to go to the "poor boys of Cardiff." In the year 1821 the Master of the Rolls solemnly re-dedicated the property to the poor children of the borough—reading and writing books, &c., and to the sending forth of these poor children in life either by apprenticing, purchasing clothing, or otherwise. In 1889 the Commission brought in another scheme which at one sweep took away the property of the poor, converting the endowments to the purpose of higher education. The income was £1,500 per annum; about half was to go for the general purposes of University College, Cardiff, and in return the College was to give 15 Exhibitions of £20 each, and Scholarships in elementary schools amounting to £200, the remainder to accumulate for the purpose of middle-class education. For years past the £200 had been provided, and 104 Scholarships had been provided. Of these, about seven might be regarded as going to children of the poor, the remainder being taken by children of skilled artizans, sea captains, tradesmen, engineers, and accountants. That was a scheme that they could not endorse.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in entering into these details.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, his observations were intended to show the character of the schemes to which he objected. His contention was that the result of the schemes of the Charity Commissioners was to deprive the poor of their means of education in order to endow the middle and wealthier classes. He did not desire to say a word against high or middle-class education. He only objected to the endowment of high and middle-class education being carried out on the heritage of the poor. The Charity Commissioners had now before them a scheme dealing with the Blue Coat School at Birmingham. That school had been in existence for generations. When the authorities of the school wished to enlarge their work they laid a scheme before the Charity Commissioners; but the Charity Commissioners took the whole matter in hand, and sent down a new scheme, the effect of which was to put an end to the beneficent education in the school. In their scheme the Charity Commissioners said that the number of children in the Blue Coat School should not exceed the number of children then in the school, and that the surplus income should be devoted to higher education. He could not conceive a more unwarrantable interference with the rights of the poor. With a great struggle and fight the people of Birmingham had got their concession; but if this injustice had been attempted in a village where there were no men to take it up and conquer the Charity Commissioners, and make them ashamed of what they were doing, the scheme would have been adopted, and the poor would have been deprived for all time of that which was as much their property as his property belonged to him. There was another scheme of the Charity Commissioners of which he had to complain, that of Sutton Coldfield. There was a Charity for nursing and clothing sick men of £40,000 capitalised value. By the scheme which had been forced on the people the Charity Commissioners took at one swoop £15,000 in order to endow a grammar school.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that this has nothing to do with this Vote.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, that with all respect to the Chairman it would be seen that his observations were in Order. There was another scheme by which the Charity Commissioners proposed to take £17,000 more in order to establish a high school for girls. In Birmingham lawyers and other benevolent men had taken the side of the poor, and called themselves the Poor Defence Committee, and by their exertions they had got the Charity Commissioners to suspend this second scheme. He would ask his hon. Friend whether they were to consider that that scheme had been definitely abandoned? It had been hanging like a nightmare over the poor of Sutton Coldfield for several years, and as there was a doubt as to what had become of it, he hoped his hon. Friend would give him some information about it. It was said that Scholarships had been established for full equivalent for privileges and advantages which had been taken from the poor people. He considered that the only thing done by these schools was to swell the ranks of the so-called educated unemployed. The result of the work of the Charity Commissioners was that if an advertisement for a position of £150 a year was published, there would be hundreds of applications from University men, Exhibition holders, and men who had gained Scholarships. The effect of such education was to degrade labour, because it taught the child to escape out of the ranks of labour and get a black coat for itself. The old idea of culture and the development of personal qualities, the old idea of making a man develop up to the full end of his capacity, would never be obtained by this machine sort of education as laid down in these schemes. He was quite willing that advantages should be given to clever children; but under any scheme clever children would come to the front, and he believed that if they were to do away with all these Exhibitions, education would benefit, society would benefit, and a large amount of misery would be avoided. He saw an article in a newspaper the other day on advertisements which appeared in The Lancet, from which it appeared that well qualified doctors could be got for £40 to £50 a year, or at any price. There was also a small article in The Saturday Review a short time ago which illustrated the policy of the Charity Commissioners more than anything he could say. It stated that the unhappy crowding of the market for brain labourers, and the thousands of miserable, hopeless failures, were due to the system pursued by the Charity Commissioners. He had very little hope of getting any reformation in the present system of education from the Members of the present Government. When he brought the subject on some time ago he was accused by the President of the Board of Trade as an old Tory wasting the time of the House, and he was told that there was nothing like Scholarships. He had also little trust in the Vice President of the Council, as he was a Charity Commissioner.

MR. ACLAND: I am not.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, the right hon. Gentleman, if he was not, ought to be a Charity Commissioner. His point was, that if there was to be higher and middle-class education—and he had no objection to it—the cost of it should not be taken out of the heritage of the poor.

*THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire) said, he could not follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley over the wide field he had traversed. The right hon. Gentleman had brought charges against the Charity Commissioners, and had delivered what was, no doubt, a very interesting impeachment of the National system of education. But that was not the time for entering into the merits or demerits of the system of National Education, and he would simply deal with the specific points relating to the working of the Charity Commission which had been brought under his notice. Three points had been made clear in the Debate: The first was that the Commissioners were always willing and anxious to give any information which anyone entitled to it desired to obtain. It had also been acknowledged that there had been a distinct improvement in the schemes of the last few years in the way of giving larger representation to the ratepayers and the Local Authorities; thirdly, that the Reports of the Commissioners were increasing in importance and interest every year; and that the Report of this year was worthy of the highest commendation. The chief practical criticism passed upon this Vote to-day related directly and indirectly to the production of Reports of Accounts. But he would like to point out that the Reports of Charities numbered close on 50,000, and that it must be apparent how difficult it was for any Central Authority to direct attention to and supervise the details of these 50,000 Reports. He thought it was the duty, and certainly the interest, of every Local Authority in each case to direct attention to the Accounts of Charities.

Mr. Jesse Collings

If a Report was not made of a particular Charity any inhabitant in the parish might apply to the Charity Commission to produce one. If in the course of the year the Local Government Bill passed, the complaints that had been made that afternoon would become practically impossible. He trusted that as soon as Councils in parishes and rural districts were set up one of the very first results would be that a direct interest would be taken in these Reports and in the administration of Charities. The Commissioners were doing their utmost to meet the demands made with regard to the publication of the Reports. In the County of Denbigh a most admirable volume of Reports for each parish was now published, and the London County Council and the County Council of the West Riding had applied for a similar publication. Not merely would the old Reports be reprinted, but additions would be made bringing all the information up to date, and he trusted that in a few years' time the work would be done for every county in England and Wales. The delay in the publication of the schemes in regard to the local Charities to which his hon. Friend the Member for the Harborough Division had referred was due to the simple reason that there were two sides to every question, and contending views and methods required consideration. The first duty of the Charity Commissioners was to consider the representations made by parties interested in these Trusts; and they dealt with the matter with the greatest care, which was far better than rushing a scheme through without giving it full and ample consideration. With regard to the complaint of his hon. Friend, that the poorer residents in a parish had little voice in the election of the representatives of the ratepayers, he was glad to say that in the scheme to which his hon. Friend had referred, and he trusted that, for the future, practically in all the schemes of the Charity Commissioners, the representatives of the ratepayers would be elected on the popular principle of One Man One Vote. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley had entered at considerable length into the policy of the endowed schools. This policy had been pursued by the Charity Commissioners under Statutes passed by the House. He should, on another occasion, be happy to argue the matter out with the right hon. Gentleman. This alone he would say with regard to the Craddock Wells Charity to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred—that the Exhibitions were largely, or almost altogether, enjoyed by the children of the working classes. He was sure that there were not more than 15 out of the 150 Scholarships which were not enjoyed by the sons and daughters of the working classes. He would point out that under the very scheme to which the right hon. Gentleman referred some of the very poorest boys were receiving not merely an admirable education given by the Board schools, but also a higher grade education. There was one case, that of the son of a Roman Catholic, who had obtained a Scholarship, and he was now one of the brightest scholars in the higher grade school. Another boy, the son of a poor man at work at the docks, won a Scholarship, and he was now in training for the ministry of the English Presbyterian Church. Under the scheme some of the poorest boys and girls in the parish obtained an equal education with the children of the wealthiest capitalist.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: There are only seven of them.

*MR. T. E. ELLIS said, the right hon. Gentleman said there were only seven of them, and he should like the Committee to know the occupations of the parents of these children. From a list he had, he found the parents of some of these children were employed as printers, painters, carpenters, shipwrights, furniture dealers, hawkers—

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I said they were skilled artizans.

*MR. T. E. ELLIS said, that was so; but, still, these men belonged to the working classes, persons who were too poor to give their children a higher education, and some of them were amongst the poorest parents in the whole of Cardiff. The right hon. Gentleman made a further suggestion with regard to the Endowed Schools Schemes, and suggested that every scheme should be placed in the Library and submitted to a Select Committee of this House. Under the Act of 1869 all Endowed Schools Schemes were laid on the Table of the House, but that caused so much delay that under the recommendation of the Committee of 1873 it was modified. If all these schemes were to go before a Select Committee of the House it would very materially add to the work of any Committee, as from 200 to 300 schemes were passed every year, but, of course, it was a matter for Parliament to determine. With regard to placing the schemes in the Library, he might say that this Session a fortnightly list of every published scheme had been placed in the Library, and any scheme could be obtained by any Member on application to the Charity Commissioners. Considering the different Acts of Parliament affecting Charities, and the varied conditions attached to the schemes, he thought that, on the whole, the Charity Commissioners were doing their work to the satisfaction of the House, and he hoped that now, after the varied criticisms that had been made, the Committee would allow them to take the Vote.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) thought his hon. Friend had omitted to reply to one question asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings)—namely, what was to be done with the suspended scheme for Sutton Coldfield?

*MR. T. E. ELLIS said, that scheme, so far as he understood, was disallowed by the right hon. Gentleman who was Vice President of the Committee of Council in the last Government, and it therefore could not be proceeded with by the Charity Commissioners.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That scheme then, at all events, is dead?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: Certainly.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, that was satisfactory; but there was another point his right hon. Friend raised. The hon. Gentleman told them a list of the schemes was put in the Library, but would there be any objection to putting the schemes themselves in the Library? He himself had a great difficulty in finding out what was being done in a great number of the cases, and schemes had been passed simply because the House and the locality was ignorant of what was being done. He admitted that was the fault of the locality; but the hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that when they were dealing with very small Charities it was almost certain they would pass unperceived unless some interested persons brought their minds to bear upon them. He hoped they would have an assurance that the schemes in future would be placed in the Library so that they might examine them. His right hon. Friend had given notice of a reduction of the Vote; and he understood that his right hon. Friend intended to move it, and take a Division upon it, as it was only by an accidental omission that he had failed to move it up to now. Though their numbers were small, it was important to ascertain the views of those present upon the issue raised by his right hon. Friend. They admitted that in some cases great sums, and even the value of the Charity, had been lost owing to the want of supervision, and they therefore thought it was quite right these matters should come under review. They thanked the Commissioners for the way they had saved considerable sums of money that might otherwise be frittered away; but the point was, after they had saved the money, how was the money to be disposed of? He and his friends said it was the private property of the poor of the country, and they said, therefore, if they could show that one single farthing of these Charities, left for the poor, was taken and applied to other purposes than for the benefit of those for whom they were left, it was a robbery of the poor. That was the position which they took up. The hon. Gentleman told them that a certain number of the Scholarships given had been obtained by the poor. He did not deny it, and, so far as that was the case, it was a good answer; but would the hon. Gentleman pretend to say that of the £1,500 that belonged to the poor in connection with Craddock Wells Charity the whole of that now belonged to the poor? If anyone outside the class for whom the Foundation was intended received any benefit, to that extent the poor had been deprived of benefit. In the case of the Craddock Wells Charity, half of it was taken to establish a higher class school, so that there was only a partial recognition of the claims of the poor; and what they wanted to establish, and what they asked the House to vote for to-day, was that the property of the poor should be as sacred as if it were the property of the rich. The answer of the hon. Gentleman was that it was a question of Statute. He quite admitted that new legislation was required in order to effect completely what they desired; but did the hon. Member deny that if to-day, by a considerable majority, they could establish that, so far as the wishes and desires of the Committee were concerned, the property of the poor should be sacred, that that would not have the greatest effect on the proceedings of the Charity Commissioners? It was true the Charity Commissioners were an independent Body, who, time after time and year after year, went on confiscating the property of the poor, and until he and his friends got a majority in the House to support them it would continue. If this afternoon they could get a majority to give a decision in favour of that principle he was certain they would find that future schemes would be very different.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) said, that on the point of principle he did not differ from the right hon. Gentleman. His opinion was that if the Charities left to the poor were not applicable to the present state of things, then any change that was made ought to have entire regard to the class of the community for whom the Charity was left. That was the principle he had held for many years; and though he had no doubt the Charity Commissioners had acted from the best of motives, he thought it was a mistaken policy; that very often these donations, intended for the poorer classes, had been diverted to other, and what were considered more elevated, objects; but that was undoubtedly a social and political mistake. He entirely concurred with that view of the subject, and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman and others, in calling attention to this matter, had had a very great effect on the Charity Commissioners in leading their mind to regard the question from that point of view. If, for instance, doles had been left for bread and beer, that was not the best way of using the Charity; but the Charity ought to go to those for whom the bread and beer was intended, and not to other classes—for the teaching of the globes and such purposes. That was a principle on which they would all agree; but what he asked his right hon. Friend to consider was that the cases that had been alluded to were not recent cases.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, they are.

SIR W. HARCOURT was assured that not one of them came within the present Administration.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said, the Blue Coat School and Sutton Coldfield School were recent, and the Blue Coat School was still open.

*MR. T. E. ELLIS said, that the Blue Coat School would be, as before, for necessitous orphans.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, the scheme was a living scheme, though it had been modified.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, that even the modified scheme took away from the poor inhabitants some of the advantages the Charity conferred.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he was informed that that was not the case, but, at all events, he hoped his right hon. Friend and others would be satisfied with the declaration he had made. They accepted the principle altogether, and, according to his observation and knowledge, recent schemes had accommodated themselves to that principle much more than they did some years ago, and, therefore, he hoped the Committee would be satisfied with the discussion that had taken place. The principle was one that was accepted by the Government, and they were prepared to act upon it so far as they had any influence in the matter.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That £16,674 be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS rose, when—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

MR. A. CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): I rise to Order. Is the right hon. Gentleman entitled to move that Motion at the conclusion of a speech from a Minister?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: On the point of Order, I ask whether it has not already been ruled from the Chair that a Minister of the Crown is not entitled to move the Closure after the speech of a Minister?

THE CHAIRMAN: I heard what was said—that a long speech before the Closure was moved ought to be deprecated, but that is not the case here. The Motion is perfectly in Order.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 113; Noes 29.—(Division List, No. 300.)

Question put accordingly, "That £16,674 be granted for the said Service."

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I rise to Order, Sir; the doors are open.

THE CHAIRMAN then directed strangers to withdraw, and, after the usual interval, the Question was again put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 110.—(Division List, No. 301.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer claimed, "That the Original Question be now put."

Original Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

3. £25,853, to complete the sum for Civil Service Commission.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) had only a few words to say on this Vote, principally in connection with an officer called the Senior Assistant Examiner. This gentleman was drawing an excellent salary of £900 a year; but, according to a note in the Estimates, he was to receive an additional sum, the amount of which would be stated in the Appropriation Account. That in itself was objectionable, but he had a further objection to urge with regard to this official, who was an Army examiner. The complaint made against these Army examiners was that, in the first place, the papers set varied so much from year to year that a candidate had no idea of the scope of the examination to which he had to submit himself. This complaint arose principally in regard to mathematics. The papers varied so much, and were set on such totally different principles, that it was absolutely impossible for candidates or those who trained them to have even a general knowledge of the paper that would be set; therefore, it became a mere chance. It was not the most meritorious person who succeeded, as it depended entirely on the kind of paper the particular examiner chose to set. The difficulty about it was this—that the Committee never knew who these examiners were, and, therefore, those who were subjected to this kind of examination were unable to obtain any kind of redress, and it was difficult to attack them upon this Vote because the Civil Service Commissioners, afforded them no idea who these gentlemen were. He thought the Secretary of State for War would agree with him that this was a real grievance. Again, it was technically wrong to say of a Senior Assistant Examiner—"We cannot tell you beforehand what is to be paid to this gentleman, but it will all come in the Appropriation Account." These things ought to be stated plainly on the Estimates, and they ought to know what was going to be paid. It was also grossly unfair that these examination papers and the manner in which the examination was conducted varied entirely year by year.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston), in continuation of what had been said by the Member for Preston, said, he also had received several letters complaining about the examination papers, particularly the mathematical papers. The letters went into detail to such an extent that he thought the Committee would hardly be able to cope with them, but he wished to state in general terms there was very great dissatisfaction at the manner in which the examinations were conducted, especially with regard to the uncertain character of the papers : one set of questions one year and a very different set another year ; one set very difficult and another year very much easier, introducing an element of uncertainty into the competition. He presumed the Civil Service Commission exercised a general supervision over the examiners ; but when complaints were publicly and generally made, it became the duty of Members of this House to draw the attention of Her Majesty's Government to them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) said, he rose to make an observation on this Vote, mainly because he thought he should have one sympathetic auditor in the person of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The right hon. Gentleman gave them the other day an account of certain alterations he was making in the examinations of Factory Inspectors under the Home Office. The whole tendency and course of his administration apparently was to diminish the weight which was at present unfortunately given in our public examinations to special subjects. He recollected that in the course of his speech the right hon. Gentleman said the weight attached to correct spelling in all our public examinations was wholly ridiculous and wholly indefensible. The system of selection by public examination was one that was absolutely necessary ; it was the necessary alternative of the other system of patronage which used to prevail, and which had one objection that was overwhelming. It made the life of the Minister who had to give the patronage absolutely intolerable ; therefore, out of pity to unfortunate gentlemen sitting on the Front Bench, he should never advocate even the smallest return to the ancient system under which places of trust were filled up. But they must all admit that while examination was a capable machinery for selecting men to fill appointments in the Public Service and removed any suspicion of jobbery, he did not believe that examination did much in excluding unfit men or including the fit men. He had come across, during his experience, numberless examples of men who would have made excellent soldiers and have done excellent service to the country, but who, through some defect more of the eye than anything else, had not acquired the art of spelling. As everyone knew, the English language was supplied with no rule, and spelling supplied no test of intellectual capacity whatever, nevertheless the Civil Service Commissioners had constantly kept out these unfortunate men, and made them go through hours of dictation in order to get through the examination, a process which must have been a sheer waste of time. He did not know what Army coaches thought about it, but he was certain there was nothing that so disgusted pupils or degraded the whole subject of examination as the habit of teaching perfectly arbitrary symbols of unusual words. He hoped that so far as the Government could exercise any influence they would exercise it in the direction of broadening the scope of the examination—that they would not make it more difficult, but would make it a better test of intellectual ability and capacity.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) was not disposed to follow the right hon. Gentleman, who, as he understood, did not view with any favour the system of competitive examinations for entrance into the Public Service, and did not desire it should be a test of the accuracy of the education which the candidates had received. They must have competitive examination in some way, the object, so far as the Army was concerned, being to test those who appeared as candidates to ascertain whether they had received the ordinary average education of a young man of their age, but whether they followed the best course in applying that test he could not say. He was not sure that it was the best course so far as the Army was concerned, and within the last couple of months he had appointed a Committee, on which several Members of Parliament and one of the Civil Service Commissioners had a seat, to inquire into the examinations now held for admission to the Army. Undoubtedly the system had been allowed, if he might say so, to stumble along for many years without any fixed principle being laid down. As at present conducted, he did not say whether it was open to objection or whether it was not, but he thought it was time to have an examination into the subject to see how far these examinations could be made to fulfil, better perhaps than they did now, their proper functions, which were, as he had said, to test the education of young men who offered themselves as candidates. The right hon. Gentleman said he had met many a young man who would have made a splendid soldier, but was excluded for defective spelling. But no doubt the right hon. Gentleman had met many young men equally likely to make splendid soldiers who were able at the age of 17 or 18 years of age to spell correctly, and, notwithstanding the authority of the right hon. Gentleman, he would prefer the one who could spell to the one who could not. He believed it was a decided advantage to spell correctly, and he could go further and say that he thought reading and writing a useful accomplishment. He joined issue with the right hon. Gentleman, and believed they could combine the highest soldierly qualities, or any other, with a thorough, sound, and general education. Now he came to the point raised by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) and the hon. Member for Kingston (Sir R. Temple), who stated that the papers set for the examination varied so much, especially in mathematics, that no one knew what sort of questions were going to be asked. The Committee would hardly believe that all the correspondence received by the hon. Member had reference to one particular case for entrance to the Staff College not long ago. The gentleman who had been in the habit of examining in mathematics died, and it was necessary to appoint a successor. The successor had a different system of examination, and set papers a good deal higher than had been the case in previous years. For his part he differed from the hon. Member, for he did not think it was desirable that the papers should be almost identical; if they were to act as a test at all a little variety might perhaps be admitted. In this case he had satisfied himself there was a very substantial grievance on the part of those who entered as candidates, especially as it was a subject on which they had to obtain a certain number of marks to qualify. This was the crux of the complaint, and with the view of meeting this the Civil Service Commissioners very generously reduced the number of qualifying marks, so that in reality the difficulty of obtaining qualifying marks on that occasion was the same as that which prevailed in previous years, and in that way any grievance that existed had been removed. With regard to the question raised as to the salary of the Senior Assistant Examiner he must say he was not aware of it, and the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury, he believed, had not before been called to it; but now that attention had been called to it his right hon. Friend would ascertain if there was any substantial reason for so apparently anomalous a way of recompensing a public servant, and if there was no such reason it would be rectified for the future.

MR. HANBURY said, the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood him if he thought, as he seemed to have thought from his remarks, that he (Mr. Hanbury) objected to the examination papers varying from year to year. Of course, they must vary, but what he objected to was that last year a much higher paper was set in mathematics than had been set in previous years, and the right hon. Gentleman admitted that that constituted a real grievance. What he was contending for was that the same standard should be adopted from year to year—that there should not be a great jump upwards in any particular year as was the case last year, especially as these were qualifying examinations. When this happened it was hard on the candidates, and what he wanted to secure was that when the Civil Service Commissioners appointed a new examiner they should have some guarantee that the standard should not be raised. He should like to get from the right hon. Gentleman whether the gentleman who had occasioned all this trouble was to be the examiner in future; and, if so, whether the Civil Service Commissioners would see that the papers were more fairly set. He understood this man was at the beginning of his career as an Army Examiner, and unless some check was put on they would have the same kind of grievance another year.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN admitted that the standard was a little high, but perhaps the examiner had an entire misconception of the power of these candidates to answer questions. There was no reason to suppose he would repeat the incident.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) trusted the Committee would not be drawn by the answer of the right hon. Gentleman into a prolonged discussion as to the merits of competitive examinations. His opinion was that spelling had been created into a fetish, and though no one could object to competitive examinations, they did object to their being so purely, so entirely, and so exclusively literary. An examination in horsemanship and swordsmanship he thought would be far more effective. But he rose in order to follow up and reinforce the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), as to the Senior Assistant Examiner. This was one of his traditional foes. He was a pluralist, and they did not know what his second salary was, though he understood the matter would be looked into by the Secretary to the Treasury. But there was a much larger matter arising out of the Vote. The whole Vote was for £40,000, and he found that a third of the Vote—represented by the sum of £13,800, with trimmings that were not stated—was paid to assistant examiners. Now, who these assistant examiners were, what their names were, what were their numbers, or what were their duties they were not told; there was not a word mentioned about any one of them. How could the Committee be justified in voting so large a sum to purely anonymous persons? In a former part of the Vote the name of a humble charwoman was given, and he could not understand the justification of voting £13,000 without knowing who was to get it. There was a danger in omitting names. It was a reproach, he believed, justly addressed to the system of competitive examination that it had bred a number of "crammers," whose business it was to fill young men with a certain amount of knowledge which they immediately afterwards lost altogether. In order to avoid the very great danger of these crammers coming into undesirable contact with the examiners, it was essential that the latter should be men of character, and men whose names were published. The Committee ought to know who the examiners were, or, at least, how many of them there were, and what salaries they got. Another objection he had to the Vote was that part of it went in grants to existing public servants, not one of whom was named. What a vista of pluralism this opened up. He trusted that the Secretary to the Treasury would, at least, state how the Vote was allocated, and what each salary amounted to.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool Scotland) remarked that the manner in which Civil Service examinations were conducted was a subject which interested tens of thousands of young men who had no capital and no means or position except those which were awarded to them by their ability and knowledge. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had been right in putting in a general objection to the too prudent superstition, which was borrowed, to a certain extent, from the example of China, that competitive examination was to be regarded as the best means of finding out the talents of those who were examined. He thought, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had not been quite happy in the subject he had selected. It was quite evident that men in all classes of life had shown an incurable incapacity to spell correctly. M. Thiers was never able to spell the word academie, and always insisted on putting in two c's. There had been instances in military history of some of the ablest Generals being unable to spell the commonest words, and he believed the Duke of Wellington was never strong in his orthography. He thought the present method of conducting Civil Service examinations was open to much graver charges. He felt some difficulty in saying it in the presence of the gentleman who was then acting as Chairman, [Mr. ROBY was temporarily occupying the Chair] and who was the author of the best Latin Grammar ever published; but the Civil Service examinations set the seal on the superstition that Latin and Greek were necessary for every man and every class. He was glad to say we had got a little beyond the time when Greek and Latin scholarship was the only form of scholarly reputation that was recognised, and was the best means of getting as high as the Episcopal Bench. The superstition, however, still remained, and he thought the Civil Service examinations set the seal upon it. A further objection to them was that they trained the memory to the detriment of any intellectual faculty. In his early days he intended to go in for a Civil Service examination, and he used to read very carefully the Civil Service papers, so that he knew something about them. He agreed with the criticism that had been passed upon the examinations by many eminent men, that questions which really were test of memory some of the most highly educated literary men were unable to answer. In his opinion, a good deal more attention ought to be paid by the Civil Service Commissioners to the training of habits of observation. He agreed with the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) that a soldier was not a worse soldier for being unable to spell correctly. At the same time, the right hon. Gentleman knew very well that in these days war was a matter of science, and that intellectual powers were of far greater importance than physical capacity. He agreed with the hon. Member for Lynn Regis (Mr. Gibson Bowles) that the "crammer" was to a large extent an abnormal growth of the present system of Civil Service examinations. One of the reasons why the "crammer," or "grinder," had succeeded so well was that his methods of education were so unconventional and so scientific that people could learn more from him in a year than they could learn in a public school in three or four years. A former Member of the House of Commons, Mr. Walter Wren, one of the ablest men he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) ever met, and one of the most successful grinders, was an admirable teacher. At the same time, the system of stuffing men in much the manner as a Strasburg goose was stuffed for the market was a very bad form of intellectual training. He rather disagreed with the hon. Gentleman who raised the question, as he (Mr. O'Connor) thought it most desirable that the examination papers should, as far as possible, be different from year to year, so that the idiosyncracies of the examiners might not become familiar to the "grinders." His great point, however, was the desirability of disestablishing Greek and Latin from the absurd supremacy which they at present held in the education of the country. He hoped that the Secretary to the Treasury, before the Vote came on in another Session, would devote some consideration to the question whether it would be possible to make the Civil Service Examiners bring the examination more into accord with modern ideas.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford) asked whether, as the Civil Service Examiners examined for the Indian as well as the British Service, they got any pay from the Indian Government? He further wished to know who received the £5,000 that was down for bonuses?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): In reply to the question that has just been put to me, I have to say that the India Office pays its proportion of the cost of the examinations. I am not now in a position to reply as to the bonuses; but I shall be happy to do so upon the Report. The hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) has made a most interesting speech on the general question; but I am sure that at this late hour, and in view of the great pressure to which we are subjected, he will not expect me to reply at any length. I can only promise to consider what he has said, and to see whether any of the proposals he has made can be adopted with advantage to the country. I rose principally to answer my hon. Friend the Member for Lynn Regis (Mr. Gibson Bowles). As to the money voted in a lump sum, it is impossible to give the details of the expenditure, because the amount is put on the Estimates long before the examiners have been chosen. The assistant examiners vary from year to year, and even during the year, so that it is quite impossible to put down the names and the amounts received by each person. With respect to those who are officers in Public Departments, their names will appear in the Appropriation Accounts, and it is not possible to give them in the Estimates. With respect to the names of all the examiners, they appear in the Annual Reports of the Civil Service Commissioners, being, however, published after the event. That is all the information I can give in reply to the questions put to me.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, he agreed with most that had fallen from the hon. Member for the Scotland Division (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), and urged that the examinations should be of a practical character. Many of the questions put were of an absolutely useless character. They could not show whether the person examined had any practical knowledge of the subject, but were merely catch questions to see whether he had learnt certain things by rote. The conduct of the examinations was a matter which deserved attention. On a recent occasion, in an Army examination, one of the examiners had a very bad cold; and, as he was the person who had to conduct the dictation, very few of the young men present, except those who were close to him, were able to hear what was read out. Some attention should be given to physical as well as intellectual qualifications for a position in the Army; and he thought the candidates ought not to have to learn a lot of subjects which would be of no use to them. He could not conceive what was the use of higher mathematics to the general run of Staff officers. The Jesuits, who were the best teachers in the world, studied the capabilities of their students, and trained them to excel in one thing or another. The Army authorities, on the other hand, said that unless the candidates excelled in everything they were of no use. It would be far better, in his opinion, to adopt the system of the Jesuits, and employ men some of whom excelled in one thing and some in another.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, his attention had been called to a practical point, in regard to which candidates for minor appointments in the Post Office were subjected to considerable hardship. A short time ago he received a letter from a man who desired to compete for an appointment in the Leicester Post Office, and who wrote one of the best hands he ever saw. This man obtained a nomination, but he subsequently wrote to say he had been rejected in handwriting. He (Mr. Powell Williams) thought that a man who rejected that handwriting would have rejected the "handwriting on the wall." On asking why the handwriting was objected to, the candidate was told that the style was not good, and that the Post Office Authorities required a more commercial style. If there was any particular style of handwriting which the Civil Service Commissioners required for such appointments, effective steps ought to be taken in order to bring to the notice of those who sought the appointments what kind of handwriting was likely to satisfy the examiners. He should like to know whether it was the fact that literary examinations were imposed upon persons who were employed as charwomen in the House of Commons; and, if so, what kind of examinations they were? Were they examined in the broom or what? As to the subject referred to by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour), and about which a very interesting speech had been delivered by the Member for the Scotland Division, he thought a great deal too much stress had been laid on these examinations. Unquestionably, the great defect was that they never tested the judgment and tact of the person who was subject to them. He thought that if the examinations were better addressed to the objects which the Public Departments set before them—that of obtaining men of capacity, and not simply men of knowledge—it would be better for the Public Service.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) wished to understand whether not only the Army examinations, but the whole of the examinations under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commissioners should be made the subject of inquiry and consideration on the part of the Government. He thought it was quite clear that there was a bonâ fide conviction prevailing with tolerable unanimity in all quarters that something was decidedly wrong in connection with the bulk of these examinations. The complaint was generally made that the examiners, for the most part, set themselves to find out not what the competitor knew, but, if possible, what he did not know. The consequence was that very often the result of an examination was that the best men were kept out of the Service. Probably no system could be devised which would be entirely free from serious objection, but he hoped the Government would endeavour to arrive at some satisfactory solution of the question.

Vote agreed to.

4. £33,467, to complete the sum for Exchequer and Audit Department.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN asked when Progress was to be reported, as he understood that the Sitting was to close at 7, and that Report of Supply had to be taken.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We will move to report Progress at about half-past 6.

Vote agreed to.

5. £3,353, to complete the sum for Friendly Societies Registry.

MR. HANBURY said, the Registrar, in his last Report on this Vote, made some remarks in regard to the inadequate way in which the accounts of the surveyors were sent in. They all knew there had recently been some gross cases of loss in connection with funds of this description—poor people, unfortunately, losing the accumulations of years. Well, so far as he could recollect, the Chief Registrar said that the law enforcing on these different surveyors an account of their annual receipts and payments should be more stringently carried out. As a matter of fact, there had been very few prosecutions for neglecting to carry out these duties; and he thought it important, looking at the class of persons who invested their savings in this way, that the Government should insist upon proper accounts being rendered. He should like to know whether anything had been done to carry out the wishes of the Registrar.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that under Sub-head B he saw an item for cost of prosecutions contemplated. He did not understand what that meant. Were the prosecutions referred to settled, or was it meant that they would probably take place?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that provision had to be made in the Estimates for prosecutions which might be expected during the year.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY said, he hoped the Government would take steps not only to see that proper accounts were rendered, but that the funds which were stated to be in existence really were in existence. It was a frightful thing for some of these old people, who had been putting by money all their lives, to find when they reached old age that every penny of it had evaporated, and in a Society bearing the Government stamp. These Societies with the Government stamp were like patent medicines. People imagined that they were guaranteed by Government, and that they must be of the very best kind. He trusted that in future the poorer classes would be assured that if they invested in these Societies the benefits announced could be afforded by the subscriptions, and that the subscriptions would not be improperly made away with.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he thought that before any Society could place itself under the State there should be full inquiry into all its methods. He did not know whether particular Society about which there had been a great deal of discussion lately came under this Vote—

MR. ASQUITH: No.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the danger would be greater than ever if Societies such as that could obtain the imprimatur of the State. He wished to know precisely what steps were taken to ascertain, before these Societies were passed by the Registrar, whether or not they were conducted with regularity? So far as the old Societies were concerned, there was every reason to believe that they regarded the intervention of the State as a great boon, provided it were not carried too far.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) said, the hon. and gallant Member opposite had raised rather a large question; but he (Mr. Bolton) desired only to make one observation upon it. The certificate which was given to the Societies was hardly sufficiently clear to show that it did not warrant or guarantee the Society—that it did not give any Government sanction or recommendation—but merely certified that certain legal formalities had been complied with. The result was that frequently an unsatisfactory Society got a sort of hall-mark, and through being registered secured subscriptions which it would not otherwise obtain. If the Government would consider the desirability of making the certificate perfectly clear in the direction he had indicated it would be doing a service to a large class of persons who were much misled in this matter.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I cannot agree that the Friendly Societies would look with any favour on Government intervention. I have recently had a great deal to do with some of these Societies—including the most powerful—and I can assure the Committee that there is nothing they object to more than Government interference. Some of these great organisations, which in former days were lavishly conducted, found the necessity of introducing reforms. They introduced those reforms, and are now on a sound foundation. That was a spirit which ought to be encouraged, and which ought not to be interfered with. With regard to new Societies, I believe that where a certificate is given there is a certain inquiry as to whether the rules are reasonable and the tables are fair; but it cannot be understood, nor has it been the fact, that that constitutes a guarantee of solvency to the Society. There may be cases in which, through the carelessness with which the Societies are conducted, the certificate becomes perfectly illusory. That is the state of the case. I confess that, so far as I am able to understand the subject, I am not disposed to place the State in any way in the position of guarantor of the solvency of these Societies. We must, to a great extent, trust to the prudence and self-reliance of the Societies themselves as the best security for their soundness.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the right hon. Gentleman had quite misunderstood him if he thought that he (Mr. Lowther) had suggested that established Societies, like the Oddfellows and the Foresters, which had millions in their coffers, should be subjected to Government interference. On the contrary, he had frequently strongly denounced all attempts to interfere with the work of these Societies by the State. What he had intended to convey was that before the Government allowed any organisation whose solvency would not be a matter of certainty to shelter itself under the ægis of an official audit, an inquiry ought to be made as to its character. They knew all about the old Societies, and the less they interfered with them the better. Far be it from him to suggest that they should incur any responsibility in the matter. He agreed that no meddlesome officialism should be applied to the old Societies, but he thought they ought not to lend facilities through a Vote of this kind to any institution which could not prove itself to be of a thoroughly sound character.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the Registrar had, under the Act of Parliament, certain specified duties to perform. Societies were not bound to go to the Registrar. They were not compelled to be registered; but if any Society wished to have the signature of the Registrar it would go to him and hand in a copy of its regulations and its scale of payments, and if the Registrar was satisfied he gave a certificate. But he did not give a guarantee in any way. That certificate was a great advantage, and, so far, the Registrar did good service.

MR. J. LOWTHER: If the Society is a sound one.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that if it was not sound the Registrar did not give a certificate. He saw their rules and regulations and their scale of payments; and if he found that they were not satisfactory he declined to give a certificate. He agreed with everything the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite had said as to the necessity of protecting the poor investor. They knew how much loss had occurred throughout the country in consequence of Friendly Societies becoming insolvent and breaking up. He should be glad if there were some system, either county or general, by which poor people could invest their savings with safety. All the great Friendly Societies, it was hoped, were now on a sound footing. They were doing immense service in the country by enabling people to depend upon themselves; and he thought that Parliament ought to see that these institutions were made as far as possible a protection to the poor people. With regard to prosecutions in 1892, there were 23, and money was taken for prosecutions to come on.

*SIR C. W. DILKE said, the whole system existed under an Act of Parliament passed by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman opposite had been a Member; and if it were to be changed it could only be done by Act of Parliament.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON said, the right hon. Gentleman had said that a certificate was given if the Society was a sound one, but otherwise that the certificate was refused. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman meant that.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, the certificate was given if the calculations and scales of the Society were based on sound principles.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON : That is to say, if the Society complies with the Act of Parliament.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Yes.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON : If it is in conformity with the Act of Parliament.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Yes. The certificate was given on the understanding that it did not imply more than that. It was a guarantee that the Society had complied with certain provisions of the Act of Parliament.

*SIR A. ROLLIT said, that an observation which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench (Mr. J. Lowther) was calculated to give a false impression. There was no real audit of a Society's accounts at all by the Registrar. The Societies had to render certain annual accounts, but as to examination of them nothing but of the most casual character took place. There was no audit that could prevent fraud unless the fraud was of the most glaring character. He would point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the matter might be dealt with by a clause similar to one in the Savings Banks Act, 1890, which provided that a certificate under that Act should not be considered as giving any guarantee to the depositors. It had been customary for some of those institutions to use the Royal Arms at the head of their announcements, or to say "Certified by Act of Parliament," but this was ended by the Savings Bank Act. These things were calculated to produce misapprehension. The great secret of the success of the Friendly Societies which had sprung from the working classes was that they were conducted by the people themselves, and anything which would tend to introduce anything like State control would be prejudicial.

Vote agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1893-4.

CLASS II.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL wished to know, for the convenience of several Irish Members who wished to return to England to take part in the discussion of the Irish Votes, when those Votes would be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): On Thursday.

Sir J. T. Hibbert

*MR. T. H. BOLTON said, it might be in the recollection of the House that at the commencement of this year he had asked a question with reference to a subject which was of very great interest to a large class of poor people throughout the country. An article published in The Daily Chronicle on January 17 last contained this statement—

"There is reason to believe that the Board of Trade has been creating, without anybody except its oppressed victims knowing of it, a new, and we do not hesitate to say, abominable industry in this country to the grievous oppression of the poorer classes. It is that of the speculative debt collector, who buys a bankrupt's book debts from the Board of Trade, and then fastens like a vampire on the wretched debtors, persecuting them, even though they be struggling in the direst poverty, with every engine of extortion known to the law."

That was very strong language, but it was not stronger than the traffic in small book debts deserved. This traffic arose in connection with the realisation of assets by Official Receivers, and it had been carried on to a considerable extent, especially in the County Courts which had bankruptcy jurisdiction. The Official Receivers, after collecting the good debts of estates, put the very doubtful and bad debts together and sold them for what they would fetch. The result was that debt collectors and persons doing work in the County Courts found it worth their while to buy these parcels of book debts, having more than ordinary facilities for enforcing payment. He had in his possession particulars of several such cases. In one case—that of Marianne Deune, of Pontypool—book debts amounting to £800 were sold by the Official Receiver to the highest bidder for 40s., and no less a sum than £400 had been screwed out of the unfortunate debtors, many of whom were in a state of great poverty. Even up to this date defendants were constantly being brought up for judgment and summonses and executions were being taken out. He was supplied with other cases. In one case the assignee of the debt sued for £9 7s. 6d., in which he got an order for 4s. a month, involving 15s. poundage, the defendant being an unfortunate widow. In another case the judgment was given in 1883 for £8 3s. 5d., on which an order was made for 5s. a month—£2 12s. 3d. had been paid into Court. There were some costs and expenses, and the amount ordered to be levied was £5 7s. 6d. Execution had been issued. In another case the sum of £13 13s. 7d. was ordered to be paid by 4s. a month, and the poundage fees were one guinea. The latest judgment he had was in February, 1893. His correspondent described this as "a nefarious traffic," and he had extracts from the local papers which expressed themselves in the strongest language on the matter. Only on the previous evening he had a conversation with a distinguished County Court Judge in the South of England on the subject, and that gentleman told him that the practice was simply abominable, and that he did what he could to mitigate it by refusing to issue execution, or by spreading payments over a considerable period. Steps ought to be taken to alter the law in order to prevent Official Receivers selling book debts which ought to be wiped off as bad, and which would be treated thus by any respectable trader. The Official Receiver, of course, was in a difficult position. Unless he had distinct authority from headquarters to the contrary, he might consider it to be his duty to sell book debts in parcels, and so lay a foundation for this iniquitous system of extortion. The Daily Chronicle had gone into this matter at length, and in the article which he had mentioned referred to the sale of book debts for very small sums, for instance, of £50 for £1, and concluded as follows :—

"We cannot believe that the House of Commons will approve of the Board of Trade selling their right of suing for an assigned debt due to a bankrupt estate to the usurious sharks who make it their trade to grind the faces of the poor, and who buy that right at a price so low that it gives them almost illimitable powers of torment and persecution."

He did not complain of individual Official Receivers in this matter—he complained of the system. His object in bringing the matter to the attention of the President of the Board of Trade was that the right hon. Gentleman might look into it carefully. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to obtain a Return from the County Courts throughout the country—showing (1), the number of sales of book debts by the Official Receivers in Bankruptcy; (2), the amount of the debts sold; (3), the sums realised by the sales; and (4), the amounts by which dividends had been increased by such transactions. If such a Return was procured, it would satisfy the right hon. Gentleman of the substantial character of the grievance to which his attention was now being directed. The right hon. Gentleman would then, no doubt, see the necessity of taking strong action to prevent this sort of thing in the future. There was another point to which he wished to call attention—namely, the question of the official residences of the Official Receivers. The Official Receivers did not always have offices in the districts in which they acted, the consequence being that persons sometimes had to go a long way to wait on them for the purpose of giving information as to the state of their affairs. In one case a person living in the Tunbridge Wells district had to attend, not at Tunbridge Wells to give information, but at an office near London Bridge. This was an unfortunate man earning 15s. or 16s. a week, and it was hard upon him to have to go up to London instead of to Tunbridge Wells.

MR. HANBURY said, that as this was the first occasion on which the Votes had been increased by any payment on account of the Act of 1890 dealing with the winding-up of companies, he wished to direct the attention of the President of the Board of Trade to the Report of the Inspector General of Joint Stock Companies, which disclosed some startling facts. It was shown that in one year 120 companies were wound up by the order of the Court, 32 were voluntarily wound up, and 722 were wound up without any superintendence at all. The winding up of these companies involved a loss of £24,000,000. Of these companies 111 had been in existence for three years, 50 for two years, and 24 for one year only. The Inspector General stated that in no single case was the failure of one of these Companies brought about by any ordinary misfortune such as might attend a private trader. In every case the disaster was due either to mismanagement, or the promotion of illusory objects. He thought the time had come when the Board of Trade should be able to exercise more supervision over these swindling companies. Of course, the loss of £24,000,000 in one year must be bad for trade, and he hoped the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Mundella) would be able to introduce next Session a Bill for increasing his powers on the subject. Under Clause 56 of the Companies Act the right hon. Gentleman could appoint Inspectors and examine into and report upon a company at the request of one-fifth of the shareholders. He was afraid that was too large a number to require to combine together in order to bring the power into operation.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) said, that at the beginning of the year he asked the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) whether his attention had been called to the registration of debenture bonds created by fraudulent and insolvent Companies. The right hon. Gentleman replied that the Lord Chancellor (Lord Herschell) was giving his favourable attention to the question. Months elapsed, and he (Mr. Barrow) called the attention of the Attorney General (Sir C. Russell) to it. The Attorney General promised that the Lord Chancellor would consider the subject with a view to legislation. Had any action been taken?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): With respect to the first complaint made by the hon. Member for North St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton), my attention was called to the article in The Daily Chronicle in January last about the sale of debts. The question was investigated, and the result of the investigation was to satisfy me that there was a class of men who exercised their calling in such a way as to inflict the greatest possible hardship upon poor people. As a result, I, in February last, caused a Circular to be issued to all the Official Receivers of the country calling their attention to the practice of selling debts, and requesting that it should not be carried out as it had been; that no debts should be sold by public auction unless where they were assigned as part of a going business; that in no case should any debts be transferred until all reasonable facilities had been afforded for the settlement of the claim; and that special notice should be given to the Department of all sales to second parties before they were actually effected. The result is that, so far as estates in bankruptcy are concerned, I believe the system has been brought into discredit. The cases quoted by the hon. Gentleman are all cases relating to last year. I have consulted with the Chief Inspector and the principal Official Receivers, and find that they have acted upon my Circular. I am informed that the whole system has been gradually brought into discredit, and the trade has been gradually cut out. Only the other day a professional debt collector summoned a poor person for a small amount, and the Judge made an order for the payment of 1d. a month, the first 1d. to be paid six years hence. It is so well understood by the County Court Judges that the system results in hardship that they are endeavouring as far as they possibly can to put an end to it.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON : Will you give a Return on the subject ?

MR. MUNDELLA : No ; I cannot give a Return, because it is impossible to go into old estates. I may point out that though officials in bankruptcy may do all they can to put a stop to this practice there is nothing to prevent private persons, especially medical men and others, selling their book debts at a low price. The County Court Judges are the persons who can most effectually check the practice, and they are doing so. With respect to the Official Receiver having an office at Tunbridge Wells, it was found that in that district it was more convenient to solicitors, clients, and everybody that the office should be near London Bridge Station. It would cost a great deal more to send a solicitor to Tunbridge Wells than to bring a bankrupt, of which there are very few in that district, to London. That is the sole reason why the present system has been adopted with respect to the Report of the Chief Inspector ; no doubt a very scandalous state of things has been disclosed. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hanbury) must, however, remember that the Act was only passed in 1889, and that it had only had one year's trial before the Report was presented. It was one of the most stringent Acts ever passed by this House, and it has been very strictly put into operation during the past year. Numbers of prosecutions have taken place, some of which have not had satisfactory results. Some of them have cost the Treasury thousands of pounds, and the Judges have been very reluctant indeed to enforce the full provisions of the Act. I am quite sure that there has been no neglect on the part of the Official Receivers. The only complaint I have heard is that the Official Receivers are only too anxious to prosecute, and I constantly hear statements that they are prosecuting people. The hon. Gentleman asks me whether I can recommend an alteration of the Penal Law with the object of putting down fraudulent trading. I believe that the Act is making fraudulent trading at present as difficult as possible. It has only been about 18 months in operation, and has hardly had a fair trial yet. A most able Departmental Committee looked into the whole administration of the Department a short time ago, and they have reported that all is being done that can be done. With regard to the question of Debenture Bonds raised by my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Barrow), I have brought the matter before the Lord Chancellor. The Lord Chancellor has not seen his way to introduce a Bill to regulate the registration of all the Debenture Bonds that may be issued, as he assures me such a measure would be very contentious.

MR. BARROW : That is not my case.

MR. MUNDELLA : I should be very happy if the hon. Gentleman will put his case on paper, and bring it before the Lord Chancellor himself.

*SIR A. ROLLIT said, he thought the hon. Member for Bermondsey (Mr. Barrow) had brought forward a very important subject, and one which was hardly likely to be so difficult to deal with as was indicated by the President of the Board of Trade. Indeed, the Bills of Sale Bill, which had come down from the Upper House, would have afforded an opportunity of dealing with the subject if that measure had not been abandoned, and he had himself handed in Amendments with that object. He trusted that at an early date the matter would be dealt with. He wished to express to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) the very general feeling that there had been too great a growth of officialism and centralisation in reference to the administration of the Winding-up and Bankruptcy Acts. That feeling was general in commercial circles, and it was also largely expressed in legal circles. Whilst he accepted the principles of the Act of 1883, and even more those of his own Act of 1890, he thought it most desirable that the administration of those Acts should not take the direction of too much officialism and centralisation if this could possibly be avoided. He had heard of instances in which compositions of a large amount had been refused, with the result that a very small dividend had been ultimately obtained. He hoped the subject was one which would receive the attention of the Board of Trade, and that as much concession as possible would be made to public feeling with regard to it. While the Insolvency Laws had been well administered recently, there was one gap which might well be filled with reference to the administration of estates by deeds of arrangement. Such deeds were now public under the Registration Acts. At the present time one dissentient creditor could by insisting upon payment of 20s. in the £1, either secure a preference for himself or prevent an arrangement; and this was the difficulty which it was desired to deal with. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would seek an early opportunity of securing by legislation, at the instance either of the Department or of some private Member, with the help of the Department, the removal of this mischief.

Resolutions agreed to.

BURGH'S GAS SUPPLY (SCOTLAND) ACT (1876) AMENDMENT BILL.

Lords Amendment to be considered forthwith; considered, and agreed to.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 4) BILL.

Read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 454.)

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

VACCINATION (PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS).

Return [presented 8th September] to be printed. [No. 412.]

TRADE REPORTS (ANNUAL SERIES).

Copy presented,—of Diplomatic and Consular Reports on Trade and Finance, No. 1286 (Russia) and 1287 (China) [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

TRADE REPORTS (MISCELLANEOUS SERIES).

Copy presented,—of Reports on Subjects of General and Commercial Interest, No. 301 (Spain) [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

ADJOURNMENT.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) asked how it was that the Report of the Colonial Office Vote had been taken at half-past 6, when it had been arranged that it should be taken at 7?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am in the unfortunate position of the man who desired to please everybody. It was certainly the intention to continue Committee of Supply until 7 o'clock; but an appeal was made by the Leader of the Opposition and the Member for West Birmingham that we should close the Committee earlier, in order to take Report of Supply. I had totally forgotten the other arrangements, and I am very sorry if the hon. Member has been put to any disadvantage in consequence.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Seven o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 11th September 1893.

The Lord Kensington—Chosen Speaker in the absence of the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Commissioners.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD DENMAN asked whether the Second Reading of the Bill for the Better Government of Ireland, having been passed after 12 o'clock on Friday night, the postponement of it would date from that day or from Saturday; because, if from Saturday, it would be impossible for it to be read a second time "that day six months"? He, therefore, wished it should be known that the postponement would, in the circumstances, be until the following Monday, the 12th March.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of Kimberley): I really do not know what day it dates from, but it is wholly immaterial. It makes no difference what day it is.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Standing Order No. XXXIX. considered (according to Order), and dispensed with for this day's Sitting.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE BILL [H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN, in moving the Second Reading, said, that in view of the unfair opposition which had been made out of doors to this Bill, he thought it would be an excellent thing if it were carried in their Lordships' House, and submitted to the opinion of the other House at the next meeting of Parliament. He begged, therefore, to move that the Bill be now read a second time, so that, with the suspension of the Standing Orders in its favour, it might be passed through all its stages in that House.

VOL. XVII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Denman.)

On Question, resolved in the negative.

LAND JUDGES COURT (IRELAND).

LORD ARDILAUN moved—

"That the Return moved for on the 8th August, 1890, relating to proceedings in the Land Judges Court in Ireland (in continuation of House of Lords Parliamentary Paper No. 249, of Session 1888) be presented to the House, notwithstanding that some slight alterations in the form of the Order have been found to be necessary."

He believed that the Motion was unopposed.

LORD ACTON said, the Return moved for would be got ready immediately.

Motion agreed to.

CAVALRY BARRACKS AT WINDSOR.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ARRAN asked the Under Secretary of State for War whether there was any truth in the rumour that the General Officer commanding the Home District had reported that the Cavalry Barracks at Windsor were unfit for occupation; whether the Government expert and the principal medical officer had reported in the same sense; and whether, in consequence of these Reports, it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to remedy at once the evils complained of; and whether the Under Secretary of State for War would lay on the Table all the Reports and Correspondence connected with the matter? He said that, in the short interval between the Division on the Government of Ireland Bill on Friday, and the Adjournment of the House, certain information having been given him with reference to the state of these barracks, he had had but a few minutes to put down the question in a somewhat uncertain form. More specific information had since reached him, of a character so remarkable that he should have liked to have had the opportunity of speaking to the Under Secretary of State for War upon the matter before bringing it to the attention of the House. As, however, it would be inconvenient for the noble Lord to be present to-morrow, he must put the question. Owing to constant complaints of the insanitary condition of these barracks, an expert officer (Captain Tindall) was sent to Windsor to report upon them. On the 3rd August he reported that all the drains were in a very foul state, that there was no proper system of ventilation, and the principal latrines were little better than cesspools, emitting their putrid contents into wells. The whole place stank in a most abominable manner, and money spent on works would be thrown away. On the 23rd August the principal medical officer reported, amongst other things, that the barracks were so bad as to be unfit for occupation. That appeared to him to be an unsatisfactory state of things. Then a subsequent Report was received from Captain Tindall on the 29th August, to the effect that the foul smells complained of were owing to an escape of "gas." It was very remarkable that an expert, well versed in such matters, should make so strong a Report in the first instance and one so very minimised three weeks afterwards. The only way to reconcile the two Reports was to suppose that in writing "gas" Captain Tindall had omitted the word "sewer," for of course it was easy to distinguish between the smell from an escape of illuminating gas and that proceeding from drains. Another strong fact was that the medical officer had reported that the barracks were "unfit for occupation." Further, in December, 1892, he believed that the General Officer commanding the Home District drew up a very strong Report on the condition of the barracks; but no notice was taken of it, nor any move made in the matter until August last. During the short time the Royal Horse Guards were at Windsor, before they went to Pirbright, on their way to Newbridge, two cases of illness occurred, one patient having to be sent away, owing, it was believed, to the bad smells; and in the other case, which ended fatally, the patient showed strong symptoms of enteric fever. He remembered a similar case occurring at Dublin, where the Royal Barracks were pronounced to be in an unsanitary condition. Nothing, however, was done in the matter, although men and officers were dying every year, and it was only when, presumably, it became convenient to put the matter into the Estimates that a very bad report of them was sent in, and the Headquarters Staff was moved out at 24 hours' notice, and it was stated that it would be at the risk of their lives to return. Having put the facts he had mentioned before the noble Lord, he begged to put the question.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord SANDHURST) said, he quite recognised the public spirit which had prompted the question, and the friendly tone in which his noble Friend had couched his observations. A short time ago a question was asked of Mr. Campbell-Bannerman in the House of Commons, and, in reply, he quoted the Report of Mr. Tindall, who was not a military officer, but an expert in sanitary matters, and stated that several Reports had been received upon the drainage of barracks. The first Report from the General Officer commanding, complaining of the system, had been received in December, 1892; and two others had been received from the War Office Sanitary Inspector, dated August 1 and August 29. Although the system of drainage appeared to be old-fashioned and bad in principle, the health of the troops occupying the barracks had not suffered in any way. The Sanitary Inspector, who had used the smoke test, stated that he found no direct escape of gas from the drains into the building, but that the bad smells were sufficiently accounted for by the proximity of filthy latrines and numerous escapes of lighting gas within the building. After recommending certain alterations and repairs which were now to be carried out, the Inspector stated that he could not help thinking that hitherto the smells had been rather offensive than dangerous, and that when the alterations had been made the air of the officer's house would cease to be offensive; and he considered that no special steps need to be taken until the drains were re-constructed in due course. Steps were now being taken to remove the offensive stenches. Of course, the cleanness of latrines was not within the responsibility of the Secretary of State for War, but of Commanding Officers. Lord Errol, in command of the Blues, had complained to him that these drains were in a bad state. Thereupon, Mr. Tindall was sent to report as a preliminary step. Knowing that Lord Errol was dissatisfied with the state of the barracks to which he was to take his regiment, he asked Mr. Tindall to come and see him and state the steps he had taken. Mr. Tindall states that he had used the smoke test, and the officers having complained of the offensive smells when the doors were opened on hot nights he had discovered an escape of gas. As he had said, the health of both regiments of Life Guards who had been quartered there had been uniformly good. His noble Friend was unable to understand how the Reports differed so much, but he should point out that Mr. Tindall had been selected to report on these matters because he was well versed in them. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, after conferring with the Inspector General of Fortifications and the Quartermaster General, saw no reason why the troops should not go into these barracks. It should be stated that the second examination made by Mr. Tindall with the smoke test was very searching. He might also say that he had himself looked into the matter, and the weekly Returns still showed that the health of the troops had not suffered.

THE EARL OF ARRAN again remarked, while obliged to his noble Friend for the answer he had given, which was to a great extent satisfactory, that there were great discrepancies between the Reports sent in, and that Captain Tindall's Reports gave different reasons for what was complained of. He would refer to the matter on a future occasion, as he did not quite understand it, being a bit of an engineer himself.

LORD SANDHURST pointed out that Mr. Tindall's second examination was much more searching than the first, and that though in the first instance he said it would be useless to spend money on these barracks, he had since stated that there could be no complaint when the drains were finally re-constructed.

THE EARL OF ARRAN said, he understood the troops were going there?

LORD SANDHURST said, that was so, on the advice received from the Quartermaster General and Inspector General of Fortifications.

COUNTY SURVEYORS (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

Returned from the Commons agreed to with an Amendment: The said Amendment to be considered To-morrow.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 4) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a: Then (Standing Order No. XXXIX. having been dispensed with) Bill read 2^a; Committee negatived; Bill read 3^a, and passed.

NAVAL DEFENCE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a: Then (Standing Order No. XXXIX. having been dispensed with) Bill read 2^a; Committee negatived; Bill read 3^a, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY moved, "That the House do adjourn to Three o'clock to-morrow."

LORD DENMAN said, he thought it impolitic on the part of Her Majesty's Government to postpone the Sittings of that House without affording an opportunity of putting an end to the present coal strike, the most unfortunate strike that had ever occurred in this country. Railway traffic was to some extent suspended, and the crisis required to be dealt with. An opportunity ought to be afforded for a declaration of the opinion of Parliament in both Houses.

House adjourned at Twelve o'clock, till to-morrow, Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 11th September 1893.

LEVEL CROSSING AT TILBURY.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade how many fatal accidents have occurred at the Manor Way Level Crossing, Tilbury, since the docks were opened?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I regret to say that four persons have been killed at this crossing since the opening of the docks in 1886.

As I stated last week, powers have been taken by the Company to abolish this crossing, and I have directed an Inspector to visit the spot and confer with the Company as to the precautions to be taken until the work has been executed.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): Have the Board of Trade no power to compel the Railway Company to take more effective precautionary measures?

MR. MUNDELLA: No, Sir; the Board of Trade have no power in this case.

THE ROYAL NIGER COMPANY.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have received during the present year any Reports or official information with regard to the management by the Royal Niger Company of the African territory under the control of that Company; and, if so, what the effect of it is; and what is the estimated population and size of the territory within the Company's control or jurisdiction, and what official in Her Majesty's Service has now any duty of keeping Her Majesty's Government informed as to the condition of that territory or the management of it by the Company, and to whom British subjects not belonging to the Company, who trade or desire to trade with that territory, may look for advice or assistance?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Annual Reports of the Council of Directors of the Company are furnished to Her Majesty's Government. Their effect is generally satisfactory. There is no official in Her Majesty's Service resident in the territory under the control of the Royal Niger Company. The officials of the Company are responsible for the local execution of the provisions of the Charter, and it is to them that British subjects should look for advice or assistance. The regions administered by the Company have been estimated to cover about 500,000 square miles, with a population of from 20,000,000 to 25,000,000.

A BLACKPOOL POSTAL THEFT.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Postmaster
Mr. Mundella

General whether he is aware that Mrs. Wotherspoon, a widow in poor circumstances, having sent a letter containing a postal order for 10s. to her daughter in Blackpool, the letter and the postal order were, while in charge of the Post Office, stolen by a caretaker at the Blackpool Post Office, in the employ of the Post Office; whether, while admitting these facts, the Secretary to the Post Office informed Mrs. Wotherspoon, on 23rd August last, that the Postmaster General was not liable to, and would not repay, the sum stolen by his subordinate; and whether it is a settled principle with the Post Office that it has no liability and no responsibility whatever for the theft by its own servants of letters or moneys while in its own charge?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): I have made inquiry into the circumstances referred to in the question, which are substantially correct. The Post Office is by law exempt from liability for the theft of letters or their enclosures or of postal orders; and, as a general principle, compensation is not paid except in the case of registered letters. Mrs. Wotherspoon was duly informed that there was reason to believe that her postal order had fallen into the hands of a person who is now awaiting his trial on a charge of theft, and she was formally told of the legal exemption from liability of the Post Office. She has made no application for compensation, and it may be added that the question whether or not, as an act of grace, it will be possible to make good to her out of the taxpayers' pocket the loss which she has sustained will be a matter for consideration after the trial.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Am I to understand that this person's case will be considered? I am aware that by law the Post Office is not liable, but I hope that on application this woman's 10s. will be returned. Further, may I ask did the Post Office prosecute this man?

MR. A. MORLEY: I think it was the Post Office Authorities who prosecuted. Any application sent in by the woman will be duly considered.

THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there will be any conditions in the proposed agreement between the National Telephone Company and the Post Office which will in any way limit the power of Corporations, County Councils, and other Local Authorities to impose any conditions they may think fit as to charges or otherwise on the National Telephone Company as a condition of permitting them to continue their telephone service, or obtaining further local privileges and powers, underground or otherwise?

MR. A. MORLEY: My answer to the hon. Member's question is "No." The question is one which is regulated by Statute, and I would refer the hon. Member to Section 5 of the Telegraph Act of last Session. I would also remind him that I have promised to lay the agreement on the Table of the House before its final conclusion, and that its provisions will then be open to inspection.

PETITIONS IN GOVERNMENT DOCKYARDS.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that a Petition against the Home Rule Bill has been circulated through Woolwich Arsenal; whether such a procedure is a breach of the Rules which regulate Government establishments; and whether steps will be taken to bring these Rules under the notice of any official who may have been associated with the circulation of this document?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): Nothing is known of such a Petition having been circulated through the arsenal. Had such a proceeding been attempted, and come to the knowledge of the authorities, it would have been stopped.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman make further inquiries? My information is from a thoroughly reliable source.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think it necessary to inquire any further after the intimation I have given as to what in such a case would be the action of the authorities.

MILITIA OFFICERS AND THE RECRUITING STAFF.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, with reference to paragraph 210 of Militia Regulations, will he, taking into consideration the fact that a large proportion of Army recruits pass through the Militia, be prepared to grant a few appointments on the Recruiting Staff to officers of Militia?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There are very few appointments on the Recruiting Staff; and as such appointments require a previous knowledge of the Service, and a certain amount of seniority and experience, Militia officers cannot be selected. Almost all the recruiting officers of the Regimental Districts are Adjutants of Militia; but it is not considered desirable to give these appointments to Militia officers. The Permanent Staff, who do recruiting work, are under the Adjutant's orders.

HAWICK SHERIFF'S COURT.

MR. T. SHAW (Hawick, &c.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what progress has been made in fixing the boundaries of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court recently established in Hawick, and what is the cause of the delay in completing the arrangements for the business of the Court; whether it is the case that an attempt is being made to have the parishes of Ashkirk, Minto, Hobkirk, and Lilliesleaf deprived of the advantages and convenience of the new jurisdiction, and what course he intends to pursue with reference thereto; and whether, in the appointment of a Sheriff Clerk Depute, strict regard shall be had to the provisions of the law which prohibit such clerk practising directly or indirectly before the Court?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.): The Draft Order establishing the new Court at Hawick is now before me, and would have been ere now transmitted to the Secretary for Scotland had it not been that there is dissatisfaction in certain quarters—that the parishes named in my hon. Friend's question are omitted from the new district. I have asked the Sheriff to report both in regard to this matter, and in regard to the appointment of a Sheriff Clerk Depute, which must, I think, be made subject to the restriction named. The delay has arisen solely from the causes now stated.

CORDITE AMMUNITION.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that upwards of 6,000 cartridges (hard metal-covered bullets) may be fired from the Maxim gun (8 millimètre barrel), with Danish smokeless powder containing no nitro-glycerine, without eroding the barrel, whilst the English Maxim gun (.303 barrel) fired with cordite powder and nickel-covered bullets has been proved to the War Office, by actual experiment, to be useless for accurate shooting after firing 2,000 cartridges ; this being so, is it proposed to provide a smokeless powder which will be less destructive to the .303 regulation barrel, and to introduce a better class of steel in the manufacture of the barrel than that now in use ; and whether it is the fact that a .303 barrel, after firing 2,000 rounds of cordite powder cartridges and nickel-covered bullets, showing erosion from breech to muzzle, was some time since cut in half longitudinally and furnished to the War Office, together with a Report ; if so, will the Report be laid upon the Table, and the halves of the eroded barrel shown to Members ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No information has been received as to the action of Danish smokeless powder on the barrels of the Maxim gun. A private Report was received from a manufacturing company that a barrel (section of which was forwarded) has been eroded by the discharge of 2,000 cartridges of British Service pattern. This erosion, however, was attributed to the shape of the bullet and to the character of the rifling, and experiments are being made in both these directions. The erosion was not attributed to cordite, nor was any objection to its use made in the Report. The barrel was made by the firm in question from steel obtained by them. It would not be according to usual practice to lay on the Table this letter or the pieces of metal which accompanied it, as such communications between a private firm and the Department are generally of a confidential character.

*MR. WEIR : In consequence of the very unsatisfactory answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I shall raise this question on the Estimates.

THE PWLLHELI PETITION AGAINST THE WELSH SUSPENSORY BILL.

MR. GRIFFITH - BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) : I beg to ask the Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions whether the Petition from Pwllheli against the Welsh Church Suspensory Bill has been destroyed by order of the Committee ; and whether, before arriving at their decision, the Committee gave any opportunity to the vicar of Pwllheli and the Committee who got up the Petition to be heard in defence of their action ; and, if not, would he explain the reason ?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.) : I would ask the hon. Member who replies to state whether the Members of the House who brought forward this charge and the Members of the Committee who supported them were not in the first instance favourable to such an inquiry as is indicated by the hon. Member ; whether the Chairman of the Committee did not say that after a careful examination of the Petition itself he had come to the conclusion that the intrinsic evidence of manipulation afforded sufficient confirmation of the charge against it ; and whether he did not consequently propose that it should be rejected ?

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) : In the absence of the Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions, I have to say that I have made inquiry, and I am informed, first, that the Petition in question has not been destroyed at all, either by order of the Committee or otherwise ; secondly, that the reasons which the Committee had for arriving at their decision were stated in the House publicly after our meeting last Wednesday week by the Chairman of the Committee (Sir C. Dalrymple) and in our Report ; and, thirdly, that the vicar of Pwllheli was not given any opportunity of being heard by the Committee, who, indeed, did not attempt to hold any judicial inquiry. With regard to the questions by the hon. Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs, it was felt that the prima facie evidence brought before the Committee justified them in believing that it was not a bonâ fide one with regard to a large number of the signatures, and it was thought that the best course to recommend to the House was that the Petition ought to be rejected.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN : Will the hon. Member inform the House what the reason of this decision was ?

MR. BYLES : It was stated in the Resolution of the Committee, which was reported to the House on the 20th in a special Report.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE : Am I right in believing that the Committee have no objection to inquiring into this matter, if the vicar of Pwllheli and his promoters desire it ?

MR. BYLES : The Committee would be perfectly willing to undertake the inquiry if the House desire it.

THE CASE OF HENRIETTA WARD.

MR. A. CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) : In the absence of the hon. Member for South Birmingham, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the woman Henrietta Ward, to whose case his attention was called on Friday last, has a sick child whom it has been found necessary to receive into the gaol along with her ; and whether, in view of this circumstance, he will grant a reduction of her sentence ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : I am informed by the Governor of the prison that the woman entered the gaol with a very delicate child on September 4. Her husband had applied that the child might be sent to prison with her, as it was so ill, and the Magistrates consented. The child has since admission been medically treated, and is better than it was on admission. I am afraid that under the circumstances there is nothing to justify me in receding from the position I have taken up, and in authorising a reduction of the sentence.

A WELSH CHARITY DISPUTE.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE : I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire whether his attention has been drawn to a County Court action instituted by the Trustees of a certain Charity at Pennrynydd, Anglesea, to eject a person, named William Jones, from their almshouses, upon the ground, amongst other things, of an alleged breach of Regulations which demanded attendance at the parish church as a condition of tenancy ; whether the Founder of such almshouses had attached any such condition to the enjoyment of the gift ; and whether such Regulations were made by the Trustees with the sanction of the Charity Commissioners ; and, if not, whether the Charity Commissioners propose to take any action to enforce the fair and impartial administration of the Trust according to the declared wishes of the Founder ?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire) : (1.) The information before the Commissioners, which is mainly derived from the newspaper report of the proceedings in the County Court, indicates that the non-residence of the defendant was the main cause of the decision given against him. (2.) Neither residence in the almshouses nor attendance at the parish church was made by the Founder a condition of his gift. (3.) The Regulations in question appear from the Reports of the former Commissioners for inquiring concerning Charities (1837) to have been made very shortly after the foundation of the Charity, and probably by the individuals appointed by the Founder to be the original Trustees of his will, and consequently have not received the sanction of the Charity Commissioners. A Regulation prohibiting non-residence is one which it is within the competence of the Trustees of an almshouse to make, and the Commissioners see no reason for interfering with the action of the Trustees in enforcing such a Regulation. Any Regulation compelling attendance at parish church would be invalid as being contrary to the declaration of the Founder. The Commissioners have decided to apply for the production of the alleged Regulations, and if any of them are found to be ultra vires, or contradictory of the wishes of the Founder, steps will be promptly taken to remedy the matter.

THE LEE-METFORD RIFLE.

MR. A. CHAMBERLAIN : In the absence of my right hon. Relative the Member for West Birmingham, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, on the issue of the Lee-Metford magazine rifle to the regular Infantry, several thousand stands of serviceable arms, Martini-Henry pattern, were returned to Bagot Street Factory to be broken up; whether Colonel Nuttall submitted a proposal to convert them into carbines for a cost of 7s. 6d. each, and his pattern was approved by the War Office, and designated Mark II. M.-H. Carbine; whether the Superintendent of the Enfield Factory was then asked to submit an estimate for Colonel Nuttall's pattern, and tendered accordingly for 17s. 1d., being 9s. 7d. more than the estimate from Birmingham; and if he will state what are the facts of the case, and whether the great bulk of the conversion of the rifles into carbines is being done at Enfield?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley): All Martini-Henry rifles exchanged for the Lee-Metford rifles are returned to Bagot Street for inspection. If found serviceable they are retained for conversion or store. Only those found unserviceable are broken up. A proposal for conversion was submitted by the Chief Inspector of Small Arms, but his estimate was 10s. per arm. The pattern was designated Mark II. M.-H. Artillery Carbine. No trace can be found of any estimate for 17s. 1d.; as a matter of fact, the work is being done at Enfield for 7s. 1d. The bulk of the work was given to Enfield, as it was considered more properly to belong to a Manufacturing than to an Inspection Department.

PUTRID FISH.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to a case heard before Mr. Slade at the Southwark Police Court on Friday last, when the authorities of St. George-the-Martyr were compelled to bring five cartloads of putrid herrings through the crowded streets of the parish to the police court in order to have the fish condemned; whether there are any other means by which the Magistrate's sanction can be secured without endangering the health of the populace; and whether, if no such power at present exists, he can see his way to have the law amended?

MR. ASQUITH: The Magistrate informs me that in his view of the law he has only power to condemn what he has actually seen himself. If this be so the law is, in my opinion, in an unsatisfactory state, and I will consider whether legislation is necessary.

THE CHOLERA.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.): May I inquire whether the Local Government Board has any further information which they think it desirable to impart to the House in reference to the cholera?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): The information to hand at present is, so far, satisfactory. There have been no deaths at Hull, and there are only four cases in the hospital. At Grimsby up to yesterday, at midnight, there were two additional deaths; but to-day I have received no notice of any deaths, and I therefore regard the condition at Grimsby as, to that extent, satisfactory. At other places some cases which have been reported as cases of cholera have been proved to be due to other causes.

MR. E. STANHOPE (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Can the hon. Gentleman say anything as to the case of choleraic diarrhoea reported from Boston?

SIR W. FOSTER: It is an exceedingly suspicious case, and one which, as far as microscopical and bacteriological examination has gone, the authorities are bound to regard as a case of cholera.

VOTES ON ACCOUNT.

MR. BARTLEY: In the absence of the Prime Minister, will the Chancellor of the Exchequer say if it is proposed to take another Vote on Account; and, if so, when?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I am not aware of any necessity for one. Should there be, due notice will be given.

THE COLLIERY DISTURBANCES.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a question of which I have given him private notice. The question is as follows:—How many members of the Metropolitan Police Force have been despatched to Yorkshire; what proportion this number bears to the whole force; whether it is not a fact that these men have been sent away for an indefinite period; and, if so, whether a permanent reduction of the Metropolitan Police Force is possible; and, lastly, whether the Government has finally resolved to do nothing in reference to the dispute except make a display of superior force; and whether they hold that this completes their responsibility in the matter?

Mr. ASQUITH: The number of Metropolitan Police sent to Yorkshire is 250. The total strength of the Metropolitan Force is over 15,000. The period for which the men have been sent is necessarily indefinite; they will be recalled as soon as they can be spared. By Section 25 of the Police Act, 1890, Police Authorities are empowered for special emergencies to strengthen their own force by borrowing from other forces. I am constantly impressing upon Local Authorities the importance of availing themselves of this power, and in my opinion it is the duty of Police Authorities whose own districts are in a normal condition to comply to the utmost of their ability with requisitions from districts which are in exceptional need. It was in pursuance of this obligation that I sanctioned the despatch of Metropolitan constables to Yorkshire. Their temporary absence for a special purpose is not to be regarded as indicating that any permanent reduction of the Metropolitan Police is desirable or possible. As to the last part of the question, I cannot assent to the description of measures urgently necessary for the prevention of gross lawlessness as a "display of superior force." The Government has no power to put an end to the dispute in connection with which these deplorable excesses have occurred. But, in common with the whole nation, they earnestly hope that on both sides counsels of moderation may prevail.

Mr. BARTLEY: I suppose no extra cost will be thrown on the Metropolitan ratepayers. The charges will be paid by the districts to which the police are sent, will they not?

Mr. ASQUITH: Of course that is so.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SUPPLY,—considered in Committee.

¶(In the Committee.)

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1893-4.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £267,800, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Salaries and Miscellaneous Charges of the War Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894."

Mr. HANBURY (Preston) said, he desired to direct attention to what had been called the "Cordite Scandal." Of course he could not say that that was a scandal, for that would depend on the reply given by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, but he was sorry to say that hitherto the replies of the right hon. Gentleman—written no doubt for him by War Office officials—had been very unsatisfactory, and had led him to the conclusion that there had been a good deal of concealment. The exact complaint he had to make in regard to that matter was one which had been made by private inventors over and over again; it was a complaint of long standing; it had been enforced by more than one Royal Commission and more than one Committee, and the complaint was that War Office and other Government officials were placed in a position which enabled them to practically pick the brains of inventors who came before them, and to apply the results of such operations, sometimes for the benefit of the Government, and sometimes for their own benefit. He ventured to assert that every case in which the inventor was not adequately remunerated was a scandal, whether the benefit accrued to the Government or to one of its officials in a private capacity. A further complaint he had to make was that while officials were professedly securing patents for the Government at home they were, unknown to the Government, securing patents in many foreign countries for their own private purposes. The result was—and this was his third complaint—that we had got a bad smokeless powder. The great difficulty connected with this question was the difficulty of getting full and adequate information. The public themselves were very lax in these matters. They felt that they could trust the officials to do their duty, and in 99 cases out of 100 that confidence was fully justified. He did not, in fact, believe any country was so well served by its public officials as England was. On the other hand, these points generally were of so highly technical a character that it was utterly impossible for the public to take a special interest in them, and in addition to that on these official matters officials, although they might differ from the decisions arrived at by their brother officials, naturally held their tongue. There was, in fact, among them an esprit de corps which prevented them offering criticisms, even if they were free to do so. In the next place, private firms and experts had their mouths closed, for it would not do for them to quarrel with the Government, as if they did they would never get Government orders. On the other hand, he had certain advantages in presenting his case. One was that this certainly was not a Party matter. He was not laying any special blame on the present Secretary of State for War, as undoubtedly the greater part of what he complained happened while the late Government was in office. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman had carried on the system or had recognised and accepted the results, he had taken upon himself some portion of the responsibility. Still, when both Front Benches were agreed upon a certain course and had accepted the responsibility it became more than ever difficult to arrive at the truth. Again, this was not a personal matter. He would, no doubt, have frequently to mention the names of two men, Sir Frederick Abel and Professor Dewar, but he was not going to contend that they had not done what they were perfectly entitled to do. If the Rules were, as he understood them to be, he only brought them forward prominently as an illustration of a very bad system, and he objected to that bad system, because the public were bound to lose if private inventors were not encouraged to take their inventions to the War Office. This was a matter of public honour, and it was little short of disgraceful that men should be tempted to submit their inventions and ideas to the Government, and that those inventions and ideas should be borrowed, and patents for them taken out in the name of the Government or its officials. But this was a very old story. The grievance arose so far back as the year 1871, when the Treasury issued a Circular to the Admiralty and to the War Office to the effect that no officer in the Civil, Military, or Naval Services of the Crown should be called upon to judge or give an opinion in cases where their own interests might come into collision with those of any other person,

"Or be permitted to obtain or hold or be directly or indirectly interested in any letters patent for any articles needed for the use of the Government."

About a month since he asked a question of the Secretary of State for War in regard to that Minute, and the right hon. Gentleman replied that

"After the passing of the Act of 1883, which altered the law as to patents, the whole question was reconsidered, and in 1885 the Minute was withdrawn."

But he would like to remark in regard to this that the Patent Act of 1883, which enabled private inventors to hold patents as against the Crown, gave no security to inventors who, not having patents, submitted their inventions to the War Office. He was not sure that it gave them protection even if they had patents. The Treasury was to be the judge of the amount of remuneration to be paid them for taking their patents, but it did not prevent them from having their brains picked by War Office officials just as had been done before. It was, indeed, an actual encouragement to those officials to take out patents for themselves, and the passing of the Patent Act rather increased than did away with the necessity for the Circular. That evidently was the view of the Treasury, for in reply to a question put on the 14th July last, the Secretary to the Treasury informed him that—

"In a letter addressed to the Admiralty and War Office in December, 1871, the Treasury expressed the opinion that it was inexpedient that officers interested in patents should be appointed to judge of inventions. I (Sir J. T. Hibbert) am not aware that this opinion has ever been modified, and so far as I can judge it seems a reasonable one."

Thus they had the fact that the War Office and the Treasury were at issue on the point.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury must have been given in forgetfulness of the fact that the Circular had been withdrawn. I ascertained that it had been withdrawn to the knowledge both of the Admiralty and of the War Office.

MR. HANBURY, continuing, said, he would have to press the Secretary to the Treasury further on the point. He quoted the Circular because he had strong evidence to show that it was issued partly as the result of the action of Professor Abel in that year—action exactly parallel to that taken by him in regard to the new explosive, and the subject of the present complaint. Now what was that action? In the year 1865 Professor Abel was a War Office chemist, and he was ordered, as such, to experiment on the safety of various explosives for Government use, the explosives submitted to him including white or German gunpowder, dynamite, nitro-glycerine, lithopacteur, and gun-cotton. What did he do? Having had those explosives submitted to him on behalf of the Government, he straightway, on the 25th April, 1865, patented improvements in the manufacture of gun-cotton for shooting as well as blasting. He did not transfer those patents to the Government, but he sold them in the following year to Messrs. Prentice, of Stowmarket, securing to himself a royalty of 10d. per 1,000 cartridges and £10 per ton of gun-cotton. He took out other patents in 1867 and 1868, as well as in 1869, and he recommended broadcast the purchase of that very gun-cotton from which he was deriving a royalty, of the very firm which paid him that royalty. He was asked to express an opinion upon rival explosives and upon nitro-glycerine, and in spite of the fact that the cordite now being manufactured by him contained more nitro-glycerine than any other explosive manufactured, he reported—

“I have to express my firm conviction that such appalling accidents as that which occurred in Wales cannot be guarded against by the enforcement of any measure short of an absolute prohibition of the importation, transport, and storage of nitro-glycerine or any preparation of that material.”

Surely that was strong evidence against his own nitro-glycerine. Again, in 1869, he recommended the Magistrate at Wandsworth to refuse a licence for the manufacture of Schultze gunpowder—another rival product—on the ground of danger. Now he was not complaining of that; he was only pointing out what the system of the War Office allowed to be done. What happened in regard to the gun-cotton which he so strongly recommended? In August, 1871, at the meeting of the British Association, he said—

“Gun-cotton is now so completely unaffected by high temperatures, one deal box of it might actually burn away in the middle of a pile of similar boxes without exploding.”

Yet only a week later 10 tons of that very gun-cotton exploded at Stowmarket, blew up the works, and killed 30 men, including two of the partners in the firm. That showed how far Professor Abel's judgment was to be relied upon in regard to the safety of the material he recommended. In the year 1871 various charges were levelled against Mr. Abel in The Mechanics' Magazine, and the only one he replied to was one that royalty was paid on gun-cotton made for the Government. He denied that that was so, but the paper printed a copy of the agreement, which showed that there was no reservation of the kind, the only exception being that he was not to receive any royalty when the gun-cotton was manufactured by the Government itself. That convicted him of an awkward mistake. The War Office at the time did not know that he had taken out these patents, in the same way as it was ignorant that he took out the foreign patents for cordite in 1889. He was called upon to resign either his patents or his position. Naturally he did not wish to resign his position, so he sold his patents, and although they were bringing him in between £3,000 and £4,000 a year, he disposed of them to a Mr. Nicholson, of Dulwich, for £1,000. Would that be believed? Was it a bonâ fide transaction? It did not look like one. And a month or two later the Treasury Circular was issued. In 1888 Professor Abel was again called upon to judge new explosives, and he was appointed on a Committee with two others—Professor Dewar and Professor Dupré. The duty assigned to these three men was clear, and it was conveyed in a short Circular of Instruction which he would read—

“The Committee is appointed for the purpose of considering questions relating to new explosive agents, or the new application of, or improvements in the production and application of, known explosive agents which will be referred to the Committee by order of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief for consideration, or investigation and report."

Anybody reading that Instruction would see that the primary duty of the Committee was to examine other people's inventions; they certainly were not to set to work to invent for themselves. But that was not the view taken by the Committee. It was nominated on the 10th July, 1888, and it sat for the first time on the 20th August. It certainly seemed as if by that time it had made up its mind that it was its duty to invent for its own benefit, and to take out patents abroad, because on the 20th August it issued a Memorandum, or rather it sent one to the Director of Artillery, which did not reach the War Office until the 31st December. This set forth that the War Office claimed—

"The originating of improvements in the production and utilisation of known explosives, or the discovery or invention of new explosive compounds or preparation was to be regarded as ranking foremost in value, and to the development of it the Committee should prominently devote themselves."

They were thus to become inventors. Then followed this strange remark—

"The Committee will unavoidably come under the stigma of not being impartial judges of the merits of inventions of private individuals, and of profiting by information imparted in confidence in working out subjects which they afterwards put forward as emanating from themselves, and the Committee must make up their minds to be indifferent to such imputations relying confidently upon a proper defence of their proceedings in high official quarters."

They were to be allowed to pick other people's brains in fact; hence the concluding words, which read—

"It would appear to be a fair and equitable arrangement to give to Government officials, whose patents are to be published in the ordinary way, the option of securing foreign patents for such inventions at their own cost."

This meant that they were to pick other people's brains, to work out inventions at the public cost, and to take patents out themselves and put the profits into their own pockets. Thus the Committee drafted a new code of morals entirely for their own benefit. It was just as if a Bishop were to swear an affidavit and file it—the effect of it being that he would not be bound by any of the rules of the Decalogue if he broke any of the Commandments, and then, having committed murder or some other offence, he were to produce that affidavit in his own defence and triumphantly claim an acquittal on the basis of it. It was perfectly ludicrous that they should be able to draw up for themselves a new code of official morals in that respect. But did the War Office accept anything of the kind? It was of no use their saying to the War Office beforehand that they were going to do a certain thing, if they did not tell the same fact to the private inventors who were to come before them. As a matter of fact the War Office knew nothing of that proposal until the half-yearly Report of the Committee was issued five months later. Was official sanction then given to that strange code of morals? The War Office ought to have thrown such a code of morals into the fire, but they covered it over with circumlocution and Minutes, and no reply was given. He was afraid when he questioned the Secretary of State for War on the subject that the right hon. Gentleman would have replied that although no official reply was written there had been verbal communications, and that in that indirect way the War Office had sanctioned the proposal. But to his relief no such suggestion was thrown out, but had there been any such statement he had in his hands a letter from Sir F. Abel complaining of the action of the War Office, and stating the damning fact that although a reply was frequently asked for, and although the Memorandum was re-presented in the first half-yearly Report, no communication was received by the Committee in reference to it. Thus no authority was given by the War Office.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): Silence gives consent.

MR. HANBURY protested against that, and said it might just as well be claimed that silence gave consent to the breaking of the Ten Commandments. If the hon. and gallant Member would look at the 13th paragraph of the Report he would see that the Committee itself asked for a new Regulation on this matter, thereby implying that they could do nothing without such a Regulation. He ventured to assert that they never had any authority for the War Office either to set up as inventors or to take out foreign patents. Let them remember that there were three Members of that Committee. Professors Abel, Dewar, and Dupré, all accomplished chemists. Was Professor Dupré present at the meeting of the 20th August, when the Memorandum was executed and sent in? It was a startling fact in connection with that subject that M. Dupré, who certainly was not the least talented of the three Members of the Committee, washed his hands of the whole transaction, and no patent had been taken out by him, while patents were taken out simply and solely in the names of Professor Abel and Professor Dewar. What was the next step after sending in the Memorandum which the War Office did not accept. This Committee were as judges to decide on the merits of the different samples of explosives submitted to them. Eight such samples had been sent in before the 10th July, and they were sent in by men who had no information whatever of the tests to which the samples were to be subjected, and did not know who were the men who were to act as judges. Mr. Nobel was one of the inventors who submitted explosives to the Committee, and he had since commenced an action in which he deliberately charged its Members with having infringed his patent. Another inventor, Mr. Maxim, who was invited by the Committee to send in his powder, beat all other competitors in the trials, but his explosive was not adopted because, as the Committee said—

This inventor had previously taken out patents for forming the explosive in strips or threads. As early as April 2, 1889—six months after they were appointed—Professor Abel and Professor Dewar took out patents of their own. The English patent was obtained for making a new explosive in cords or thread—hence the name “cordite”—which was exactly the form of the patent of Mr. Maxim taken out years earlier. In the same year Professor Abel and Professor Dewar took out three other patents, but one of these was rejected by the Comptroller because it was evidently the pick of another man’s brains, and it had to be altered a second and even a third time before it was allowed to pass. That patent dealt with the composition of the explosive, and would it be believed that although Mr. Maxim’s powder was rejected on the ground that the Government would not allow a powder to be introduced which had a basis of nitro-glycerine, these two gentlemen took out in their own names, and not on behalf of the Committee, patents for cordite, which contained more nitro-glycerine than any explosive known to England or to any foreign Power? He believed it contained 60 or 70 per cent. of nitro-glycerine. Now he came to a further and even more important point. One of the two further patents taken out by the same gentlemen was for the machinery used in the manufacture of cordite, and patents were also obtained in nearly every foreign country. They thus secured a double interest in this explosive. According to their own code of morals, as set forth in the Memorandum he had read, they said that if they were allowed to take out patents at home on behalf of the Government those patents would be made public at once. These were their own words—

“By taking out patents the Committee will secure to the Government the practical results of their official investigations, and private workers will at the same time have no excuse for complaining that they are kept in ignorance of the operations of scientific officials, who may anticipate them in consequence of the work carried out in secret with public money.”

Would it be believed that, although the patent for cordite was taken out on the 22nd April, 1889, it was never made public, but that, the Secretary of State for War having certified that it was for the public advantage that it should be kept secret, the patent was never disclosed until May 28, 1892, and therefore inventors had no means of knowing until that time that the foreign patents had been taken out? These gentlemen did not inform the inventors and they did not inform the War Office of what they had done. This was how the Committee carried out the Instruction that

These two Members did take out foreign patents, but they kept them secret.

ADMIRAL FIELD: With the sanction of the War Office.

MR. HANBURY said, they had no such sanction.

ADMIRAL FIELD: The Director of Artillery was informed.

MR. HANBURY : No ; he was not informed until two years after the patent was taken out. He was afraid the hon. Member had been misled by the very loosely written defences which had appeared lately in the columns of The Times. By keeping the patent secret they were enabled to take out a patent for the machinery for manufacturing cordite ; and they were also enabled to take out foreign patents and to keep them open so that the persons to whom they were transferred should have the benefit of the latest improvements. He wanted to know whether, if they were bound to transfer the cordite patent to the Government for home purposes, they were not bound to transfer the patent for machinery ? Then a very remarkable thing happened next. On the 22nd of July, 1889—three months after the application had been made for the patent to make cordite in this peculiar shape—Professor Abel, Professor Dewar, and Professor Anderson (now the Director General of the Ordnance Factories) applied for a patent for machinery for the manufacture of cordite. On the 1st of August, a week later, Professor Anderson was appointed to his present post at Woolwich, and the patent was not completed until six months after his appointment. He had received two answers from the Secretary of State for War in regard to that matter. The first was that Professor Anderson was not in the Government employment when he took out this patent. But the fact remained that he entered the service of the Government only a week later, and months before the patent was actually accepted. He was also told that Professor Anderson had no interest in the matter ; that he had transferred his interest in it to the War Office. He understood that the statement was not correct, and that the War Office authorities were not the only persons interested in the patent. When the transfer was made to the War Office other persons who were interested in the patent remonstrated, for Professor Anderson was only a shareholder in a limited company. The interest had eventually to be retransferred, and the Government were now actually paying a Royalty for using the machinery in the manufacture of cordite at Waltham. He ventured to assert that Professor Anderson continued to be deeply interested in the machinery and in the products of the patent after he entered the Government employ. On October 16, 1888, Professor Anderson held 508 shares of £100 each. In October, 1889, he had transferred 50 of these shares to his son, and in December, 1889, he transferred the remainder to his wife and to other members of his family. Therefore, to say that Professor Anderson was not just as much interested in the patent as he was before was perfectly ludicrous. Did the right hon. Gentleman, when he stated that Professor Anderson had surrendered his interest in the patent, know that the shares had only been transferred by him to members of his family ? He laid stress on that point, because this was a case in which the men who had to judge what was the best explosive for this country were directly interested in foisting their own cordite on the country. They had not handed over the patent for the machinery to the War Office, and they had, therefore, an enormous interest in recommending an explosive that could be manufactured by their own machinery. He did not think the inventors who were invited to compete with cordite at Walthamstow were told of these patents. He was told that the publication of the three later patents was not disclosed till long after inventors had sent in their samples. But was there any effectual competition ? As showing how far these impartial judges would allow any other explosive to come into competition with their own, he knew of two cases in which competitors had applied month after month to have their explosives tried and were refused, although they offered to supply everything in the shape of guns and rifles. If the Secretary for War wished he would give him privately the names of those two competitors. But was the competition itself bonâ fide ? Competitors were obliged to send in their samples within four weeks of the issue of the invitation, though they knew nothing about the rifle or the cartridges, or about the conditions of the explosive which they were to supply. It was utterly impossible to have a fair competition on that basis. Now he came to the foreign patents. Did the competitors know how deeply their judges were pledged to cordite by the fact of their having taken out the foreign patents ? Just as the inventors had been deceived when they entered into a sham competition, the War Office in their turn were deceived. He had in the handwriting of Professor Abel that patents were taken out in Germany on June 16, 1889, nine months after the Committee began to sit; in France on June 15, 1889; in Belgium on June 15, 1889; in Italy on August 24, 1889; in the United States on August 20, 1889; in Austria-Hungary in June, 1889; in Switzerland on June 25, 1889; and in Sweden on August 21, 1889. Patents were also taken out in another country, and he wondered that Professor Abel had not mentioned that country, and that was Russia, on August 11, 1889. Surely that was the country to which, last of all, he ought to have sold the patent. Why, he should like to know, was mention of that fact omitted in the published document? If Professors Abel and Dewar had no War Office authority for selling these Government patents and official secrets to Foreign Powers they came within the Official Secrets Act, and ought to be prosecuted for betraying official secrets. It was monstrous that men occupying an official position should betray these inventions to foreign countries. He wanted to know how far the War Office knew of this? The evidence was that for two years even the Director of Artillery did not know, and that for three years the Secretary of State for War did not know. Professor Abel, in a letter, said that he was in a position to show that the War Office knew that he and Professor Dewar were taking out these patents. If so, the Committee ought to have the names of the officials to whom the fact was disclosed. Thus, in taking out these patents these two gentlemen did a gross injustice to the War Office, to the inventors who came to compete without knowing that their judges were interested parties, and to the public, because in 1889 they had determined on cordite, which was not adopted in the Service until May 28 of this year. Four years, which might have been profitably employed in finding out a new explosive, were thus wasted. Now he came to the defence made by the War Office for this strange state of things, and on this he would press the Secretary for War to tell the Committee why a distinction was drawn between the cordite patent and the machinery patent, and why the latter was not conveyed to the War Office. In the strange defence that was put forward on the part of Professors Abel and Dewar the aid of the British taxpayer was first called in. It was said that his purse was affected to the extent of £500,000. But it was a remarkable fact that this cordite should be of such value to England, when the result of the foreign patents, according to Professor Abel's statement, was only £828 during all these years. It did not look as if foreign countries viewed cordite as a valuable invention. Then it was said that if this suit were lost the British taxpayer would lose an amount varying from £500,000 to £1,750,000. No doubt it was a formidable lawsuit, but the Patent Act did not deal with the particular case that had arisen. No doubt if a man took out a patent, and if the Government adopted it, the Treasury could decide what reward should be given; but when a patent had been infringed, and a large quantity of cordite had been made, it would not be for the Treasury to say how much should be paid to Mr. Nobel for having his brains picked and his ideas stolen. It would be for a Court of Law to settle that, and that was how the loss of £1,750,000 might arise. It was all nonsense to try to get the aid of the British taxpayer. He did not want to be the receiver of stolen goods. If he was not fairly entitled to these patents it was ridiculous to make appeals to his pocket. The defence went on to say—

"You must not hamper Professors Abel and Dewar in any way, because this is an important lawsuit, and the dynamite combination is both wealthy and influential."

But why should all these inventors be leagued together, unless they felt that they had been treated with gross injustice? Next the defence went on—

"Do not attack Professor Abel and Professor Dewar. They are your champions. They are bound to defend this patent."

Yes, but at the cost of the country. The War Office was going to find the money for them, so that they might defend the foreign patents just as much as the home patents. The writers of the defence seemed to ignore the fact that there was a third Member of the Committee who had declined to soil his fingers by taking out patents. Then it was asked—

"What are we to do? At once to encourage investors by buying indiscriminately any and every smokeless powder brought to our notice, or take some powder at the inventor's valuation? It was easy, and might have been made a lucrative course to do so."

Of that last remark he complained bitterly. Insinuations of that kind ought not to be made.

"Professor Abel is doing his duty to the country, and through a long public career has stopped many designs on the public purse."

If the War Office had that information they ought to have disclosed it; otherwise the statement had no value whatever; and he should press the right hon. Gentleman for an answer as to that. It was to the public interest to know when inventors went wrong just as much as when public officials did. Then it was asked—

"Why did not these men use their right to oppose the issue of the patent that embodied their ideas?"

Because the War Office kept the matter secret for three years. How could they object when the specifications had never been made public? It was perfectly ridiculous to put questions of that kind. Next it was said—

"It is also easy to talk at large of the advantages conferred by an official position for picking brains, but nobody has pointed out where these advantages are to be found."

He ventured to assert that the advantage was to be found very easily. Well, he would like to know what private inventor had the opportunity of getting 18 other inventors to go and submit their inventions to him? Mr. Nobel said that he put everything frankly, without reserve, without any concealment, at the disposal of the Committee. A good deal was made in the defence of the assistance given by Sir Andrew Nobel. Now, he did not like to see the Elswick firm drawn into official connection with the War Office because that firm were manufacturers of guns; and if they could give a certificate to the War Office patent for cordite the War Department officials in return had an opportunity of giving them orders for guns. Thus the certificate could have little value in his eyes. It was a matter of fact, however, that although Sir Andrew Nobel was able to give a certificate as to the value of cordite for British Government purposes, the Elswick firm had a different explosive of their own which did not contain nitro-glycerine at all, and which was a French invention. Then the defence went on to say that the Committee were not responsible for cordite being finally chosen as the Service powder. It was explained that—"It was selected by the Military Authorities after trials carried out by officials specially deputed for the duty by the Secretary of State."

The answer of the Secretary of State for War to that was that the chemical tests and everything involved in judging how far these explosive compounds carried out the requirements of the Government and the War Office was decided by this jury of three men, whose Report was handed to the Director of Artillery, and by him sent through the Adjutant General to the Commander-in-Chief. Eventually, the Secretary for War approved the adoption of cordite. There was, in fact, no Court of Appeal so far as the chemical aspect of the question was involved. There was only one other statement in the defence with which he wished to deal, and that read—

"The Memorandum published by The Times shows that the War Office was fully cognisant of the intentions of the patentees from the very first."

He thought he had disproved that by showing that the War Office had totally ignored the suggestion of the Committee that the Members should be allowed to take out foreign patents. It was further said that no importance ought to be attached to the secrecy of the cordite patent, because this patent was disclosed by the machinery patent in 1890. If so, why did the Secretary of State for War, a week before that patent was disclosed, certify, on his authority as Minister of the Crown, that it was to the public interest that the specification of the cordite patent should not be disclosed, and why was it kept secret for another two years? It was impossible to meet that argument. And what was the good of disclosing it then, when their own machinery patent was taken out? There was another reason still in the background for getting the Secretary of State to certify as he did—namely, that it enabled the patentees to get the benefit of modifications and improvements made in the cordite during two successive years. He was sorry to have to trouble the House at such length, but there was one other aspect of the case he wished to touch upon, and that was the effect of cordite on rifles.

Mr. Hanbury

He believed it was fatal to the Maxim gun.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not think the qualities of cordite can be discussed on this Vote. That matter arises on Vote 9.

MR. HANBURY said, he would not press that point. But he would like to call attention to a statement made by a gentleman largely prejudiced in favour of cordite, because he had a considerable interest in the manufacturing machinery. He regretted the Secretary to the Admiralty was not present at that moment, because Professor Anderson had made a startling statement in a lecture at Woolwich with regard to cordite, which had been adopted as Service powder for the Army and Navy. The Professor said—

“It is only this year that we have produced what may be called a Service cordite, and experiments now being carried on by the Ordnance Committee will show more and more what are the necessary precautions to be adopted in it. But the temperature is certainly one, and this has a very important bearing on the ship's magazine. For some reason best known to themselves the Navy put their magazine near their boilers to get them as hot as possible. That will not suit cordite at all. They will have either to shift their magazines or to stick to black powder.”

They were told the Admiralty had an idea that some preparation could be used to prevent the temperature in ships' magazines rising above 100 degrees. But three years ago they were told it was impossible to prevent that in India, or in ships passing through the Red Sea, apart from the effect of the magazines being between the boilers. Then how impossible it would be to store cordite on their ships unless the magazines could be shifted—which was not possible. Seeing that they had already spent over £200,000 on this explosive, and large quantities had been made for their ships, this seemed to be a very bad look-out. This raised a very important issue. He had adduced some remarkable facts, but there were still more remarkable facts behind which could only be properly brought out on oath in a Court of Law by Mr. Nobel and by those associated with him. He asked the Secretary of State for War to put an end once for all to the rumours of compromises that were going about. He was told that compromise after compromise was being offered to Mr. Nobel, and they knew what the influences at work must be. In March last the Treasury and the War Office offered to abandon the patents after the short period had elapsed for which fees had been paid. There were men connected with the War Office who naturally were only too anxious that all the evidence should not come out in open Court. He knew that even that very morning private manufacturers had received a Circular from the War Office referring to the lawsuit as a friendly suit as between Mr. Nobel and the War Office. Did the hon. Gentleman want the facts brought out in open daylight? This was not only a matter of honour, but it involved a large amount of the British taxpayer's money, and it ought not, therefore, to be checked by way of compromise.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Perhaps I can save the time of the Committee. The hon. Member's eloquence on this part of the subject is being entirely thrown away. If in any private or official communication I have used the expression “a friendly suit,” it is in the sense that both sides are anxious to prosecute the case as quickly as possible, not in a vindictive spirit, but in order to elicit the exact truth of the matter.

MR. HANBURY said, he was glad to hear it, but he was bound to say that he had seen official documents dated as early as March last stating that the Government were perfectly prepared to abandon these patents.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No.

MR. HANBURY said, the intimation did not come from the War Office, but from the Treasury; therefore, he warned the War Office to be on its guard against that Department. He wished to know whether the conduct of the case rested with the War Office or with the Treasury?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: With neither the one nor the other. It rests with the Law Officers of the Crown—that is to say, the Department of the Solicitor to the Treasury.

MR. HANBURY said, he believed the document to which he referred came from the Solicitor to the Treasury. He wished the right hon. Gentleman to be on his guard against a Department that went so far as to say, that it would sacrifice its patents, or only maintain them for the short period during which the fees had to be paid. That was half-way towards a compromise.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No such proposal will be made to any one without my sanction. When I said the case was in the hands of the Law Department, I meant that they would conduct it, but they will take no important step without my complete sanction, and no such proposal has ever received my sanction.

MR. HANBURY : I am very glad to have got that statement from the right hon. Gentleman, who is now pledged that neither the War Office nor the Treasury will compromise the suit.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I cannot answer for the Treasury.

MR. HANBURY : Then we have got no farther, and it may be compromised after all.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No.

MR. HANBURY : Will the right hon. Gentleman give a pledge that the case shall not be compromised ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Certainly.

MR. HANBURY said, in that case he had all he wanted, and he did not regret having brought forward the matter. He had intended asking the Secretary of State for War to appoint a Committee of Inquiry—not into the personal matter, but into the system as a whole, because they had had complaint after complaint from inventors, who said that they were afraid to go to the War Office or to any public Departments with their inventions, because they were never sure that they would have justice done to them, and that their ideas would not be borrowed, patented, and sold to foreign countries by some Government official for the benefit of the country, or, what was worse, for the benefit of his own pocket. In this way the country lost the advantage of much inventive genius. They could not get their best men to come forward with inventions. Rich inventors like Mr. Nobel could defend themselves, but poor inventors had no protection. This sort of thing had been going on for years. Treasury Circulars had been issued against this system, though they were now said to be obsolete, and the Commission presided over by Sir James Stephen reported that it inflicted injustice upon inventors. Therefore, if the present law-suit did not come to a head, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would grant a Committee, in order that all the facts with regard to the system generally might be investigated. The right hon. Gentleman would agree with him that the system was a bad one, and that even if there was no injustice done to the inventors those persons laboured under the idea that there was, and they were backed up by Reports of Committees and Commissions. His object was to see that the interests of the State were secured by securing the benefit of the inventive genius of the country, whether the inventors were rich or poor, and he hoped that the fullest inquiry would be instituted by the country. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he begged to support the observations of the hon. Member for Preston. He (Major Rasch) wanted to deal with the question of the applicability of cordite to the British Army. Cordite obtained its name from its similarity in appearance to thread or cord. It was composed of 58 parts of nitro-glycerine, 37 of cellulose or gun-cotton, and 5 parts of mineral jelly, such as vaseline. The basis of the whole composition was nitro-glycerine, which was one of the highest explosives known to science. No one who, like himself, had had any experience of the dynamite explosion in London in 1882 would doubt the power of the explosive. They had to remember in connection with cordite that in India nitro-glycerine could not be handled under a temperature of 70 degrees, and that when frozen in Canada it became an infinitely more violent explosive, and the explosive force exercising its power not in a propelling direction, but in a blasting manner, the probability was that when frozen it would burst the rifle without driving out the bullet.

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. and gallant Gentleman is going into the explosive qualities of cordite, which question does not come under the Vote.

MAJOR RASCH said that, under the circumstances, he would reserve his observations on that part of the subject. He would only say that, in his opinion, cordite was not suitable to the requirements of the British Army, seeing that the Army had to serve both in hot and cold climates. As to the way in which cordite was invented, hon. Gentlemen who studied the question would know that in 1888 a Committee was appointed by the War Office to go into the question of explosives in the British Army and British Naval Service. That Committee sat under the Presidency of Sir Frederick Abel. To all intents and purposes, the Committee was Sir Frederick Abel and he was the Committee. Inventors to the number of 17 or 18 exposed their inventions publicly before the Committee, and in about a year's time Sir Frederick Abel or the Committee evolved from the knowledge they had picked from the brains of these inventors a substance called cordite. The inventors who had submitted their various powders and inventions to the Committee got nothing. Cordite was invented by Sir Frederick Abel and his Committee. It was obvious that inventors could not be expected to submit their inventions to the War Office or to the Government if they got absolutely nothing out of the product of their brains; nay, more, if they saw their own ideas patented by someone else, and someone else making money out of them. With reference to the transfer of the patent in 1889, it was assigned to the War Office. He thought he was right in saying that two months afterwards another patent for the manufacture of cordite was assigned to a foreigner named Heitmann, who was resident in Cologne, but who was head of an explosive factory in this country and of several explosive factories on the Continent. What he (Major Rasch) wished to suggest was that even if cordite had been the absolute property of the Chairman of the Committee it would hardly have been according to regulations that the patent should be sold to a Foreign Power. But the cordite which the Committee evolved and produced was not their property at all. It was paid for by the taxpayer of this country, the cost being something like £200,000. Sir Frederick Abel and Professor Dewar had no right to sell the patent, whether they got £840 for it or £500,000. The accredited representative of the War Office at the time stated that the War Office had no knowledge that this patent had been assigned, and finally the Secretary to the War Office had stated, in reply to a Metropolitan Member, that the inventors were entitled to the profit just as much as any other inventor would be entitled to the profit of an invention sold outside the United Kingdom. He was astonished at the complaisance of the War Office in this matter. He ought to correct himself and say, having served many years in the Army, and some years in that House, that he was astonished at nothing that the British War Office did. Sir E. Hamley used to say that the War Office was an epitome of centralisation gone mad. He was not saying anything against the present Secretary of State for War, for he was sure if there was anyone in the House who wished in the Army the maximum of efficiency at the minimum of expense, it was the present Minister for War. In this case the War Office had surpassed itself. In the first place, it accepted an explosive which a great many people considered absolutely unsuitable for the British Army; and, in the next place, it allowed the patent for the manufacture of the explosive to be sold to a Foreign Power. Under the circumstances, he thought he was justified in saying the War Office had "gone one better" than it had ever gone before.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) said, he took a considerable interest in this question, partly because Mr. Nobel's factory of Ardeer was in his constituency of Ayrshire. The hon. Member for Preston had, in his opinion, made out a claim for the furnishing of full information to the Committee on this question of cordite gunpowder. If this information was not given, the Committee would know that a grave state of affairs existed, involving the public honour. What they represented to the Committee was that it was to the public advantage that inventors should be treated with common honesty, and that their inventions should not be filched from them. The Minute of 1872 made the matter quite clear, and the case of Mr. Nobel was a very striking instance of the way in which at least one inventor had been treated. The Minute contained the following:—

"My Lords consider that no officer should be called upon to judge, nor to give an opinion where his own interests may come into collision with those of any other person and that no inducement should be held out to officers employed in any Department of the Public Service to make use of labour or materials entrusted to them for the good of the Service in prosecuting investigations from which they themselves are to derive any pecuniary advantage, since it is evident that the opportunities enjoyed by such officers must suggest to them improvements, and it is only just that the public, by whose resources these improvements have been worked out, should have the benefit of them."

It was stated that this Minute had been superseded in 1883, but that fact was not generally known. Mr. Nobel submitted his samples of nitro-glycerine powder to the War Office in accordance with the Circular, which stated that, at all events, the samples would be dealt with in a fair manner. The hon. Member for Preston had referred to the value of the cordite patent, but no doubt the price was influenced by the fact that ballistite, which was another patent of Nobel's, was used abroad, its composition being 40 to 60 per cent. of nitro-glycerine and 60 to 40 per cent. of cellulose. The fact that Italy, Germany, Austria, and other countries used ballistite very largely might account for the small price given to Sir F. Abel for the cordite patent. This case formed a most striking instance of the way in which our inventors were treated. Mr. Nobel was the inventor of dynamite in 1867, and of blasting gelatine in 1875, and it was in consequence of these discoveries that the idea of using nitro-glycerine for propelling purposes was first entertained. After many years of toil and thought, Mr. Nobel first conceived the idea that nitro-glycerine might be used for small arms, and he took out a patent in 1888 for ballistite, which was quite similar to cordite. He was induced, by the Circular of 1872, to place the information before the Committee in the fullest, freest, and most unguarded manner, and he invited every kind of examination which the Committee chose to make of his explosive. The Committee drew up the Memorandum read out by the hon. Member opposite, in which they themselves laid down the principles which they relied upon. The principal paragraph was the following:—

"Relying confidently upon a proper defence of their proceedings in high official quarters."

He hoped the Committee would not have an "official" defence, and that the whole matter would be inquired into on its merits. Every fact should be brought out in an impartial manner before the House and the country. He considered that Mr. Nobel had been exceedingly hardly treated, because no sooner had the War Office obtained his patent than they set to work to make cordite, which was very similar to Mr. Nobel's invention. The Ardeer works in Scotland was the only place where nitro-glycerine was made. After succeeding in getting the patent, the War Office advertised in The Glasgow Herald for workmen as follows:—

"Nitro-glycerine manufacture. Required for Nitro-glycerine Factory at Waltham Abbey two thoroughly competent and reliable men, who have been specially trained in the manufacture of nitro-glycerine; the pay would be 30s. per week. Application in writing should be addressed to the Superintendent, Royal Gunpowder Factory, Waltham Abbey, Essex."

There was no other works than the Ardeer Works from which specially skilled workmen in nitro-glycerine could be obtained, and the result of the advertisement was that four or five of the most experienced and skilled men in Mr. Nobel's works were induced to leave his service, and enter that of the Government. That was a scandalous state of affairs, and he hoped the whole matter would be thoroughly inquired into on its merits. If this cordite was an infringement of Mr. Nobel's patent there had been a serious delay in bringing the matter to a decision in the Courts. The damages, he hoped, would be very heavy.

*THE CHAIRMAN (intervening) said, that was a subject of judicial proceeding, and the hon. Member was not in Order in discussing it.

MR. COCHRANE said, he thought the relations of Mr. Anderson, Director General of Ordnance Factories, with regard to the patent for the machinery used in the making of cordite required explanation. Recently specifications had been issued to the makers of explosives inviting them to manufacture a certain quantity of cordite for the Government. Those specifications, however, were worded in such a manner that manufacturers making cordite were obliged to use the process and apparatus which these gentlemen had patented. The Specification to govern Manufacture and Inspection, approved 14th August, 1893, was in these terms—

"1. Composition—the percentage composition of the cordite should be as follows:—Nitro-glycerine 58 per cent. ; gun-cotton, 37 per cent. ; mineral-jelly 5 per cent.

2. Ingredients.—The whole of the ingredients and materials used in the manufacture of cordite are to be of the description, and to have passed the tests, laid down in the Specifications in Appendices B to K.

3. Manufacture.—The manufacture of cordite from the weighing out of the ingredients to the final blending of the finished cordite is to be carried out in all its details in the same manner as at the Royal Gunpowder Factory, Waltham Abbey."

Such a state of things would require a great deal of explanation before the public would be perfectly satisfied. Men in positions like that of Director General of Ordnance Factories should be above suspicion ; it certainly was undesirable in the public interest that they should be able to send out specifications which induced manufacturers to think their manufactures would not be used unless they employed machinery which was patented by the gentlemen who would have to approve of the products. He did not wish to pursue this further. He should like to be informed what were the terms of the Report, which induced the Government to make cordite a Service powder. Why did not a Committee test the effect of cordite upon small arms before the powder was accepted, seeing that it had been two years before the War Office ? Was there any other powder which wore out small arms with greater rapidity than cordite ?

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, that many inventors were put to shifts in order to develop the conception of their brains, and it was very hard lines when their ideas were stolen from them. For 25 years he had had a good deal to do with inventors, and he had always warned them not to submit their inventions to the British War Office if they expected remuneration or reward. The House ought to do its best to protect the honest inventor. He wanted to know whether Sir Frederick Abel and Professor Dewar were the honest inventors of cordite powder ? He had very grave doubts about it. The hon. Member for Preston had produced documentary evidence to show that the whole transaction was of a very shady character indeed. They could not allow a high official to have a stigma of this kind upon him. The matter ought to be thoroughly inquired into.

These things happened not during a Liberal Government, but during a Tory Government, and he thought the hon. Member for Preston deserved the thanks of every Member for the pluck with which he had revealed the misdeeds of his own Party. The present Secretary of State for War was not responsible, but it would not do for him to burke the question now that he was in Office. There had been a good deal of trying to cover it up. He (Mr. Weir) had endeavoured to get some information in regard to cordite powder, but had got no satisfaction. The Secretary of State for War was a universal provider of war material for our forces, and as the British public paid high prices they had a right to expect a good article. It appeared to him (Mr. Weir) a shady mode of conducting business to keep the public ignorant of the patent for cordite powder for a couple of years, whilst they allowed the secret to be made known by permitting their experts to take out patents in foreign countries. The War Office said the invention must be kept secret, and yet Professors Abel and Dewar took out patents in several other countries. If the Government wished to keep the invention secret it ought not to have been patented at all, and certainly not in any other country. There were too many wooden-heads in the War Office, or they would have told Professors Abel and Dewar and Dr. Anderson that they would not allow them to carry out the policy they had adopted. If the officials of the War Office had been sharp business men they would have retained the secret and process of manufacturing cordite for themselves. He trusted that the Secretary of State for War would appoint an impartial and efficient Committee who would make an exhaustive inquiry into the subject.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) remarked that men of great distinction had been most unfairly and unjustly attacked by his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), and he was afraid there was a likelihood of the Committee being led away into a false issue. The Committee had nothing to do with rival inventors. All they were concerned with was whether his hon. Friend had made out his contention that certain distinguished men had contravened the Regulations under which they were serving. He admired the hon. Member for Preston ; indeed, he had a kind of political affection for him. His hon. Friend was a strong man all round. At the same time, a War Office official was to his hon. Friend very much what a red rag was to a certain animal. The moment a man entered the War Office his hon. Friend was ready to go for him, and to think he was incapable any longer of doing an honourable thing. His hon. Friend saw fraud or omission of duty in every act of such an individual. He (Admiral Field) had always been ready to act on another principle, and to believe that those who were in the Public Service were honourable men until they had been proved to be rogues. These chemical experts were appointed not on their own motion, but by the late Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope). His hon. Friend (Mr. Weir) seemed to be wild with anger with these distinguished men because they invented cordite. Why, that was the object of their appointment. They were appointed to invent a smokeless powder which would meet the requirements of the Public Service.

MR. WEIR (interrupting) said, his contention had not been that they ought not to have invented, but that, when they did invent, the invention should be the property of the State.

ADMIRAL FIELD, said that was just what it was ; the moment the invention was made by these distinguished men a patent was taken out and transferred to the War Office. One of the complaints of the Members of the Committee was that, having been appointed to suggest a smokeless powder, they received no definite instructions for their guidance. They were put in a position of difficulty, and instead of having anathemas hurled at them they really deserved sympathy. For his own part, he was satisfied that they had done their duty honourably and fairly. It was not the case that they had analysed all the compounds submitted to them. The inventors simply appeared before them and stated their inventions without submitting samples. It was perfectly true that Mr. Nobel explained his invention. He (Admiral Field) was a Member of a War Office Committee on Explosives 20 years ago, and he then formed a very high opinion of Mr. Nobel. The Committee, however, had nothing whatever to do with the rival claims of Mr. Nobel and Sir F. Abel. All it could do was to see whether there was any foundation for the charge that the Members of the Committee had been guilty of breach of trust. His hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury) stated that the Committee examined the inventions submitted to them, and reported upon them. That was just what they did not do. All the experiments were carried out by a Committee of officers down at Woolwich, the Members of the Scientific Committee not being present. The Committee of officers reported that cordite was the most valuable of the compounds submitted to them. Sir F. Abel's reputation was European, and everybody who knew that gentleman knew he was incapable of picking the brains of other men. As early as 1872 Professor Abel invented and patented the very first smokeless powder in the form of cartridges for rifles. At that time the Navy and Army did not care so much about smokeless powder as they did now, and nothing came of the invention. Mr. Nobel was the only inventor who made his nitro-glycerine powder really known to the Committee. In 1890 Sir F. Abel, in a lecture on smokeless powder, gave Mr. Nobel all the credit of being the first to bring nitro-glycerine powder to public notice, but said Mr. Nobel's invention did not fulfil all necessary requirements. Professor Abel looked further into the subject, and he and Professor Dewar patented a modification of Mr. Nobel's invention. If there was a dispute between Sir F. Abel and Mr. Nobel the proper place to settle it was a Court of Law, and not a Committee of the House of Commons. Not long ago War Office officials were able to patent their inventions, even against the Government. His hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury) was very angry with Sir F. Abel and Professor Dewar because they patented their invention in foreign countries. If they had not done so, Foreign Governments would have been in possession of the patents. It might be said that the Government ought themselves to have patented the invention abroad. If they had done this, his hon. Friend would have come down to the House with another wild charge against the Government for interfering with private trade. The charge hurled against these men was perfectly unjust. He was assured that they acted quite openly as far as their official superiors were concerned, and actually communicated with the Director of Artillery verbally from time to time, and were told to take out the foreign patents. In April, 1889, Sir F. Abel had a discussion with the Director of Artillery concerning the securing of foreign patents.

MR. HANBURY, interrupting, said, if Professor Abel was able to prove that he informed the Director of Artillery in April, 1889, that he had taken out these patents, that would be a complete answer; but he could not prove that, because at that time he had not taken them out.

ADMIRAL FIELD was informed that in April, 1889, Sir Frederick Abel had a discussion with the Director of Artillery concerning the securing of foreign patents, which eventuated in his receiving from the Director of Artillery verbal authority to take out certain patents. Therefore, seised as he (Admiral Field) was with this information, he felt very strongly that this attack of his hon. Friend was most unjust and most unfair. It was a very serious matter to drag eminent men on to the floor of this House, who could not answer the charge except by deputy, or through the officials of the Departments with which they were connected. If they were allowed to appear at the Bar of the House, they would, no doubt, be able to convince every honest man that the charges had no foundation. He knew his hon. Friend would not bring these charges forward if he did not believe them; but his hon. Friend's mind was poisoned by rival inventors, and they all knew how they felt towards one another. He believed Sir Frederick Abel, Professor Dewar, and their confrères were as incapable of any dishonourable action as his hon. Friend himself, and that was saying a good deal. He objected to such charges being brought forward, and these gentlemen termed, in a scornful way, "implicated officials," when they could not be there to answer charges for which he was convinced there was no foundation.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Haubury), in opening his case on this cordite question, used an expression which has only been too common during the last few weeks. He spoke of it as "the Cordite Scandal," and I think, in consequence of some remonstrance by word or gesture from me, he said that he would not call it a scandal till it had been proved to be so. I wish other people had acted on that principle, because I do think that it is very little creditable, and certainly not to the advantage of the Public Service of the country, that we should see on newspaper placards and elsewhere, in large letters, "The Cordite Scandal," when avowedly only one side of the case has been stated, and when that has been stated in an obviously ex-parte and partisan spirit. No one can doubt, Sir, the immense importance of the question raised—importance not only as it affects the result to the Public Service of the acceptance of cordite as a Service store, but as affecting the general character and practice of Public Departments. And I am very glad the duty of bringing it forward has fallen into the hands of the hon. Gentleman, who always does, to say the least, ample justice to any case of this sort, and in whose hands it will certainly lose nothing in point of vigorous demonstration. Turning to myself, I have been not accused, but a complaint has been made of the answers I have given to questions on this subject, and my hon. Friend the Member for Ross and Cromarty (Mr. Weir) especially complains of evasive answers. I am afraid I cannot give the answers my questioners would wish to have on all occasions, and when I fail to give the answers they desire they say I give an evasive answer. My effort has been to state the facts on every occasion. I have not been asked any question as to the rights or wrongs of any point, or as to the policy or justice of a case, but merely as to dates and facts. I took immense pains in order to make sure that I was correct in the answers I gave, and, having ascertained what the correct answers were, I gave them.

MR. HANBURY: Might I give one instance? My right hon. Friend told me distinctly that as soon as Dr. Anderson joined the Service he ceased to have any connection with the firm of Easton and Anderson. I think nobody, having heard that answer, would have thought he had simply transferred the whole of his shares in the company to his wife and family.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that what happened in that instance is what happens in many cases.

Easton and Anderson is a limited company, and one of the rules of the company is that the shares must not be sold in the open market. If he had to denude himself of his shares, to whom could they go?

MR. HANBURY: He kept his interest.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: His interest was not personal to himself, and what more could he have done than to take the course he did of handing them over to those to whom alone he could transfer them. It was the utmost he could do towards divesting himself of these shares, and there was no evasion at all in the answer. But, so far as I am concerned, the Committee will understand I have no personal responsibility whatever for any of the events that are under discussion. Everything in this matter, except my formal acceptance of cordite as a Service store, occurred before I came into Office. When I came into Office very naturally I made some inquiry into this case of cordite. I was almost immediately assailed by rival inventors who had other smokeless powders very much better than cordite, and were only longing for a more intelligent Secretary of State for War than had previously occupied that position in order that the enormous advantage of their powder should be at once established. I made my inquiries as to cordite—that is to say, as to the opinion and experience of the military officers around me of the results of cordite; and having ascertained that it had answered all that was expected from it; that the results had been better than had been expected from it in every respect; that all the tests it had been subjected to had resulted in its favour, and, above all things, that its stability was well established, and that it did not change under climatic influences—having ascertained that, and knowing that this prolonged and elaborate inquiry had taken place, and that, as my hon. Friend has said, £200,000 had been spent on plant and works to produce it, I say I should have been unworthy of occupying the position I hold if, because it was new to me, I had said—“Here are some people who say they have a better powder; let us throw the whole thing into hotch-pot and have a fresh inquiry and fresh experiments for another half-dozen years.” I say so long as I was satisfied with the opinion of my military advisers that it answered their purpose, I was bound to stand by it until there is reason to believe that a much better powder than it is available. That is my position on the general question. You, Sir, have ruled that we are not to discuss the qualities of cordite, but if it had been open to do so I have here all the particulars I could have given of it. That was the judgment I came to on the evidence submitted to me, that it perfectly answered its purpose, and therefore it was I shut the door to these clamorous inventors, and on some day last spring I accepted cordite as a Service store. So much for that part of the question. As I have said, I have no responsibility for the events, and I think I shall best consult the convenience of the Committee and my right hon. Friend and predecessor the Member for Horncastle (Mr. E. Stanhope) if I leave it to him to answer all the detailed points that have been urged by the hon. Gentleman as to the events of the past, as to which I have only secondhand information. Whilst that is so there is one thing I am responsible for. I may very well be asked: Surveying all these past transactions, do you think that the practice of your Department in these matters is right? As to that, I admit fully my responsibility and the obligation I am under to give my opinion. The hon. Member for Preston began his story by disclaiming any intention to say anything personally obnoxious of anybody, and yet I am bound to say that, although all through his speech he was telling what men of honour would do and would not do, he at all events succeeded in making it evident that in his opinion all the officials connected with these transactions are villains of the deepest dye. My hon. Friend said at the beginning he was attacking no one personally—

MR. HANBURY: What I said was this: that I should describe what these men had done; that I believed it was a thoroughly wrong thing to do, but that it was quite compatible with the system permitted by the War Office, and they were not transgressing the Rules. I said then what I say now—that I do not think they ought to have done what they did.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is very small salve to anyone's feelings to have a general statement of that sort proclaimed at the beginning, and then have a series of accusations brought against them with a constant commentary as to what men of honour would have done in the circumstances. Let me say this of Professor Abel and Professor Dewar: You may search, not only this country, but the world, and not find two men more qualified to decide any question such as was submitted to them in regard to this cordite. I should also include Mr. Dupré, whose name the hon. Gentleman did not introduce. Professor Abel, especially, is held by universal consent to be the highest authority on all military explosives. My right hon. Friend and predecessor had to appoint a Committee on explosives, and does anyone suggest he could have appointed better men than Professor Abel, Professor Dewar, or Mr. Dupré? Let me say this of Professor Abel: He has served the War Office and other Departments of the Government with the greatest fidelity and success for many years, and his reward has been exceedingly small when we think what he would have earned if, instead of accepting Government employment, he had started on his own private account, and reaped all the advantages which an eminent man like him would have been sure to have reaped. My hon. Friend went on to argue that they were appointed only to judge of the powders that were sent in. That is to say, they were to judge of the half-dozen, or dozen, or two dozen kinds of powder sent in, and if no individual powder came up to the requirements that were supposed to be necessary they were to bundle it all out, and say—"We will have none of this," and sit there with arms folded, and the Department was not free to apply—

MR. HANBURY: The right hon. Gentleman entirely misrepresents me. That is not what I said.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. Gentleman proceeded to say they had invented something in order to enable the Department to get the best powder they could have. Surely their duty was to apply their great powers to endeavouring to assist the Department in obtaining that powder; and if that was not what they were to do, then persons of less eminence would have been sufficient to conduct experiments, and have been fit to accept or reject individual powders submitted to them. They were picking men's brains, we are told. Whose brains? Let me separate Mr. Nobel at once, and I separate him because he is distinctly capable of being separated from anyone else. It has always been acknowledged, not only by the Committee, but by the Department and everyone concerned, that Mr. Nobel deserves the greatest consideration. Undoubtedly we owe very much to him for the main idea of these powders, and, therefore, I say I am as anxious as my predecessor was—and the Committee acknowledged it again and again—that he should be treated, as he deserves to be treated, with the greatest consideration. He alleges the definite point that by using cordite—by the manufacture of cordite—we are infringing his patent. That our legal advisers, learned in these matters, deny. His advisers assert that we are. What are we to do in these circumstances? Obviously a friendly suit at law is the best solution. I say friendly on purpose, because we have no hostility to Mr. Nobel, and I believe he has none to us. But he makes this assertion, and if he can prove this assertion we are bound to stand by the result and give him that compensation which is required. I do not touch in the least upon the merits of the case which is to be tried at law. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, I believe, set his face against any proposal to compromise or do anything except decide a great matter of that sort by a Court, and that not only for the main reason that the question was so important in itself that it deserved such treatment, but also that it would be an exceedingly dangerous thing for any Secretary for War to consent to any large pecuniary compensation in a case of that sort unless he had the definite authority of a Court of Law to do it. What the decision of that case may be we cannot tell. As I said, our technical advisers are very positive he has no case, and his advisers say he has. Let a Court of Law decide it. I can only repeat what I said interjectionally in the course of the hon. Gentleman's speech, that there is no desire whatever to compromise that action, and, on the contrary, the War Office has done everything it could since I have been connected with it to hasten it on. Before I leave this question of Mr. Nobel I should like to add a few words. I was asking who had his brains picked. Which of the inventors of smokeless powder, on a gun cotton basis, all of which have been discarded? Has anything been stolen from them? Not a thing; not an idea. And in the great majority of cases these were patented powders. The very meaning of the word "patent" excludes the idea of a secret. If a man has patented an invention anyone can go and see the specification and ascertain all about it, and there is no picking of brains or filching of secrets whatever about it. No one has alleged that in cordite there is anything stolen or borrowed from all the powders that were not on a similar basis to cordite.

MR. HANBURY: Maxim.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is rather breaking my own rule and trenching on the domain of actual facts, but the truth is that what Mr. Maxim invented was the passing of a plastic mass through holes in a cylinder in small threads for the purpose of expelling the air from it, and when that had been done it resumed the solid, or at any rate compact, mass in which it had originally been. He did not invent anything which left the explosive in cord form after passing through the cylinder. I do not wish to enter into the details of particular points. What I want to say is that we admit Mr. Nobel's claims to consideration. Notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Ayrshire implied, we have endeavoured in every way to treat him with that consideration. The little question about the employment of labourers, and so forth, had, I thought, been settled between his company and myself. I do not think any grievance or soreness exists on either side regarding that transaction. We await with patience, and I may add with hope, the result of the issue that is going to be decided between us. Now, as to patents—and I am reviewing all this from the point of view of the War Office, not from the point of view of the actual events—Professor Dewar and Professor Abel took out patents, and forthwith assigned them to the Secretary for War.

MR. HANBURY: Including the Anderson machinery?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes; that also was assigned. There was some hesitation or discussion about it between the firm and the War Office and

Dr. Anderson, but it was assigned to the Secretary of State for War.

MR. HANBURY: It was not re-assigned in any form. It was not assigned back, or any portion of it.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No; it was not re-assigned back, but, as I have said, there was a controversy about it at first. It is the rule now in the Public Service with regard to patents that, if any public servant takes out a patent, he must obtain for that purpose the consent of the head of the Department, and then must assign the patent to the head of the Department. And why? Because the whole matter being in a state of activity, anyone else who forestalled by a day that patent could immediately establish a claim for compensation from the Secretary for War; therefore, the moment anything was invented which was likely to be beneficial by a person employed by the Department, it was the most natural thing to patent it and assign it to the Secretary for War. They did not put a penny in their pocket by that transaction. It is alleged that, although it is not objectionable to take out a patent at home and assign it to the Secretary of State for War, yet it is a terrible thing to take out foreign patents. The War Office has nothing whatever to do with, and have no interest in, foreign manufacture. We are not going to manufacture any powder or buy any powder abroad, and, therefore, it is immaterial to us whether we have patents abroad or not. In that sense we have no interest in it. These patents were taken out abroad by these gentlemen at a time when anyone else might have taken their ideas and patented them abroad; and if it is alleged that they ought to have in that case also assigned the foreign patents to the Secretary of State for War I have to ask why should they do so, and what was the Secretary of State for War to do with them when he had them assigned to him? It was much better for the Secretary of State for War to steer clear of the whole matter, and have nothing to do with the foreign patents. As a matter of fact, it is well known that little profit was made or makeable out of this foreign patent. But I quite admit that, to my mind, it is an arguable matter what course should be taken with regard to foreign patents. I do not take the strong line of my hon. Friend. I think there is a good deal to be said on both sides. Let me again say that I am dealing with these matters from the point of view of the practice of the Department. I can only say it is a matter upon which I have an open mind. I have no strong opinion one way or the other; but excepting these foreign patents, which is an arguable point, at all events I am not aware of anything these gentlemen have done which can be said for a moment to have brought profits to themselves. Therefore, when we are told that they picked the brains of the inventors in order to make profit for themselves, I am sure they did not pick the brains of the inventors, and I have shown, so far as this country is concerned, and probably other countries too, there was no profit in this country, and very little probably in any other.

MR. HANBURY : My point is this : that whilst this process was kept secret in England, unknown to the War Office, they disclosed it to Foreign Powers. They took out these patents in 1889 long before it was made public in England in any shape.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. E. Stanhope) will no doubt explain. I do not think the hon. Member is right as a matter of fact. But, at all events, if a patent is taken out there is no secret. The hon. Gentleman talks about selling the secrets of our Government to Foreign Powers. There were no secrets to sell. The patents were open to all the world, and, therefore, Foreign Powers had every knowledge of our patents and all about them. There were no secrets. We have few secrets in this country, and those we have were disclosed by this transaction. I have not entered, and do not intend to enter, on all the details of dates and facts mentioned by the hon. Member. But I have dealt with the main issue, and on the main issue I find, first of all, that these eminent gentlemen were justified in inventing a powder for the assistance of the Government; secondly, they did not pick the brains of anyone; and, thirdly, where the idea or the general conception of the powder could be brought home to anyone, as in this case to Mr. Nobel, the War Office authorities had always felt that Mr. Nobel should be treated with great consideration. In taking out their patents these gentlemen were merely acting according to the authorised practice of the Government Departments in order to protect the public interest, and not to protect themselves, and having taken out the patents they were assigned to the Secretary for War. I ask the Committee confidently where is the justification for the assertions of a cordite scandal? The scandal is that such accusations should be brought against the Department, and against men who have loyally and successfully served the public, on such a very small basis of foundation.

MR. E. STANHOPE (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : I think the right hon. Gentleman has dealt fairly with this case, as he has dealt with every matter that came before him since he has occupied the Office of Secretary for War. I may say, in answer to the hon. Gentleman behind me, that, so far from desiring to keep the Committee in the dark as to the transactions with regard to cordite which took place during the time I was in Office, I shall be happy to afford all the information as far as I am personally concerned. I regret, Mr. Mellor, that owing to your decision I am prohibited from going into the merits of cordite, because I am sure it would be a great satisfaction to the country to learn the opinion of those who are responsible to the country for cordite as to the merits of cordite as an explosive. But I may be allowed to say a word as to the stability of cordite in answer to that portion of the case presented by the hon. Member for Preston. The stability of cordite is a subject of great importance. More than three years ago the War Office sent a specimen of cordite to India and to Canada. The authorities directed that an experiment should be tried in heat and in extreme cold, and under every possible condition of damp and other circumstances likely to affect the stability of the explosive. At the time when I left the War Office the Reports as to the behaviour of cordite, under these conditions, were exceedingly satisfactory. It is perfectly true, as has been said, that cordite labours under certain disadvantages when exposed to an extreme temperature. But to that temperature cordite need never be exposed, not even in India; and on board ships there is no difficulty in keeping down the maximum temperature of the magazines to 100 degrees. Therefore, cordite is practically unaffected by heat. I pass from that to the general question of the right of public servants to take out patents. Originally there was a Treasury Minute practically prohibiting Government servants from taking out patents. Everyone felt, however, that the Act of 1883 relating to patents altered the position of affairs, and it was thought that the state of things in regard to Government servants should be altered. A Committee was appointed consisting of representatives of all the Departments of the State who were connected with these questions. The Committee at that time recommended that permission should be given to take out patents by persons employed by the Government. The Circular of 1873 was rescinded and permission was accordingly given under certain conditions to persons employed by the State to take out patents, though it was recommended that when these patents were taken out they should be assigned to the Secretary for War. At a later stage, however, he was not altogether satisfied with the investigation to which this Order was exposed, and I called upon the Committee representing the various Heads of the Departments to re-assemble. The Committee again met, with the result that they were unanimous in their opinion to allow persons employed by the State to take out patents with the consent of the Heads of this Department, and to assign them to the Departments. That Regulation has since been acted upon. Why was that recommendation made? First of all, because you cannot practically prevent these patents being taken out. A. B., a public servant, makes an invention. You may say that A. B. shall not take out a patent; but what is to prevent A. B. going to C. D., who is not a public servant, and getting him to take out the patent in his name, a course which would even more injuriously affect the Department and the State? Secondly, it is of great importance that the Government itself, when an invention is made in its Service, should be protected against someone outside taking out a patent and immediately claiming a royalty from the State. The object of assigning the patent to the Government is to prevent royalties from being claimed against the Government in this country; and that, I submit, is an important consideration. But to come to the particular case under discussion, I must say that no more ridiculous charge has ever been brought against any public man than the charge made against Mr. Anderson, Director General of the Ordnance Factories. It is said that this gentleman has used his position in order to advance the interests of the private firm with which he had been connected. Now, what really happened? A member of a private firm makes a valued invention; that private firm has been accustomed to manufacture machines for the purpose of carrying on this kind of work for the Government, and it was, therefore, natural that those concerned in the invention of cordite should have turned to this firm in order to make a machine for the manufacture of cordite. That was done. Mr. Anderson invented a machine; application was made for the patent; and not long afterwards I, as War Minister, offered Mr. Anderson the position of Director General of Ordnance Factories. I made inquiries in every direction, and I found that Mr. Anderson was the man best qualified to fill one of the most responsible posts in the Service of the State. That opinion of mine has been more than justified, for it is now universally admitted that no better official has ever been appointed. Mr. Anderson has effected enormous improvements and economies in the conduct of the Royal Arsenal, and the opinion which has been formed of his abilities has been more than justified. Because Mr. Anderson was appointed to this post, I do not see on what ground the firm with which he has been connected should lose all right to manufacture machines. It would be absolutely ridiculous to make such a condition. Mr. Anderson has nothing to do with placing the contracts—more than I have at the present moment. The person who places the contracts is the Director of Contracts, and he came to me in the most straightforward manner and said—"I should like you to know the facts. Easton and Anderson are likely to have these contracts, and as Mr. Anderson was lately a member of that firm I wish to know do you assent?" I said that a firm which had done so much in the interest of the public had a right to the contracts. The firm, therefore, has a share, but only a share, in the supply of these machines.

MR. HANBURY : Not the whole of the contracts ?

MR. E. STANHOPE : About two-thirds of the machines are made by the Government themselves. I think that a very slender basis on which to found a charge of malversation against one of the most eminent of our public servants. I believe Mr. Anderson to be absolutely incapable of what has been alleged against him, and I venture to say that the Committee will require much stronger facts than have been yet alleged to induce them to condemn a man who has so ably served the public. Then there is the case of Sir Frederick Abel and Professor Dewar. When the question arose of choosing a smokeless powder, the person responsible was the Director of Artillery. The Director of Artillery came to me and said that he was absolutely incapable of choosing a smokeless powder by himself, and asked that a Committee of chemists might be appointed to report as to smokeless powder in general. A Committee was appointed—Professor Dupré, Professor Dewar, and Sir Frederick Abel. These gentlemen arrived very quickly at the conclusion that there was at that time no smokeless powder suitable for the Public Service, though they thought that one particular powder, composed mainly of nitro-glycerine, was the one which afforded a basis upon which the Committee might hope to achieve more satisfactory results. They communicated with Mr. Nobel, who was the inventor, and they asked him to continue the experiments with the object of making the powder suitable for the Public Service. After a certain time the Committee, who continued their own experiments, arrived at the invention of cordite. They believed that cordite was a powder thoroughly suitable in every respect for the Public Service, and they applied for a patent. That application came before me, and I granted leave for cordite to be patented in this country, the patent being assigned to me as Secretary of State for War. There were three patents taken out. Two of these were not kept secret at all. One was the process for manufacturing cordite, and the second was the machine for making cordite. The patent that was kept secret for a time was the patent which described the manner in which the material was drawn into threads or cords. I recollect that at the time there was a good deal of discussion between the Director of Artillery and myself as to whether it was desirable to observe secrecy. I wanted to make a secret of the whole matter, following the practice of foreign nations. I very soon found that it was impossible to keep the process of manufacturing cordite secret, and the reason why a portion of the patent was sealed was that at the particular time one of the officials of the War Office, who had been concerned in the experiments made by the Explosives Committee, was trying to sell their methods to an outside firm with the intention of using them against the Government. Within the next month the whole affair was made public. The machinery was patented, and everybody knew how cordite was to be manufactured. The hon. Member's charge of secrecy is based on the fact that, while everybody knew how cordite was manufactured, it was not until my attention was called to the matter that the decision to keep part of the patent sealed was rescinded. A great deal has been said about the time that has been wasted. There has been no waste of time in the matter. The British Army has to operate in countries of varying temperature, and, therefore, experiments extending over two years had to be conducted in Canada and in India, in order to make it clear that the stability of cordite was assured in intense heat and intense cold. The person responsible for the trials of cordite was the Director of Artillery, and he reported that cordite possessed better qualities than any other powder. In 1891 the Explosives Committee came to an end ; but experiments are still being carried on, not by people interested in the patents, but by the Ordnance Committee, which is composed of military officers of the highest experience, with a view to deciding whether or not cordite should be continued in the Public Service. I desire to say a few words about the foreign patent. Sir Frederick Abel in August, 1888, submitted a Memorandum on the subject to the Director of Artillery, which got into the newspapers. We have never been able to get an explanation of that circumstance from Sir Frederick Abel. The Memorandum certainly never reached me in that shape. At any rate, I should like to say, in justice to Sir Frederick Abel, that that does not affect his position. The Memorandum was included in the half-yearly Report, and no complaint was made of the Memorandum, so far as I know, up to the present time. I quite agree that a great deal can be said as to whether or not it was desirable that a patent should be taken out abroad. But there is no ground for accusing Sir Frederick Abel and Professor Dewar of selling secrets to a Foreign Power. There was no secret for them to sell.

MR. HANBURY: But there was.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I think my opinion on the subject is worth a little more than that of the hon. Member. I know that there was no secret whatever for them to sell, and, that being so, the charge against them on that point falls to the ground. The question may be put whether it is desirable or not that the patent should be taken out abroad? Again I ask, is it possible really to prevent it? A. B. having invented something in this country may tell the secret to C. D., who could immediately go abroad and patent it, and try to get the benefit of it. Again, the War Office cannot be expected to take out patents in all foreign countries in order that the benefits of the patent might be secured to this country; and if the inventor himself is not to be allowed to take out patents in foreign countries, what is there to prevent anyone borrowing the idea from the specification published in this country and patenting it abroad for his own benefit? I do not want to express any very positive opinion on the subject; but, having gone fully into it, I think it is not fair or just to cast these imputations on Sir Frederick Abel or Professor Dewar. I think I have now dealt practically with all the matters before the Committee. I felt that after these allegations of scandal and corruption it was the bounden duty of the right hon. Gentleman and myself to give such answer as we could to them. I must say I do think that in this country we ought to be very careful how we listen to the cries of disappointed inventors. They always find fault with the Government that rejects their inventions. It has been always so in the past, and will be so in the future. Let them, if they like, abuse the Government and say that their inventions are better than the one adopted, but do not let them without absolute proof charge against the officials of the Government that they have been corrupt in the manner in which they have discharged their duties, or guilty of scandalous action in connection with the manner in which a particular warlike material has been adopted. I have a belief in our Public Service, and some considerable experience entitles me to express it. I think that no body of public servants in any country is more entitled to respect than the public servants of this country. Do not let accusations be cast upon them gratuitously and without adequate proof which it is very difficult for them to answer, and which are listened to with an attention they do not deserve in foreign countries. At any rate, let careful inquiry be made into any case that may be preferred against them before they are stigmatised by the names these gentlemen have been stigmatised by. I have only one other word to say with regard to the action by Mr. Nobel which is now pending. I have from the very first, so far as I am concerned, deprecated the idea of compromise, though I admit I have been approached on the subject. Publicly and privately, while I was Secretary of State for War, I have met with reproach from many inventors, and have very seldom been left alone; but I have always held that the question should be tried in a Court of Law. I rejoice that the right hon. Gentleman opposite endorses that opinion, and I heartily support him in it.

MR. HANBURY said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War rather misunderstood what he said as to the matters the Committee set themselves to investigate. They were to test the various explosives, and then, in the last resort, to invent on behalf of themselves. But they reversed the process, and within six months of the Committee being appointed they actually took out a patent for an invention of their own. Then there had been no explanation offered as to the fact that Professor Dupré had had nothing whatever to do with these patents. The patents were professedly taken out by the Committee, but they were only taken out by two of the Committee. With regard to Professor Anderson, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Horn-castle had put into his mouth words he did not use. The charge he made was that a week before he was appointed Director General of Ordnance Factories he took out a patent, and that, although that patent was assigned to the Secretary for War, a portion of it was subsequently transferred to Messrs. Easton and Anderson. He admitted that the main charge was that referring to the foreign patents. As to that, he still maintained that it had not been met. In the first place, it had not been denied that these gentlemen took out those foreign patents and received royalties for them. He did not complain so much of that, because they might say the War Office knew of it, though, as a matter of fact, they knew nothing of it for two years afterwards. But what he complained of was this: that while this cordite patent was a secret in England, while the Secretary for War was carefully keeping it a secret and certifying up to May, 1892, that it was to the public advantage to keep it a secret, the patent was disclosed to nine Foreign Powers in 1889.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) expressed regret that the Secretary for War had been precluded by the Forms of the House from going into the merits of cordite. If the right hon. Gentleman had given an opinion to the House it would have received publicity. He believed they were making, to a certain extent, a leap in the dark as to the merits of cordite, and they ought to have some opinion on the subject. He could not think that it was a proper policy for the War Office to pursue to advertise for inventors to bring forward the best powders they could, and then, as soon as they got the ideas of the inventors, to take advantage of them and go on inventing on their own account. That was not a large and generous view to take. He thought it was a weak point in the argument of the Secretary for War that he approved of the question being wholly determined in the Law Courts. In an action the War Office might succeed in their facts, and yet the general idea of the patent might have been taken from someone else.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.), who was met with cries of "Divide!" said, this was a serious question concerning the Public Service. He deplored attacks made upon men in the highest position in the Public Service, who could not answer for themselves. His hon. Friend had levelled a number of charges against those men, and when the matter came to be examined the charges came to nothing, so much so that he did not believe his hon. Friend would divide the House. That Members of Parliament should take up superficial newspaper attacks was a most unfair thing towards those who could not answer in the House for themselves, and the House ought to defend old public servants from such scandalous attacks.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis), who also was interrupted by cries of "Divide!" said, the Committee had always expected attack. In their Memorandum of August, 1888, they said that they would inevitably come under the stigma of not being impartial Judges, and "they must make up their minds to be indifferent to such imputations."

But it appeared they were not indifferent to such imputations now. They said that they must "rely confidently upon a proper defence of their proceedings in high official quarters."

They had now had a defence from both Front Benches, high authorities; from the hon. Member for Islington, a still higher authority; and from the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Admiral Field), the highest authority, who had shown himself as good a lawyer as he was a seaman. He much regretted that the Secretary of State for War had not been allowed to go a little further into the subject of the merits of cordite. He must point out that the Admiralty officials were at this moment stating that it was "an unstable compound," and he would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman's opinion of cordite was as favourable as formerly?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The same, but stronger.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES could not understand, then, how it was that all the official scientific lecturers were preaching the doctrine that it was an unstable compound. He himself very much doubted the merits of cordite, and believed that before long they would have to give it up and go back to black powder.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) wished to call the attention of the Committee to a detail of administration by the Secretary of State for War which had inflicted a great hardship upon many workmen of the artisan class in Birmingham, the dismissal in unfair proportions of workmen employed at Sparkbrook Factory. There were two Small Arms Factories, the one at Enfield the other at Sparkbrook, and the claim he urged was that the men in either place should be equally treated in the amount of work. Of course, when the demand for rifles had decreased, there must be reduction in the number of employés engaged in the manufacture, and the late Government had faithfully followed the principle of dividing such orders as there were equally between the two factories. The falling-off began during the time of the late Administration, and there was 20 per cent. reduction all round in the number of men employed, but the present Government had made a reduction at the rate of two to one against the interests of Sparkbrook. In June, 1892, there were 2,100 men employed at Enfield, and in July, 1893, the number was 1,987, so that 123 men were discharged during the 12 months. At Sparkbrook the reduction during the same period was 198—namely, from 657 to 459. In answering a question upon this matter, the Financial Secretary, in justification, said the Enfield men were working five days a week instead of six, while, he understood, the Sparkbrook men were working full time. Upon this last point the hon. Gentleman was misinformed, and, as a matter of fact, the men at Sparkbrook, especially those on piece, were in some cases working four days, or at least less than a week. But, even accepting the statement of the Financial Secretary, and taking off a sixth of the number of men discharged at Sparkbrook, it would make 165, allowing for the short time at Enfield. On that basis, if the Sparkbrook men were reduced at the same rate as the men at Enfield, then there should have been 38 discharged from Sparkbrook instead of 165. If they took the men who should have been discharged at Enfield in the same proportion that they had been discharged from Sparkbrook, then there should have been 500 discharged from Enfield instead of 120. That showed it was an unfair proportion. In answer to a question a week or two ago, his hon. Friend admitted the excess there was of discharges at Sparkbrook, but said there were greater chances in Birmingham of men getting employment. But his (Mr. Jesse Collings') answer to that was that it was well known that trade of the particular kind to that upon which these men were employed was very bad just now, and the result of the policy of the Secretary of State for War was that, instead of these men—who, in his opinion, had been very unfairly treated—being able to get other employment, they were now walking about the streets reduced to the condition of non-employment, with all the necessary evils attendant upon it both to their wives and families and themselves. As a justification of their policy the Government said that more work was given to Bagot Street. That answer was not sufficient. Bagot Street was a place where arms were specially repaired, and there was only an apparent increase at Bagot Street. The year before the present year there was an abnormal lowering of the Estimate, and all that the Government had done now was to place Bagot Street in the position it was in before that lowering occurred, but he wished to point out that Bagot Street had nothing whatever to do with the question. They might as well have said, in justification for discharging the men from the Small Arms Factory at Sparkbrook, that they had given more employment to men who were making glass bottles in some other factory. The two factories were under different Votes and sub-heads, and his hon. Friend might as well have said they had given more employment to Enfield because they had increased the Vote for war purposes. His hon. Friend said that the fact also ought to be taken into account that there were a variety of other articles made at Enfield which were not made at Sparkbrook, and, therefore, more men were employed. That was no answer at all, because when the factories were in full swing, and double the money was voted to what was voted at the present time, the turn-out of swords, lances, and machine guns—which were not made at Sparkbrook—was very small, and he questioned whether the whole amount of such articles would come to £10,000 all told. Therefore, that was no answer; but even if it were, they were speaking of the working men employed in the two factories, and what they contended for was that they should be treated fairly and upon an equitable basis. He hoped the answer they would receive would be a promise that these men who had been unjustly discharged from Sparkbrook should be reinstated to the extent that they should be brought up to the same proportion as those employed at Enfield. That, he thought, was a very moderate and fair request—one founded on justice, and one that would remove a great deal of indignation on the part of these men. Another point on which he wished information was whether it was the intention of the Government to close the Sparkbrook Factory as a manufactory and to turn it into a mere repairing shop? If that was what the Government were going to do it was a very serious policy; and from an answer to a question, he understood that such a policy was at any rate in contemplation. He was told, in the answer to his question the other day, that Sparkbrook was originally acquired as a repairing shop. He would not go into that question now, as he had previously shown that that was not the case—that the Sparkbrook Factory was bought for a mere song, something like £60,000, on the express understanding that it should be retained as a manufactory for small arms; and if the policy of turning it into a repairing shop was entertained, he thought there would be a serious blot on the Army administration of this country, and that in a time of danger very great difficulty might arise owing to the policy that had been pursued. What was the position of things? The factory at Enfield was exposed, and had no resources of minerals, whereas the factory of Sparkbrook was situate in the Midland Counties, surrounded with minerals, was a first-class factory, filled with the best machinery, and fulfilling all the requirements set forth by the Royal Commission. Sparkbrook had an area of 21,000 square yards, with a large amount of land that could be obtained at a moderate price adjoining, and which could be used to increase the factory if it should be thought advisable to remove the repairing shop from Bagot Street to Sparkbrook. What he wished to know was whether the Government were going to abolish one of the two Royal Arms Factories, or whether Sparkbrook was to be partially abolished? On the grounds of economy, on the grounds of national defence, on the grounds of good administration in Army matters, he hoped there was no truth in the idea that the policy he had indicated was to be carried out. The next question was whether the right hon. Gentleman would rectify the injustice that had been done to the working men of Bordesley, and whether they would be restored, but only in the proportion that would put them upon the same level with the other Royal Institutions? At present, as he had said, the discharges had gone on at the rate of four times the proportion of those at Enfield, and that, he thought, was not fair. He hoped they would get a satisfactory reply from the Government, and he could assure the Secretary of State for War they would not be satisfied with anything less than a promise to reinstate the men in the same proportion as the men who were employed at Enfield. He would not move to reduce the Vote, as it was not his object to reduce the salary of the right hon. Gentleman, but he had felt bound to call attention to the matter, and he hoped to obtain a satisfactory reply.

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hauley) hoped his right hon. Friend would permit him to reply, as he was charged with the administration of the Manufacturing Departments of the Army. Though he was not sure that he should be able to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman, he hoped to be able to make such a statement that would show they were acting in a spirit of perfect fairness between the two factories. During the 10 years ending in 1891 the number of workmen employed in these factories had been more than trebled, and the expenditure had been proportionately increased, but now they were forced to go through the extremely unpleasant and uncomfortable process of bringing back the expenditure to something like its normal condition. His right hon. Friend had pressed him from time to time with regard to the claims of the two rival factories, Enfield and Sparkbrook. He had told the right hon. Gentleman that the numbers at Enfield and Sparkbrook had been reduced, but he would like to call the right hon.

Gentleman's attention to the fact that on the accession to Office of the present Government the number of men employed both at Sparkbrook and Enfield were considerably increased. So reluctant were they to bring about any diminution in the employment that the numbers were kept up, and the maximum amount of wages was paid all through the winter, until the close of the month of January. Now, his right hon. Friend said they were starving Sparkbrook unfairly in proportion to what was being done at Enfield. If a comparison was to be made between the two factories, it must be between the manufacture of rifles at Enfield and Sparkbrook, and they were bound to leave out of sight those employed on other implements of war. But he was willing to dismiss that consideration and give his right hon. Friend the figures he desired. He (Mr. Woodall) had prepared a calculation showing the number of men employed in the two factories in the corresponding months of last year and this year. For instance, in August, 1892, there were employed at Enfield 2,246 men. That number had been reduced in August of this current year to 1,798. That, as his right hon. Friend would see, was a reduction of 20 per cent. In numbers the actual reduction at Sparkbrook had been 38 per cent., the figures being—men employed in August, 1892, 724; in August, 1893, 449. Then in regard to the actual wages paid, he had obtained the figures, though they had not been asked for by his right hon. Friend. At Enfield, in August last year, the amount of wages paid was £4,245 per week, and in the same month of the current year it was £2,856, or a reduction of £1,389, which worked out at 32·27 per cent. reduction, or very nearly 33 per cent. But what were the figures at Sparkbrook? In August last year the wages paid were £985 per week, and in August of this year the wages paid amounted to £695, which worked out at 29·44 per cent. reduction. These figures, he thought, bore out his statement that at Sparkbrook the men, as far as possible, were kept on full time, whereas at Enfield they played on Saturday. He could not quite understand his right hon. Friend's objection to the introduction of Bagot Street into the discussion. He knew that Sparkbrook was in the constituency represented by the right hon. Gentleman; but if the right hon. Gentleman would be good enough to recall the statement made by the Secretary for War when discussing the Estimates, he would remember a distinct pledge was given by the Secretary of State to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that the diminution at Sparkbrook should, as far as possible, be compensated for at Bagot Street. What were the facts? At Bagot Street the wages paid in August, 1892, were £246 10s. 2d. Those wages increased until, in the corresponding period of the current year, they reached £454 16s. 8d., making an actual increase of 84·5 per cent.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked if the hon. Gentleman would give the amount paid in wages before 1892?

*MR. WOODALL said, he should find it very difficult to give offhand everything his right hon. Friend wanted; but if the right hon. Gentleman would follow it up with questions from time to time, he would be delighted to give the figures he desired. Taking the month of July last, and comparing it with July of 1892, he found the increase at Bagot Street was 116 per cent. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the men had been unjustly discharged.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he did not refer to individuals having been unjustly discharged, but he said it was unjust to the men as a body that they should be discharged in four times as large a proportion as at Enfield.

*MR. WOODALL said, he could not for a moment accept his right hon. Friend's figures. The right hon. Gentleman had talked of its being unfair, of the men being unjustly discharged, and he had called on the Government to rectify that injustice. He (Mr. Woodall) protested that the War Office had acted in a spirit of the greatest fairness, and that it was a matter of extreme regret to diminish the number of workmen at all. He would promise that during the remainder of the present financial year there would be no further dismissal of men from Sparkbrook, and that those who remained would be kept in full employment as far as possible. He (Mr. Collings) on a previous occasion had assumed that Bagot Street was to be closed, and Sparkbrook converted into a repairing factory; but as nothing yet had been determined in regard to the future of the two Factories, he was not able to afford either satisfaction or dissatisfaction to the right hon. Gentleman in this matter. As the number of magazine rifles required became manufactured employment would, of course, become less and less, and there would be no excuse for keeping on the men. It was impossible for them to undertake to find employment for men when there was no work to be done. He sympathised with the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the matter, and he might add that he, as a Member for a Midland constituency, had some interest himself in the welfare of the working people of Birmingham, and he was not likely to do anything that would go against their welfare. The Government were, however, considering what best could be done to maintain the Sparkbrook Factory. The matter was still sub judice; but it would receive the most perfect consideration from the Secretary for War, and his intention was to arrive at a decision which should not overlook the interests of Birmingham, while at the same time they were bound to have due regard for the welfare of the Public Service.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, he thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Woodall) was under some misapprehension with regard to Sparkbrook, and he would earnestly press upon him that before disposing of this matter he should pay a visit to Sparkbrook Factory, and see what were its capabilities.

MR. WOODALL: I have visited both Sparkbrook and Bagot Street Factories, and seen their condition for myself.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS said, in that case he thought the action of the Government all the more wanting in excuse. It seemed to him little short of absurd to regard Sparkbrook as a repairing station. It had been fitted up at considerable cost for the manufacture of the magazine rifle, and he strongly objected to the policy of reducing it to a mere repairing station. If it were only a repairing station, why were they to be put to such cost for the manufacture of magazine rifles? A considerable sum had been expended in this direction. Under these circumstances, he thought the Government should continue their old policy, instead of looking at this matter in a new way. Here they had a factory capable of producing 600 rifles per week, and possibly, under pressure,

1,000 rifles might be turned out. Why should such a place be regarded as a mere repairing station? Reference had been made to a comparison of the wages paid at Enfield and Sparkbrook, but that did not show the actual state of affairs. The wages paid were no indication of the number of men employed. A larger number of persons were employed in proportion at Enfield than at Sparkbrook.

MR. WOODALL: No.

MR. WILLIAMS: Well, all he could say was that the number of persons discharged at Enfield was only 38, as compared with 165 at Sparkbrook. He objected altogether to the policy of the Government in regard to Sparkbrook; but on the point of fairness, he held that the artizans of Birmingham had not been treated as those of Enfield, and he trusted that in any future arrangement by the War Office they should have no reason to complain. He appealed to the Committee on that point, and hoped they would place the men on an equal footing.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, the Secretary of State for War would learn without any surprise that it was his intention, in connection with this Vote, to bring before the Committee the question of the recent selection for the command at Aldershot, and, therefore, he need not offer any apology to the Committee for taking the course he was about to do with regard to it. The appointment of the Duke of Connaught was, he thought, absolutely unique. The Service journals almost without a dissentient voice agreed that it was an unsuitable, regrettable, and unfortunate appointment; and in the daily Press there was practical unanimity as to the unsuitability of the appointment. Indeed, an organ of the Liberal Party, with great candour and courage, had informed the Government that it was nothing more nor less than a discreditable job. In these circumstances, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would hail with satisfaction the opportunity he desired to afford him of putting before the Committee all the reasons that could be adduced on behalf of the appointment, which had been received with such expressions of dissatisfaction and alarm. He desired to make it distinctly and absolutely clear that the protest which he would make against the appointment was not actuated in the slightest degree by any feeling of hostility towards the distinguished person who had been appointed; and it was only fair for him to say that, as far as his own observation went and as far as his knowledge of the feelings of military men went, he thought that there were very few of our Generals who enjoyed a greater amount of personal popularity throughout all ranks of the Service than did the Duke of Connaught. This, however, was no personal matter, and those who thought with him wished to consider the appointment purely from the point of view as to whether it was the best appointment that could have been made in the interests of the Army and the public. The view that would be taken of this appointment must be judged entirely by the character of the Aldershot command; and, indeed, had the appointment been one at Devonport, York, Plymouth, Edinburgh, or any other Provincial Military Centre he should not have deemed it his duty to bring the matter under the notice of the Committee. But the Aldershot command was one of the most important that we had at our disposal. In some respects it was equal in importance to the post of Commander-in-Chief. Why was this so? Simply because Aldershot was the great military training school of the Kingdom and the great testing station of the Army, through which from 10,000 to 12,000 men were passed every year, and it might make all the difference between an efficient and non-efficient Army whether or not we had a General at Aldershot who was capable of discharging the duties of the post. His contention was that we ought to have at Aldershot, in the first place, a man who from actual personal experience was acquainted with every detail of every branch of the Service; and, next, a man whose opinion would receive weight not only at the War Office, but throughout the country. In these circumstances, the appointment ought to be bestowed upon the very best man that could be obtained. Was the Duke of Connaught absolutely the best man that the War Office could obtain? If it could be proved by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that the Duke of Connaught was at the time of his appointment the senior available officer, the case in His Royal Highness's favour would be established, although he quite admitted that the appointment ought not always to be regulated by seniority. He desired to lay before the Committee a few facts which might serve as a useful guide to them in arriving at a decision upon the point. He found that Sir Donald Stewart took 41 years to become a General, Lord Wolseley (whose promotion was hastened by his distinguished services) took 30 years, Sir Archibald Alison took 43 years, Lord Chelmsford 44 years, Sir Peter Lumsden 43 years, Lord Roberts 39 years, and the Duke of Connaught 25 years. He was aware that the Aldershot appointment was only a Lieutenant General's command; but, looking at the question from that point of view, he found that Sir George Greaves took 41 years to become a Lieutenant General, Lieutenant General Davies 39 years, Lord Clive 37 years, Sir Richard Harrison 38 years, Lieutenant General Buchanan 42 years, while the Duke of Connaught had taken only 21 years to become a Lieutenant General. From these facts the Committee would be able to judge how far seniority ought to be put forward as a reason for this appointment. The plea of seniority in the case implied one of two propositions: either His Royal Highness was superior in military capacity to every living or dead General, or that the seniority was spurious and fictitious. Then, when the Duke of Connaught went to Aldershot, every principal officer on his Staff would be senior to him in service and experience. The Assistant Generals would be, one seven years and the other six years, his senior; the Major General commanding the Artillery would be 18 years his senior; the Colonel commanding the Royal Engineers would be 11 years; the Major General in command of the Cavalry 13 years his senior; and of the three officers commanding Infantry brigades two were 14 years his senior and one 13 years. An objection against this appointment was that the Duke of Connaught had not had that active military experience which was necessary for the post. He served with his regiment in Egypt, and since then he had an important command at Bombay; but these cases furnished him with no real active experience. Another objection was that His Royal Highness had not time to discharge the duties of the important post at Aldershot, and he (Mr. Dalziel) contended that the man who ought to have been appointed was the man who would have nothing else to think of but the Service, and who would give all his time to the command and live in camp. It was rumoured that a Chief of Staff was to be appointed after the Duke of Connaught took over the command, but he hoped that rumour would be denied by the Secretary of State for War. The War Office ought to have looked round to ascertain if they could not find a Lieutenant General for the post, but he would probably be told by the right hon. Gentleman that no Lieutenant General was available for the post. If that were so, it would be an extraordinary admission to make—that of all the distinguished Lieutenants General the Duke of Connaught was the only man who could have been removed from his other duties to take this office? He would presume no Lieutenant General was available, but surely there was ample precedent for making a Major General available. He would, however, come to the possibility that only Generals were available, and here he must say a word with reference to the replies given by the right hon. Gentleman regarding a name that had been introduced in connection with this command. He meant that of Lord Roberts. What was the excuse that was given on behalf of the Commander-in-Chief for the non-appointment of Lord Roberts? He presumed it would be admitted that of the two men, Lord Roberts and the Duke of Connaught, that Lord Roberts, with his vast military experience, his great skill, and his personal connection with all branches of warfare, would have been preferable for the appointment. They were told it would have been derogatory to the dignity of Lord Roberts, or of the office of Commander-in-Chief in India, which he had held, to accept the Aldershot command, but it would have been well to bear in mind the saying that, "Your dignity is like your liver; you never know you have any till something goes wrong with it"; and he thought Lord Roberts, who was prepared to accept the appointment, might very well have been left to take care of his own dignity. The right hon. Gentleman knew that Lord Roberts was prepared to accept this command, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was more derogatory that Lord Roberts should have placed all his military knowledge at the disposal of his country by accepting the command than that he should have been allowed to knock practically unanswered at the door of the War Office. He thought the point of dignity would not stand examination for a single moment. If the War Office had been anxious to have anybody else than the Duke of Connaught, dignity would have been brushed aside. They had it on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman that there were only three commands that could be taken by an ex-Commander-in-Chief—Malta, Gibraltar, or Dublin. He (Mr. Dalziel) thought Lord Roberts was perfectly right in declining the post at Gibraltar or Malta. He had no authority to speak on behalf of Lord Roberts, and he thought Lord Roberts deprecated the introduction of his name into this discussion; but he had to point out that in considering this appointment they could not leave out the claim of Lord Roberts, and therefore he was compelled to bring his name forward. It was impossible fully to consider this appointment without at the same time considering the claims of Lord Roberts. Malta and Gibraltar had been refused, and only Dublin was available for Lord Roberts. He supposed there was no suggestion that there would be a vacancy at Dublin for some years to come. Until Dublin became vacant the country was not to have the advantage of Lord Roberts's experience and advice. He had said that the man appointed to the Aldershot command ought to carry weight throughout the country. He would read a short extract from a paper which would carry more weight than anything he could say. He referred to that eminently respectable authority The Spectator, which said in a recent article—

"Who can pretend that the recommendations, suggestions, and earnest representations of the Duke of Connaught would have one hundredth part of the weight which would belong to those of a man of Lord Roberts's standing? In the one case they might be pooh-poohed as the vapourings of a person little better than an amateur. In the other, they must at least be considered. . . . The country at large could not be got to say, 'The Duke of Connaught asks for this, and he really knows what is wanted; please do it,'—for the very good reason that no one would be persuaded of the truth of the proposition."

If he had not some consideration for the time of the Committee he could quote from 20 representative journals, Conservative and Liberal. The quotation from The Spectator represented the views expressed by a large body of journals throughout the country. He had seen it stated that an apprehension existed below the Gangway that this was only a step towards the post of Commander-in-Chief, and that a satisfactory assurance would be given on that point. He himself was totally unaware of any apprehension on the subject. He could not believe that anyone could suppose for a moment that an assurance on that point would satisfy the protest intended to be made against the appointment. He thought he would be a very bold and a very great Minister indeed who would come down to this House and, in face of the Report of Lord Hartington's Commission, announce the appointment of the Duke of Connaught as Commander-in-Chief. He knew it was impossible for him, in connection with this Aldershot appointment, to get at the real expression of the opinion of the House of Commons. There was a remarkable number of noticeable absentees amongst the Members of the House who usually took a prominent part in military discussions. He knew, to some extent, what the reason was, and he respected it. At the same time, he thought it unfortunate that the gentlemen who had in private spoken out strongly against this appointment were not now present to express their opinion in public. He could not help thinking that the case would have been different if this appointment had been made by a Tory instead of by a Liberal Government. In that case he was sure it would ere now have been brought before the House as a matter of definite and urgent public importance. He should ask the Committee to say that this appointment was not in the interests of the Public Service, and he asked those who believed that special favour had been shown to the Duke of Connaught to join with him in making this protest, and thereby helping to dispel the notion which was growing in the ranks of the Army and throughout the country that Royal favour was a surer passport to military distinction and responsibility than years of faithful and distinguished service.

COLONEL WARDE (Kent, Medway) said, he would not apologise to the Committee for taking part in the discussion, because he never had hitherto taken up the time of the House of Commons. He felt bound to protest against the course pursued by the hon. Member who had proposed the reduction of the Vote, and especially against the statement that the Press of the country was unanimously against this appointment. If the hon. Member had based his objection to the appointment solely on the ground that no member of the Royal Family ought to receive any appointment such an objection might have been understood. Inasmuch, however, as his objection was based on the assumed fact that there were other officers in the Service whose claims ought to have been preferred, and who were more qualified for the appointment, one could not help believing that he must be very ignorant of the subject with which he had attempted so dogmatically to deal. His (Colonel Warde's) professional knowledge, he thought, qualified him to raise his voice on this occasion. He had been nearly a quarter of a century in the Army, and had served on more than one occasion under the Duke of Connaught. He asserted without fear of contradiction that the position of the Duke of Connaught was unique, because not only had His Royal Highness served through two grades in the Cavalry, and through every grade in the Infantry, but he had held two appointments on the Staff of the Army, and had also held the unique advantage of serving in both of the Ordnance Corps—an advantage not within the reach of any other officer. His Royal Highness had served his country in the Army for 25 years, and had held no fewer than six appointments as General Officer commanding troops. He had served his country in all quarters of the globe, and altogether he was unusually well qualified to take the command of a mixed body of troops, either at home or in the field. Before the time when His Royal Highness became a cadet he was carefully trained by an eminent officer, whose name had always inspired esteem since he won the Victoria Cross before Sebastopol—Sir Howard Elphinstone. The hon. Member (Mr. Dalziel) either made a slip of the tongue or betrayed his ignorance when he said the Duke of Connaught served with his regiment in Egypt. The Duke did nothing of the kind. He served in command, as a General, of a brigade, and in that capacity had charge of the reserves at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. The reserves were selected from the most seasoned and highly-trained troops placed under a most careful and reliable General, and in case of a reverse they would be called upon to make a supreme effort to retrieve the fortunes of the day. Therefore, His Royal Highness occupied on that occasion a most responsible and proud position. Supposing the Duke of Connaught was not the senior officer who could be appointed to the Aldershot command, was it not the case that seniors had frequently been passed over? Objection was taken when Wolfe was selected to command the expedition to Quebec on the ground that he was not the senior officer. It was also represented to George III. that he was mad. "Begad," said the King, "I wish he would bite some of my Generals!" In days gone by, when Lord Wolseley was selected to command an expeditionary force over the heads of his seniors, was his appointment objected to? Lord Roberts—and he (Colonel Warde) yielded to none in admiration for that distinguished officer—was also selected over the heads of several of his seniors on more than one occasion. Was his appointment on those occasions objected to? No; the fact was that the real objection to the Duke of Connaught was because he happened to be a Prince of the Blood Royal.

MR. DALZIEL said, his objections were not against the Duke of Connaught as a member of the Royal Family, but because he believed undue favour had been shown towards him.

COLONEL WARDE regretted that he had misunderstood the hon. Member. He, in common with the hon. Member, when he entered that House, took the oath of allegiance to the Sovereign, and he congratulated himself that the first opportunity he had of raising his voice in the House was for the purpose of protesting against the growing tendency of a portion of the community to belittle the services which any member of our Royal Family might have rendered to the State. He believed it would be a disastrous day for us when our people should cease to encourage the Royal Family to take an interest in or espouse the Service which in times gone by had done so much for the Empire.

MR. DALZIEL: As I did not move the reduction, may I do so now?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Dalziel.)

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, he was sure it would be a subject of regret to hon. Members opposite if the Committee felt itself unable to accept the nomination of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy and The Spectator newspaper for the rather important command at Aldershot. He rather thought the hon. Member had protested too much: he had set up a dummy, and then knocked it down again. He seemed to say that there was only one Lieutenant General in the Army—i.e., the Duke of Connaught. He could not think where the hon. Member got that idea.

MR. DALZIEL: I never made such a statement.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD said, he certainly understood that to be the view of the hon. Member; but, of course, he would withdraw the remark. The hon. Member was, no doubt, a most excellent Radical, but, as a soldier, he objected to his making the Aldershot command the cockpit of his political opinions. The hon. Member had stated that he did not make any allusion to the Duke of Connaught on personal grounds, or because he was a Prince of the Blood, but it certainly seemed to many Members of the Committee that the real objection was to be found that the Duke had what was supposed in these days the misfortune to be a Prince. Had there been in this country a law which, as in France, prevented the Princes of a certain dynasty holding Army appointments the objection might have been logical, but they were bound to bear in mind the fact that the Duke of Connaught accepted service in the Army under the belief that if he properly carried out the duties of any subordinate positions he might fill, and if he showed an aptitude for command, he would be eligible for higher and more responsible posts. The hon. Member for Peterborough made an unworthy insinuation the other day when he asked where was the Duke of Connaught at Tel-el-Kebir. The answer was that the Duke was where he was ordered to be. If ordered to the front he would have been there and done his duty, the same as any other Englishman.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he had asked how far from, or how near to, the actual fighting the Duke was.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD said that was the gravamen of his complaint, for the insinuation was that the Duke was not in the fighting line. If ordered into the fighting line, the Duke would have been there; but it was impossible for all the Generals to indulge in a free fight to secure that position. As it was, the Duke had command of the Reserves, which was a position of extreme delicacy and importance. At one time it was said as a joke we only had one General; now the idea appeared to be that we only had two, but he was sure Lord Roberts would be the last man to insinuate that there were no other Generals perfectly able and fit for the command at Aldershot. It was hardly complimentary on the part of hon. Members opposite to interfere with the discretion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs. He had always looked upon the Secretary of State for War as a strong Radical, a modern Cromwell; but he believed he was capable of exercising a wise discretion. He certainly was not a man likely to yield to Court pressure, as had been suggested, and beyond doubt he had filled the post with credit to himself and advantage to the Service. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had stated that the commanding officer at Aldershot should be an officer who had had experience of all branches of the Service. Well, the reply to that was, as the hon. and gallant Member for the Medway Division had stated, that the Duke had had exceptional advantages in that respect.

*MR. BURNIE (Swansea, Town) supported the Motion. He put to the Secretary of State for War the first question on this subject some time since with all sincerity, and without having any animus against the Duke. The replies given struck him as very unsatisfactory, and he was convinced, from what he had since heard, that whatever might be the arguments used by hon. Gentlemen that evening, the country would never be impressed with the idea that the appointment was a bonâ fide and a correct one. Questions had been put by the hon. Members for Gateshead and Peterborough with regard to the Duke's service at Portsmouth, the length of his various leaves of absence, and his services in Egypt, but there was a practical question still more worthy of consideration in the interest of the Army itself. Aldershot, it should be remembered, was a training camp for active service. He did not desire to throw doubt upon the Duke's personal courage, but he was sure that if ever this country were again engaged in a great war, it would be thought undesirable, as a matter of State policy, to allow any Member of the Royal Family to take the command of the troops in the field, one State reason being that if our Army were by any chance discomfited while under the command of a Prince, the people might begin to find fault with the Court, and a very serious feeling might arise even against the Sovereign. Aldershot was one of the most important posts in the Service; the duties were most onerous, and surely it would have been better to have selected for the command the officer who had the greatest experience and training, and who had seen more active service. He was not there to champion the cause of Lord Roberts or anyone else. The appointment had been defended on the ground of seniority; but he could not help remembering that while the Duke of Connaught had reached the position of General in 25 years, it took Sir Donald Stewart 41 years, Sir Archibald Alison 43 years, Lord Chelmsford 44 years, and Lord Roberts 39 years. Was it likely that but for the accident of birth—that but for being a son of the Queen—the Duke would have had this rapid promotion? He knew it was stated that this being only a Lieutenant General's command the Duke would only receive the pay of a Lieutenant General. But was it likely he would be long content to receive £1,000 less a year than he was entitled to as a General? They could well understand the pressure that had been brought to bear on the right hon. Gentleman, and they regretted that he had not had the courage to withstand it. He seemed to have forgotten that he was a Member of one of the best Governments they had ever had, from a democratic point of view, and he did wish that the right hon. Gentleman, holding such a responsible position, had ignored the accident of birth, and had treated the Duke of Connaught as he would have treated any other officer. Had he done that, the Duke of Connaught would certainly not have received that appointment. It had been suggested that if the Motion were carried the Secretary of State for War would resign. He hoped sincerely he would do nothing of the kind in such an event, for they all recognised his administrative ability and his geniality. Everything fitted him for the post he held; but certainly it would be better for a Minister to resign than for a Government to be wrecked. It would be regretted on all sides if the right hon. Gentleman took the Debate as a personal attack. That certainly was not the intention of those who had initiated it. They sympathised with the right hon. Gentleman in the position in which he was placed; but they felt bound to go into the Division Lobby against him, because they believed the appointment was in direct antagonism to democratic principles and a disadvantage to the Army.

*COLONEL MURRAY (Bath) said, he wished to remind the Committee that the Duke of Connaught had gone through every step of rank, from lieutenant to his present position, in the course of his 25 years' service, and had served in almost every branch of the Service. He had served for several years at Aldershot before in command of a brigade; he had held commands at Portsmouth and Bombay, and had served with the utmost distinction in every appointment he had held. The hon. Member had told them the Duke would never have had the appointment had he not been the Queen's son. The right hon. Gentleman had denied that impeachment, but the allegation exposed the real ground of the hostility to the appointment. The hon. Member for Peterborough asked the other day the exact distance the Duke was from the firing of the Egyptian troops. He believed the distance was not exactly measured in yards, but he could say that the Duke was under fire. He had himself seen the Duke marching and bivouacking before the enemy, constantly expecting attack, and it certainly was not the Duke's fault that the attack was not made. Besides, it should be borne in mind that an officer on active service might do valuable work without being constantly under fire. He would say nothing as to the suggestion that Lord Roberts should have been appointed. He had the advantage of serving under that distinguished officer in India. He had just relinquished a very important command, and there could be no necessity for giving him another command immediately on his arrival in England. Further than that, Lord Roberts would, he felt sure, be the last person to find fault with this appointment.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he, like the hon. Member for Swansea, was dissatisfied with the appointment, not because the Duke was a Member of the Royal Family, but because he felt a better choice could have been made. Some days since he put on the spur of the moment a question as to the distance at which the Duke of Connaught was from the fire of the enemy at Tel-el-Kebir. He was now told that the Duke was actually under fire, but he was sorry to have to controvert the statements of military gentlemen opposite, because they did not seem to know anything about the matter.

COLONEL MURRAY: I may inform the hon. Gentleman that I was present on that occasion.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, that the testimony of the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not coincide with the information he had from another gentleman who was present. He had in his hands the statement as to the events previous to the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, showing the exact position of the troops.

ADMIRAL FIELD: Are we called upon to discuss the Egyptian Campaign?

*MR. A. C. MORTON, continuing, said, that the Duke of Connaught was ordered into the rear with the Brigade of Guards, which was in the fighting line, and did not take any part in the advance of that night. An Irish regiment took the place of his brigade in the fighting line.

MR. HARE (Norfolk, S.W.): I was present myself, and that account is incorrect. The hon. Gentleman's informant seems to be mixing up the battle of Kassassin with the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. The battle of Tel-el-Kebir took place about sunrise. The Duke of Connaught commanded the brigade in which I served, and he was certainly under fire.

*MR. A. C. MORTON, of course, accepted what the hon. and gallant Gentleman said, but his information was not exactly the same. However, he did not want to go any further into the matter. He did not blame the Royal Duke. If he had been in his position, and with his prospects, he did not think he would have got any nearer the real fighting than the Duke did. But, with respect to the Aldershot command, he did not wish to treat it as if it were the case of Lord Roberts. The Committee had a right to criticise any Government who made a bad appointment to an important office. He did not say that they had a right to force Lord Roberts on the Army or on the Government; but they had a right, when they considered a bad appointment had been made, to protest against the appointment, especially if they thought it was done as a matter of favour. Their duty as Radicals was to fight against privilege, and to do away with privilege in this country. Every man—and woman, if they liked—should be treated according to their merits and not according to their birth, and therefore for all such appointments the best men should be selected. If he were a military man he should consider the pushing aside of capable soldiers and the selection of the Duke of Connaught for the Aldershot command as an affront. He was surprised that military men had not spirit enough to resent such a state of things. It was more insulting to military men than to anybody else. He believed they had good, capable military men in the country whose services ought to be recognised; and they should insist that when honours and emoluments were to be given away they should be given to men who did the real work and who could be depended on in case of need. There was a strong belief entertained that the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to Aldershot was but a step in the direction of making him Commander-in-Chief. One of the most important recommendations of the Royal Commission, over which Lord Hartington had presided, was that the office of Commander-in-Chief should be abolished; and that the Secretary of State for War, who was responsible to the House and the country, should be the real head of the Army. He would, therefore, like to hear from his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War whether the Government intended to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission?

*MR. BUCKNILL (Surrey, Epsom) said, the discussion had been interesting and amusing. He was quite prepared to take as his text the words of the hon. Member for Peterborough—"A Member of the Royal Family should be placed on the same footing as any other officer in the Army."

Mr. A. C. Morton

*MR. A. C. MORTON; I said, "any other citizen."

*MR. BUCKNILL said, the officers of the Army were generally citizens. He had yet to learn that any special favour had been shown to the Duke of Connaught. That really was the point; for if the Duke was a competent officer to hold the appointment which had been given to him, there could not in reason be any ground for complaint. They had heard of the qualifications of the Duke as a soldier from hon. Members well entitled to speak on the subject; and he, too, was personally aware that the Duke had qualified himself at Woolwich with distinction for service in the Royal Engineers and the Artillery. The fact was that the Duke was probably more highly educated as a soldier, outside the battlefield, than any man in the Army, and, therefore, absolutely competent in every respect for the Aldershot command. There was not a single Member in the House that could suggest that the Duke of Connaught was not an excellent officer, or a most popular officer, or a most industrious officer. It was said that the opposition to the appointment was non-political. He should say, with all respect, that he did not believe it. Hon. Members opposite knew perfectly well that these appointments were not always given by seniority. The hon. Member for Peterborough had quoted history in an amusing fashion. The hon. Member spoke about the campaign in Bombay.

*MR. A. C. MORTON: I did not say a word about the campaign in Bombay. I spoke about the Bombay command.

*MR. BUCKNILL said, he had taken down the words of the hon. Gentleman, and he was in the recollection of the Committee. When hon. Members got up to make speeches on delicate matters like this they should be particularly careful of the language they used. The hon. Member had also declared that he did not press the case of Lord Roberts. They all agreed as to the distinguished career of Lord Roberts, and if Lord Roberts had received this appointment the whole country would have been satisfied. But if the hon. Member did not press the case of Lord Roberts he was left only with the plea of the incompetence of the Duke of Connaught. The hon. Member could not get away from that logically. And if the hon. Member did not press the case of Lord Roberts, and could not make good the incompetence of the Duke of Connaught, where was he? Logically, he was on his back. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had said that all he wanted was fair play for all. He quite agreed with that sentiment. Let there be fair play to all; and let them not be unfair to a man because he happened to be a Prince of the Royal Blood. The real objection to the appointment was that the Duke was of the Royal Blood, though hon. Members opposite had not the courage to say it in so many words. They said the Duke was unfit for the command at Aldershot. He believed hon. Members did not really know what sort of a place Aldershot was. He did, for he had been there scores of times. Aldershot was a large training establishment, and, of course, of great importance as a military station; and if the Duke of Connaught—as had been admitted to be the case—was going to visit his post daily to discharge his daily duties, was it not a miserable plea to complain that he was going to live in a house a few miles off? The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy seemed to hold three briefs in this matter. Did he hold a brief for Lord Roberts? Did he hold a brief against the Duke of Connaught? Did he hold a brief for the rest of the British Army?

MR. DALZIEL: For the country.

MR. BUCKNILL said, the hon. Member said he held a brief for the country. He was reminded of what had been said in another place—"What did the country know about the hon. Member?" What instructions had the hon. Member from the country to make the statements he had made? To him, as a Tory, it was not altogether unagreeable to see the Government attacked by its own supporters; but as he considered the complaints against the appointment of the Duke of Connaught groundless and unjust, if there was a Division he would have great pleasure in supporting the Government.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is with no small satisfaction that I find this opportunity provided for me of explaining more fully than I have had yet occasion to do the full and true circumstances of this case. The questions that have been from time to time addressed to me on this subject were questions of fact, and I answered them as such; and I find that I was gibbeted in certain newspapers as having given a wretched and poor account of it, no adequate reason, and a bald and altogether disappointing story. I gave no story. I only answered individual interrogations put to me. I will, at all events, take this occasion to correct an error into which a phrase I have used apparently induced some to fall. I said that the Duke of Connaught was selected for this command by the Commander-in-Chief, and it was immediately said—"Oh, yes, by his own cousin; and the Secretary of State for War is so poor a creature that he was not able to resist the Commander-in-Chief. Everyone who knows anything about it is aware that all the higher appointments and promotions in the Army are made subject to the approval of the Secretary of State for War. Every one of them has to receive my initials before it can be acted upon; and in the case of all the more prominent appointments such as this one, the selection, although made by the Commander-in-Chief—for that is the proper and official phraseology to use—is discussed and considered beforehand between the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State, and it is with the Secretary of State's full consent and authority that the Commander-in-Chief submits the appointment to him for his formal approval. Therefore, this appointment is not the appointment of the Commander-in-Chief, but of the Secretary of State. I have every whit as full and as direct a responsibility in the matter as the Duke of Cambridge, and even in some respects a more direct and higher responsibility; and, therefore, I am glad now to say why it was that this appointment was made. The Committee might have expected to hear two objections raised to this appointment. First, because the Duke of Connaught is the son of the Queen; but that view of the question has been repudiated. It was also supposed that the attack might have been grounded on the theory that Lord Roberts would have been the proper appointment; but, again, the hon. Member who moved the reduction, although he dwelt on that side of the question, dissociated himself from any intention to bring prominently forward the name of Lord Roberts. I think there are three considerations to which the Committee might be invited to look. First of all, there is the question of the fitness of the Duke of Connaught for the command; next, the question of seniority; and, lastly, the question of alternative. As to the fitness of the Duke of Connaught for this command, I say that, to the best of my knowledge, military judgment is not divided on the subject at all. I have not been able to learn any opinion of any consequence in any quarter which would condemn the appointment. From the private soldier up to the General, through all ranks of the Army, the opinion is, and it has been expressed to me fully from quarters quite outside the circle of my military advisers, that he is admirably fitted in every respect for the post. I received a letter the other day from a distinguished General who is on the Retired List, and therefore of whom it cannot be said that he had anything to gain or lose by expressing his opinion—a General of whom I will say that he is about as competent a judge as exists in the country from his experience of warfare in Europe and Asia. My correspondent, after stating that the Duke had been grounded in every branch of the Profession, said—

"He has always shown special aptitude for the tactical training and instruction of troops, and he is, therefore, in all respects the General Officer of all others specially fitted for the command of a camp like Aldershot."

That is only one opinion among many. As to the contention of the hon. Member for Peterborough, that an officer should have been under fire in some engagement in order adequately to fill such a position as this, the view appears to be taken by the hon. Member that it is the duty of a General to prance on a horse in front of the assembled Armies, and and to reproduce what we are familiar with as the tactics of the days of the Trojan War, by challenging some leader on the other side to mortal combat. I may be allowed to make my contribution to the history of what occurred at Tel-el-Kebir, and I share with my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough the advantage of being entirely innocent of any personal experience in the matter. Lord Wolseley's plan of attack was to advance against the entrenchments in two lines. The first line was to deliver the attack; the second line was to be in reserve and follow it up if the first line was repulsed. The Duke of Connaught was in the second line, and most soldiers will agree that the chances were that the second line would have quite as much of the fighting as the first. The first line delivered the attack before 6 o'clock in the morning, when it was still dark. The Egyptian soldiers fired right manfully, but it being dark, and their rifles being sighted for a long distance, the whole of their fire for many minutes fell on the second line, and the Duke of Connaught, who, according to the hon. Member, was in a place of perfect safety, had his orderly bugler wounded beside him, which was proof that he was not altogether out of the range of fire. But this aspect of the case is really beside the mark. He is not any better nor any worse for having been under fire. He is a good deal the better, however, because of his having commanded a brigade in that short campaign, because the duties of a General's command are not limited to the mere moment of combat, but involve all the responsibilities, through many days, of providing for, and preparing, and bringing up, the troops under him. Besides, the Duke's experience in India has been extensive. He commanded a Division in India, and he subsequently commanded the forces in the Bombay Presidency. I have heard this spoken lightly of to-night. All that I can say is that again and again I have heard from officers who served in the Bombay Presidency at the time, not only of his great popularity and of his mastery of his profession, but of the enormous pains he took to discharge his duties. I have been informed that he learned the native language in order to be able to communicate more freely and easily with the native troops under his command, and in every respect he devoted himself with great zeal and success to all the duties which fell to his lot. This constitutes quite a sufficient experience and qualification for such a command as Aldershot. The Aldershot command has been magnified in the public Press and this House as if it were some command of immense dignity. It is a place of drill and training, and, therefore, the qualities of tactical instruction and training possessed by the Duke emphatically justify the appointment. I wish also to point out that Aldershot is a place which is peculiarly under the eye and superintendence of the Headquarter's Staff. The Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant General are constantly there and constantly superintending and advising, and—I say it in no offensive sense—interfering with the General Commanding the troops, and on that account also it is not a place of such dignity as some others that might be named. These, then, are his qualifications: The Duke of Connaught has worked hard at his profession while he has been in the Army, and with great success; but apparently—not in this House, I am glad to say, but out of it—he is held to possess one disqualification—that, namely, of being the son of the Queen. Instead of that being a disqualification, we ought to rejoice that a son of the Queen should be in a position to be even thought of for such a command; we should rejoice that, instead of devoting himself to a life of ease and self-indulgence, as he might have done, he has lived this hard and useful life in the service of his country. Therefore, I say that the best opinion that I can obtain amply justifies this selection. But selection was not necessary. I am not afraid of selection, and I am quite prepared to dip pretty low down in the list in order to get a better man than can be found at the top of it. I can appeal to the case, referred to to-night, of the appointment of Sir George White, who was only a Major General, to the command of the forces in India. There was no necessity to dip on this occasion. I took the Generals' List as I found it. Aldershot being a Lieutenant General's command, to hold which Generals are eligible, I looked down the list to see who was the senior officer who was fit to hold this command. The condition of the list was this: Above the Duke of Connaught there were 15 Generals. One is Lord Roberts, of whom I shall speak afterwards. There were three Marine officers and three Staff Corps officers, who are not eligible; and taking these seven from the 15 there remain eight. One of these is commanding in Ireland, and the other is the Governor of Gibraltar, both higher positions. That leaves six. Of these there is one in Parliament, my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir G. Chesney). He is a most distinguished man in every way; but if I may use a homely phrase, he is not "in the running" for such an appointment, and does not desire to obtain it. That leaves five. Three of this number are within a short time of being superannuated—that is to say, they will be over age within the next year or so—and it would be absurd to appoint any officer to this command who would have to vacate it within a year or so. That leaves two,
